Interested in a Career in Labor Education?

8 to 10 weeks of experience in labor education and an $800 scholarship is being offered this summer by

WORKERS EDUCATION LOCAL 189 OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS, AFL-CIO

This unique opportunity is open to a man or woman qualified for a career in labor education. It provides on-the-job experience at labor summer schools and study of the field with labor educators in unions and/or universities for an 8- to 10-week period this summer.

LABOR EDUCATION is the branch of adult education dealing with the educational needs of union members, particularly those active as stewards, officers and full-time representatives. Qualifications for work in labor education include experience in the labor movement, understanding of educational principles, and familiarity with such subjects as collective bargaining, economics, union administration, legislation and politics.

The 1969 program provided by the scholarship will give experience in planning, teaching and assisting in labor education programs, under the guidance of experienced labor educators. Amount of the scholarship is $800, plus board and room for four weeks.

The scholarship is particularly suited for unionists active in educational work in their unions, teachers in schools or colleges, and graduate students in the social sciences and other fields related to labor education.

Sponsor and administrator of the scholarship is Workers Education Local 189 of the American Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO, the membership organization of labor education staff. Its purpose is to give practical experience to a younger person who is interested in a career in labor education.

Deadline for completed application is April 30, 1969. For application blanks and further information, write:

I. What is Proposed

The University of Connecticut Labor Education Center proposes to establish a long-term non-resident study program for labor union leadership in one or more metropolitan areas in the State of Connecticut. This program will consist of eight, twelve-week, two hour courses in the behavioral and social sciences, communications skills, current problems, and union administration.

They will be conducted at the college level in the tradition of liberal education courses. The great majority of Connecticut's trade union members work and reside in metropolitan areas and are greatly affected by changes on the urban scene. Therefore, the program outlined in this proposal will serve their interests as well as those of all citizens in the state.

II. Goals and Objectives

The goal of this proposal is to establish a long-term non-residential study program which will achieve the objectives described herein. As an organized force, labor unions should play a constructive role in solving metropolitan area problems. To do so effectively, however, requires more than a sense of community-mindedness on the part of a few top union leaders who serve on community boards. Effectiveness depends on two major developments:

A) The development of a union leadership with an understanding of our complex urban society in enough depth to help plan and to actively support programs aimed at the solution of current and future problems.

B) The development of a secondary union leadership able to communicate with and motivate the rank and file to play a meaningful role at the community level.

Both these developments depend upon programs of leadership training with special emphasis on preparation for action in metropolitan areas.

III. Background of Proposal

The University of Connecticut has been engaged in labor education activities since 1949. Until December 1961, these activities were carried on by the Labor-Management Institute, which was dissolved in December 1961. The Labor Education Center was established at that time as a department of Continuing Education Services to carry on and expand the labor education program in Connecticut. An advisory committee made up of national, state and local trade union representatives and University faculty members is being reconstituted. At the present time, the Labor Education Center is offering courses in basic industrial and labor relations for trade unionists at all levels; holding conferences and seminars in cooperation with various labor organizations; conducting five summer schools in cooperation with international unions and the Connecticut State Labor Council; and is also planning to develop certificate or credit courses in the behavioral and social sciences, communication skills, and union administration for active and potential union leaders.

IV. Program

A. Subject Matter and Curriculum

SUGGESTED CURRICULUM FOR LONG-TERM NON-RESIDENTIAL STUDY PROGRAM FOR TRADE UNION LEADERS AND MEMBERS

TERM: 4 years, 24 weeks per year, (two 12-week sessions per year), 2 1/4 hours per week, including a 15-minute coffee break.

1. Labor and the Urban Society

A study of the social forces in our metropolitan areas which affect the labor movement; power structures, mass psychology, social mobility. An analysis of labor's position in the modern urban community and the means available to unions to deal with community problems in areas such as education, social services, housing, crime, public transport, public utilities, conservation, urban renewal and human values. The shifting nature of the community: changing population, social organization, planning and land use and their impact on labor and the labor movement.

2. Current Economic Problems

Contemporary economic problems at the urban, regional, national and international level. The analysis of the changing character of collective bargaining and governmental economic action in reaction to these problems.

3. Labor Law and History

The Wagner Act, Taft-Hartley, Landrum-Griffin through the case method. The federal and state laws that affect the labor movement. Brief history of American labor.

4. Union Administration

The structure of the labor movement, communications and translation into action, utilization of the steward system, committee organization, contract administration, elements of collective bargaining and arbitration.

5. Psychology and Sociology for Union Leaders and Members

Introduction to the psychological problems of labor leadership in the contemporary urban environment; principles of human behavior, motivation, and understanding of psychological factors in business and industry.

Introduction to Sociology will help the union leader interpret social behavior within the context of society and modern American culture. It will examine such topics as race, population, community organization, social change and such major institutions in our society as the family, political organizations, religious institutions and labor unions.

6. Communications Skills

Principles of communication, and the development of necessary technical skills, including reading improvement and effective oral and written expression.

7. United States and World Problems

The federal, state and the urban community; politics, parties and pressure groups in cities and suburbs; municipal organization and operation. Analysis of the relationship of labor to these problems. The civil rights movement. The United States in the world community.

8. Labor's Current Problems and Goals

Analysis of the major problems facing labor unions and the labor movement today. Emphasis will be on the changing nature of the work force, technological change and automation, foreign trade, and changing management and governmental attitudes towards collective bargaining. An examination of the current philosophy and goals of the labor movement, a comparison with goals of foreign labor movements including those in newly developing nations and an evaluation of these philosophies and goals.

NOTE: The reading of appropriate current literature will be stressed in all courses.

B. Method of Instruction

Methods of instruction will be those usually applied in adult education and will include frequent meetings of students, instructors and program administrators for counseling and evaluation. Reading and writing assignments shall be a part of the curriculum.

C. Instructional Materials and Syllabi

The Labor Education Center will coordinate the preparation, use and evaluation of materials and syllabi. This will enable the Center to utilize resource persons and instructors with outstanding abilities in their respective disciplines, provide for the optimum development of materials, and provide for centralization of effort.

D. Location

This program will be established in areas of major population concentration.

E. Class size, Length and Progression

No more than twenty-five students will be included in any one class or section. The program will be set up as an evening or day-time program depending on the nature of the participants' occupation. If there are enough qualified applicants, two classes will be set up, one in the evening and one during the day. As the curriculum indicates, completion of the entire program will take four years. Classes will meet twenty-four weeks per year, 2 1/4 hours per week in two twelve-week terms per year. The first term will start in September and end in December and the second term will start in February and end in April.

In the first year of the program, courses 1, 2, 3 and 4 will be offered; in the second year, courses 5, 6, 7 and 8 will be added. Plans call for starting the educational phase of the program in September, 1966.

F. Standards of Performance

Participants will be expected to show evidence of satisfactory reading, writing and verbal achievement in each subject area. A Certificate of Achievement will be awarded to those who complete the four-year program. Successful passage of a special comprehensive oral and written examination upon completion of the program will entitle participants to a recommendation for additional study, scholarships, career opportunities, and other assignments. At the present time, the Labor Education Center and Continuing Education Services at The University of Connecticut are exploring the possibilities of establishing a credit program in trade union studies on an extension basis. If such a program is established, the Long Term Non-Resident Study Institute for Trade Union Leadership could be made a part of the credit program.

G. Evaluation

The project coordinator will develop a continuing evaluation process using the criteria established by the National Institute of Labor Education (NILE) Advisory Committee and he will maintain appropriate records.

V. Facility Resources

Instructors will be required to meet the regular university standards for approval as instructors in their respective subject matter areas and will be available to counsel students. Scholars, qualified in their field and knowledgeable about the aims and goals of this program, will be asked to prepare supplemental instructional materials and syllabi.

VI. Eligibility, Recruitment and Selection

Any trade union member, officer or staff person who is qualified to handle work at the level of the proposed program will be eligible.

VII. Administration

Administration of this program will be the responsibility of the project coordinator, a member of the Labor Education staff, who will work in cooperation with the Labor Advisory Committee, local central labor bodies, and international and local unions.

ROOSEVELT UNIVERSITY
LABOR EDUCATION DIVISION

Roosevelt University was founded in 1945 to provide opportunity for learning and teaching in conditions of freedom and equality. It was founded in controversy over basic issues of democracy and freedom.

The Board of Trustees and Advisers includes Walter Reuther, Morris Bialis, Patrick Gorman, Jacob Potofsky, David Dubinsky, Adlai Stevenson, Ralph Bunche, and the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. The University library is named after Philip Murray and William Green who were advisers.

The Labor Education Division has equal status with all the other schools in the University. The first Director of the Division, Frank W. McCulloch, is the present Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

Robert J. Pitchell, the new president, has expressed the same support for labor education in an university setting that the founding president, Edward J. Sparling, maintained during his tenure.

The Division is involved in many new programs in the War on Poverty and in efforts to establish civil rights and equality for all citizens.

The office workers and all maintenance employees have a union shop and there is a local of the American Federation of Teachers at the University. The University has an unusual interest in serving the labor movement as well as other segments of our democratic society. We welcome your participation in the spirit of training for better union service.

ROOSEVELT UNIVERSITY
Labor Education Division

is pleased to announce

Labor Leadership in a Dynamic Society

A SPECIAL 32 WEEK, one night a week, program that analyzes the various problems that challenge officers of the local union. This is a program tailored to the specific needs of all officers, including stewards and committee chairmen, in the local union. The need for this special, long-term program has been voiced by many leaders in the Chicago labor movement.

Adults in general—and labor leaders in particular—have a great deal of experience and practical education. With this in mind, a long term leadership program must utilize these experiences and draw upon the latest findings in the Social Sciences.

The program will be informal group discussion with outstanding social scientists used to enrich the discussions. The size of the group will be limited to twenty-five members.

The educational background of the local officers and the time available for outside study has been carefully considered.

The program at all times keeps in mind the primary needs of the working officers of the local unions in trying to serve their membership. The program likewise emphasizes individual development, believing that the community requires leaders prepared for action.

THESE ARE TYPICAL QUESTIONS TO BE ANSWERED IN THE PROGRAM

How does the member view his union?
Why do people behave the way they do?

How should the member be treated who does not use the union procedure?
Why does an individual act as he does?

How can participation and structure of the meeting be improved?
How does the labor leader see himself?

What are the types of leaders and their role within the union?
How does leadership vary in different situations?

Why is it important to distinguish between a grievance, gripe, and complaint?
What is the relation of automation to the changing work force?

What are the legal principles used in the interpretation of agreements?

COORDINATOR FOR THIS SPECIAL PROGRAM will be Duane Beeler, who will attend all meetings so that students may consult with him. Mr. Beeler is a working railroader and has been General Chairmen of a system Grievance Committee of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen for the past 18 years. He has received his Master's degree in the Social Sciences (sociology, psychology, anthropology, economics) from the University of Chicago. He is the author of such books and articles on union procedure as: INVESTIGATIONS, YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED, INSUBORDINATION, WHAT MAKES THEM TICK, INTERPRETATION OF AGREEMENTS, AND ATTRIBUTES OF A LOCAL CHAIRMEN.

TUITION: $90 for the entire program

STARTING DATE: First week of October

STARTING TIME: 7 p.m.

THROUGH PARTICIPATION IN AN EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM, A LOCAL UNION CAN SERVE TWO VITAL FUNCTIONS:

1. Help develop a better understanding of labor's goals and methods.

2. Help train local union leadership.

CIVIL RIGHTS, SOCIAL SECURITY AND MEDICARE

This course will consider recent changes in Federal and state legislation which directly affect the individual employee and human relations in the plant and community. Major emphasis will be given to Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Wisconsin Fair Employment Practice Act, and other legislation aimed at the elimination of job discrimination on the basis of age, sex, race or religion.

In addition, the course will seek to develop an understanding of significant changes in social welfare legislation which affect the economic well-being of the individual and the community. To be considered are such subjects as the new provisions for retirement income under Social Security, medical care for the aged, recent developments in workmen's compensation, unemployment compensation and minimum wage legislation.

Dear Dr. Pitts:

At the request of Analoyce Clapp and Robert Taylor, Assistant to President Harrington, University of Wisconsin, I am enclosing literature describing the School for Workers of the University of Wisconsin.

Should you wish to visit our operation, we would be happy to see you.

A member of our faculty, Emory Via, is currently on leave this year and is working with the Southern Regional Council and is located in Atlanta, Georgia. I am sure that he would be happy to talk to you about labor education. There is currently some Federal money which is available in certain states.

Dear Bob:

Dr. Lucius Pitts, President of Miles College, Birmingham, Alabama, is greatly interested in the University of Wisconsin's Workers' School. From the little I could tell him about it, it appears to me that Miles College might benefit from that kind of school. They have been trying to formulate some sort of workers' education program down there, and have established night courses in several categories.

Will you please send Dr. Pitts some information on our Workers' School? I am sure he will appreciate it, and so will Potomac.

Sincerely,

Analoyce E. Clapp

I am sorry we did not have a chance to chat at The White House Conference. I kept thinking there would be a few minutes somewhere, but when those few minutes came, I was whipped.

I am enclosing copies of two letters. Did Dr. Pitts ever contact you for further information about workers' classes? He has started a few evening classes, but did want further information. He may have contacted Bob Ozanne directly, or he may have been bogged down with other projects.

These letters I just checked through as I was cleaning personal items out of the files, since I am leaving Potomac the 15th. It was a sad decision. This summer I will be writing a little, for two midwest dailies, but mostly I will just have a vacation.

Nice to have met you, even briefly.

Dear Larry:

Monday, September 26, Jim Sparling and I spent a wonderful hour with Walter Reuther at Solidarity House.

Among other things Walter agreed to stimulate more support in the labor movement for the federal labor extension services we had been talking about for the U. S. Department of Labor. I suggested that he get in touch with you to get the details of what has been done up to now.

The President of Miles College in Birmingham, Alabama has asked me to serve as a consultant in helping them establish a labor education program. This Negro college in the center of the steel industry could well become another pioneer of labor education.

I would like very much to get your reaction as well as Stanton Smith's about the best way to proceed. Would you please discuss this with him and let me know your feelings in the matter. It might be desirable to have you or someone you designate attend the first meeting which will be held the latter part of October. In addition we might involve Emory Via who is still with the Southern Regional Council, Inc. in Atlanta. Please let me know as soon as you can. Oct. 28

Right to Curb Pickets Warmly Debated

By Alice Myers
Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor
Chicago

The rights of labor are being debated with some heat in Chicago classrooms as well as in the halls of Congress. Progressively keener interest is being shown here in the history and problems of the American labor movement.

One example of this interest is the current four-session institute on "The Rights of Labor in a Democratic Society" being conducted at Roosevelt College under the joint auspices of the Chicago Division of the American Civil Liberties Union and the Labor Education Division of the college.

Whether picketing ever should be restricted was the topic for discussion at the first session at which Leon Despres, labor attorney, served as chairman. Dr. John A. Lapp, educator and labor-arbitrator, shared the speaker's platform with Ralph Helstein, president of the United Packinghouse Workers of America, CIO, and member of the executive board of the CIO. The two-hour session closed with several hands still raised for questions.

Individual Right

Both speakers agreed that picketing is an individual right that should be protected under the basic civil right of free speech. "In safeguarding the rights of labor to picket we are safeguarding the rights of ourselves to do many other things," Dr. Lapp declared.

Besides, he added, once men are conceded the right to strike, it follows they have the right to do what is legitimately possible to make a strike effective. This would include peaceful picketing.

While considering strikebreakers a menace and hoping to see the time when they are completely outlawed, Dr. Lapp said no one should have the right "physically to exclude persons from entering a plant." However, if the majority of workers in a plant vote to strike, he thinks the minority have no right to cross the picket line.

Dr. Lapp was inclined to think peaceful picketing had been generally accepted as a right, but Mr. Helstein regarded this view as overly optimistic. He related experience after experience during last year's prolonged packing house strike to show that the right to picket is an urgent problem today, that it is far from being accepted as a right. As a practical fact, he said, there are so many encroachments on the right to picket that picketing is largely ineffective.

Sixty to 70 packing houses scattered throughout the country were involved in last year's strike. Local courts issued injunctions against picketing in all but five plant cities, Mr. Helstein said. These injunctions varied greatly. One limited the number of pickets to two. Another limited them to one to every 50 feet. In Mason City, Iowa, where the number was limited to 10, a packing house workers, holding a baby in one arm and a four-year-old child by the hand, was arrested as an 11th picket, according to Mr. Helstein, because the allowed 10 happened to stop to talk to him in front of his house which happened to be next door to the packing plant.

In Kansas City, Kan., Mr. Holstein said, the police beat up a group of peaceful pickets and damaged their union hall. When the union sought an injunction against the police, it was unable to get one, but just a few weeks ago the union did collect $11,000 damage from the city for what its police had done.

Mass Picketing Issue

The question of mass picketing roused the most debate—without any very clear-cut conclusions. Dr. Lapp thought there should be some "reasonable limitations" on mass picketing, and that mass picketing should not be permitted in certain places, such as the corner of Madison and State Street, where it would seriously interfere with traffic. However, at another point he had characterized as "the lowest descent of justice" cases where the judges limited the number of pickets.

Mr. Helstein would object to any legal restraints on mass picketing, but said that as a matter of tactics it "would be crazy" for any union to send a big picket line to such a spot as Dr. Lapp described.

Giving the philosophical basis for his objection to any outlawing of peaceful picketing, Mr. Helstein said: "It seems to me a trade union is essentially a mechanism through which people exercise their basic civil rights, such as the right of lawful assembly, of redress of grievances, and the right to engage in freedom of speech. (Picketing is interpreted as coming under the latter.) Any attempt to enact legislation to interfere with picketing is an attempt to interfere with these basic civil rights."

Dual Purpose

Mr. Helstein said his experience has been that without exception picketing usually is intended to be peaceful. Mass picketing generally reflects one of two things, he added: Either a tactical measure to keep up the morale of the strikers by having large numbers take part; or a response to a deliberate attempt by employers to break the strike.

Observers at the institute felt the generally confused, though interested, state of thinking apparent during the discussion period indicated the current necessity for American citizens to inform themselves on such vital labor matters and think out what are labor's rights in a democracy.

How to Cut Strikes Stumps Speakers At Chicago Forum

By Alice Myers

Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Chicago

To summarize the second session of the current institute at Roosevelt College on "The Rights of Labor in a Democratic Society" would be impossible. Even the chairman who was supposed to do so at the session's close gave up with a helpless shrug.

The topic of the evening was whether strikes affecting the national welfare should be limited. The brochure announcing the institute led one to believe answers would be given to such questions as: What strikes affect "national welfare"? Where does "national welfare" end? What causes such strikes and how can we reach the cause? What legislation should be supported?

If anyone has any ready answer to these urgent questions, he wasn't among the 100 or so who attended the institute.

Besides a handful of college students, those present included local union leaders, several labor arbitrators, and a miscellaneous group of interested citizens. The discussion would have been even more fruitful had there been some straight management representatives to take part. They could have been there; the institute was open to the public and had been publicized in local newspapers.

Rapid-Fire Questions

Probably the only fact all those present might have agreed upon was that it was a hot subject they were debating. So many questions were fired at the two speakers they must have begun to feel like a couple of jack-in-the-boxes on the platform. In fact, they even kept bobbing up at each other with questions.

Charles O. Gregory, professor of law at the University of Chicago, who has had some years' experience as a labor-management arbitrator, opened the discussion with the encouraging remark that, "No one knows the answer to this one." By the time he and Daniel D. Carmell, counsel of the American Federation of Labor, got through, the professor's initial statement looked like the least controversial one of the evening.

Professor Gregory reviewed several methods that have been tried, and some that are proposed, to avert nationwide tie-ups of essential industries or utilities. Most thinking people, he feels, agree that mere repression is stupid. Conciliation and mediation, on the other hand, have proved inadequate, in his opinion. As for compulsory arbitration, neither management nor labor like it, as they don't like imposed prices of either commodities or labor.

Legislative View Given

Some employers, he said, would liked to see the president empowered to put such a strike on ice and turn the problem over to Congress to deal with it through legislation. But no one present seemed to think this idea had any merit beyond the possibility that both parties might be so scared of the mess Congress might make that they would be impelled to come to terms.

Among the suggested plans for dealing with "national emergencies" caused by threatened strikes, Professor Gregory described several, including the Virginia law now being invoked against bus lines, that would provide for government seizure of struck properties in one form or another. He also detailed an idea of his owh for setting up a permanent public industrial commission to follow conditions in certain key industries. If a strike threatened, the commission would get employers and unions together to fix up their contract, strikes or lockouts being prohibited meanwhile. If the parties involved couldn't agree, then the commission would write the contract.

Thinking Termed Vital

Not that he felt any of the plans presented offered a real solution. "But," he said, "I think some such plans will have to be thought about if we have a few more strikes like those in the maritime, railroad, and coal industries."

While agreeing that "no one relishes a national emergency," Mr. Carmell sought to remind everyone that the right not to work is a primary right of a free society, guaranteed by the 13th Amendment, which outlaws slavery and involuntary servitude. If this right is to be abridged, it should be done by constitutional amendment and not by legislative acts, he held.

'Less Than a Slave Law'

Of the Virginia law which provides that the governor can declare an emergency, draft workers into the militia and court martial them if they refuse to work, he asked: "Is that less than slave labor?" He would not object, however, to state or federal government using their regularly constituted militia or army and navy to run an essential industry when the public welfare was threatened by a strike.

Mr. Carmell seriously questioned whether any conceivable strike could be more dangerous to the "public welfare" than the abridgement of a free man's right to quit work. And he indicated that industrial employees will sacrifice a great deal to preserve the right to stop working under terms and conditions of employment they consider unacceptable.

What labor actually wants today, Mr. Carmell said at one point, is to be able to get back to the pre-war Labor Board position of being able to bargain collectively in good faith on essential issues. He claimed such bargaining had gone out the window under the War Labor Board and Taft-Hartley. Under these, he said, both parties have come to depend on government to step in and do what they should do for themselves.

Keen Debate in Chicago Airs Collective Bargaining Issues

By Alice Myers
Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Chicago

Some members expected that the third session of the Roosevelt College institute on "The Rights of Labor in a Democratic Society" would be a letdown or at least, in labor-management lingo, a cooling-off period, after the heated discussion of the second session. But it wasn't.

In fact, debate was even keener since, for the first time during the institute, the two speakers came from definitely opposite sides of the issue. The subject was "How Far Should Collective Bargaining Go?"

Frank Donner, assistant general counsel of the CIO, spoke for organized labor. Patrick Nagle, labor relations counsel of the Employers' Association of Chicago, was equally eloquent in behalf of management.

Both speakers more or less agreed there is no pat answer to how far collective bargaining should go. As Mr. Donner put it, "The answer is all tied up with the history of the particular industry." In Mr. Nagle's words, "A union and a company can bargain on anything under the sun if they do so voluntarily, as long as no rights or laws are violated."

But beyond this, their views differ.

Mr. Donner, who has argued many cases for labor before the courts and government boards, took the position that without legal compulsion it was doubtful whether many employers would engage in collective bargaining at all. On this primise, and foreseeing "a tremendous drive toward bargaining for welfare benefits," he said employers should be compelled to bargain collectively on pensions and other welfare benefits.

Strong Exception Taken

Mr. Nagle, who has had wide experience in collective bargaining, took the position that compulsory bargaining should be limited to wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, and physical conditions in the shop.

The soon-to-be director of the Fox River Valley Employers Association took strong exception to union arguments that unless compelled to do so, employers would give their workers few if any benefits, and cited the many pension plans that have been put into effect in industry without any compulsion.

To this Mr. Donner retorted that most such plans were inadequate or had been instituted to break unions. Mr. Nagle admitted some pension plans had been put in for selfish reasons but asserted that the motivation in many cases was entirely laudable. He insisted that not all workers' benefits have come about as the result of compulsion—that times do change men, even employers. Thousands of employers, he went on, have adopted plans of one kind or another that will help their workers because they have come to realize that what is good for the company is good for the employee and vice versa.

Earnings or Gifts?

The question was warmly argued as to whether pensions represent earnings by employees or gifts by employers. Mr. Donner took the position that a pension is a deferred wage, something the employee earns, therefore an appropriate subject for collective bargaining. Moreover, he asked, what was a retirement plan but a form of discharge procedure, and discharge procedures, he pointed out, are included in virtually all labor-management contracts.

Mr. Nagle came back with the proposition that if a pension is something the employee earns during the period of service, then he should be allowed to spend that earning as he sees fit. Union leaders, he said, should have no right to compel him to defer that wage. "If 60,000,000 workers are not capable of taking care of their own welfare," he challenged, "let's face that fact and proceed from there."

But, he insisted, referring both to pensions and union demands for other welfare benefits such as hospitalization and medical care, employers should not be responsible for needs and ills of employees, regardless of their origin.

The speakers contested another point. Mr. Donner had said all the unions wanted was to compel employers to sit down and listen to their pension and welfare demands. He said it did not mean they had to agree to them. Mr. Nagle insisted that if employers are compelled to bargain on these points, it means they must eventually agree to such plans.

"When it is made compulsory for the employer to bargain on these issues," he warned, "we will see a stoppage of industrial expansion and a cutting down on employee benefits." He maintained it was not economically feasible to make pensions and welfare benefits a part of union contracts.

To this Mr. Donner, who wrote most of the brief in the Inland Steel Case in which the United States Supreme Court ruled that pension plans were subject to collective bargaining, replied that in 1935 employers thought bargaining should not be compulsory on any subject.

Relations of Labor Unions Debated at Chicago School

By Alice Myers
Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Chicago

Workers need protection in some fashion from certain forms of union regulation, both speakers agreed. The question was how much protection and through what agencies.

The occasion was the fourth and final session of Roosevelt College's institute on "The Rights of Labor in a Democratic Society." Less cleavage of opinion marked this session, but the evening proved no less stimulating than the other three.

The rights and responsibilities of individual union members was the topic of discussion. In contrast to the previous sessions which dealt with unions in their relation to management and to the general public, the last one dealt with the relation of the union to its own members or would-be members.

Joseph Kovner, graduate of Yale Law School, who served as counsel to the labor vice-chairman of the War Production Board during the war and who participated with William Leiserson in an extensive study for Johns Hopkins University of the internal operations of unions, thinks our present judicial system is adequate to protect the rights of workers. He cited many court decisions upholding the rights of workers against discriminatory union policies.

Bill Criticized

Joel Seidman, member of the social science faculty of the University of Chicago and author of "Union Rights and Duties," favors greater administrative action to protect workers. He criticized the administration's proposed labor act of 1949 because it contains no provisions to require open unions, democratic management, or fair trial with right of appeal for those convicted of offenses.

"Workers," he said, "should have the right to be admitted to unions without discrimination and they should have the right of appeal to an impartial agency in case of heavy fines, suspension, or expulsion. This should permit proper union discipline while safeguarding the rights of those whose only offense is opposition to the union leadership. The right to change a bargaining agency at an appropriate time should receive explicit protection in the statute. Such provisions for promoting justice within unions, far from diminishing bargaining strength, will increase it by insuring the loyalty of the membership."

No Surprise

It was not surprising, he added, that the Wagner Act made no attempt to assure such protection to workers, since it largely was employers' abuses that led to its enactment. But today there is less excuse for such failure. Growth of the labor movement from 4,000,000 in 1935 to nearly 16,000,000 in 1949 has shown, he said, that the size and power of unions do not insure justice and democracy in internal affairs.

The Taft-Hartley Act, Mr. Seidman explained, dealt with some of the abuses that widespread closed shops made possible where unions were run in an undemocratic fashion, but used them as an excuse for a punitive measure aimed primarily at weakening union bargaining strength and effectiveness in strikes.

Thus a worker belonging to a minority group was protected against discharge on a union's demand if membership was not open to him on equal terms, but he was given no right to become a union member, where he could have a voice in determining his wages and working conditions.

The closed shop, Mr. Seidman believes, should be retained, but its abuses outlawed.

No Typical Method

While pointing out various discriminatory practices, both speakers made it plain these were not typical of the majority of unions, but that since they do exist, they must be dealt with. Mr. Kovner, for instance, is trying to get a bill through Congress that would give union members the right to sue in the courts for denial of their rights. When such denial of their rights results in loss of employment, if they win the case, he holds, they should receive double the loss in wages plus the lawyer's fees.

Pointing out that historically the organization of workmen into unions is a part of the great American tradition of self-government by private voluntary associations of individuals engaged in common activities, Mr. Kovner declared:

"The American trade union represents the capacity of the American citizen for self-government. It is an extraordinary capacity. It is today the hope of the world when totalitarian regimes succeed one another and the faith of Europe in self-government has been undermined by political catastrophes."

Civil Liberties

He was optimistic that the guarantee of basic civil liberties to union members would assure the correction of such abuses as now exist. "If union members can express themselves freely about the management of the union by the officials, if they can communicate with other members and other locals, if they can form opposition groups and parties, if they have access to vital information about the management of union affairs, if they have recourse to the courts for the denial of these rights or the discriminatory application of union laws, or the denial of a fair trial, the improvement of unions and the correction of abuses," he maintained, "can be left in the hands of the members of trade unions."

There was considerable discussion of union discrimination against Negroes in particular. Mr. Kovner cited a Supreme Court decision in the case of some Negro firemen to show that actually the law forbids unions to discriminate on racial or religious grounds. The court ruled that a union holding exclusive bargaining rights under a labor relations act cannot discriminate against any of the persons it represents, whether members or not, on account of race. The Negro firemen had been deprived of their seniority rights. The union, said Chief Justice Harlan Stone, was under the same duty which the Constitution of the United States imposes upon the federal and state legislatures: They cannot deny any inhabitant equal protection of the laws.

Board, No. 11617, June 6, 1956

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT
-- Refusal to bargain -- Refusal to furnish information to union

Board held warranted in finding that employer, while engaged in bargaining negotiations with union including the matter of wage increase, violated Section 8(a)(5) of Act by refusing to furnish union with information as to certain "point ratings" which employer used in determining each employee's rate of pay. Point ratings constituted an important consideration in employer's entire wage structure; the exercise of judgment was involved in the point ratings thus increasing the area where controversy was likely to result; and employer had supplied the information to union in every case where it was relevant to an individual grievance.

Full Text of Opinion

MAJOR, Circuit Judge:-- Petitioner, while engaged in bargaining negotiations with the Forge and Machine Workers Union, the statutory bargaining representative of its employees, refused the Union's request for information as to certain "point ratings" which petitioner used in determining each employee's rate of pay. The Board (with two members dissenting) concluded that the requested information was relevant and essential to the parties' bargaining and that, consequently, petitioner's conduct constituted a refusal to bargain, in violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act (Title 29 U.S.C.A. Sec. 158(a)(5) and (1). The Board's decision, rendered August 16, 1955, required petitioner to cease and desist from refusing to bargain with the Union, and as affirmative relief required petitioner to furnish the Union with the information sought and to post notices with a showing of compliance within ten days.

The case is here on petition of the employer to review and set aside the Board's order. In answer, the Board has requested enforcement.

There is no dispute of consequence as to the evidentiary facts. It is the conclusion which the Board has drawn therefrom that forms the basis of the instant controversy. More specifically, the issue is legal rather than factual. Nevertheless, a statement of the facts in some detail appears essential.

/FACTS OF CASE/

On April 16, 1954, representatives of petitioner and the Union were engaged in a bargaining conference, including the matter of a wage increase sought by the Union. At this conference the Union's attorney requested of petitioner's personnel manager information contained in its files relative to certain factors which petitioner took into consideration in evaluating each job and upon which the salary paid therefor depended. The denial of this request constitutes the basis for the instant controversy.

Petitioner paid its employees, some 238 in number, an hourly wage rate, determined as to each job by the number of "points" assigned to that particular job. It appraised the various factors, each being awarded a certain number of points, and the resulting point total determined the rate per hour to be paid for each job. A separate sheet was used for each job, with a written analysis of the work to be done, together with its physical aspects, on one side, and on the other, an evaluation of the human factors involved and the point ratings which the various factors merited. The side of the sheet listing the physical aspects was headed "Job Description." The other side was headed "Job Rating Substantiating Data." We need not dwell upon the "Job Description" information for the reason that this was furnished to the Union and is not in dispute. It is the information setting forth the "Job Rating Substantiating Data" which petitioner refused to furnish the Union. On this side of the sheet petitioner recorded the value of each rating factor. For such purpose eleven factors were employed: Education, Experience, Initiative and Ingenuity, Physical Demand, Mental or Visual Demand, Responsibility for Material or Product, Responsibility for Equipment or Process, Responsibility for Safety of Others, Responsibility for Work of Others, Working Conditions and Unavoidable Hazards. In appraising such rating factors petitioner used as its yardstick a Job Rating Manual, issued by the National Metal Trades Association, which defined the factors and prescribed that each be given a rating from 1st to 5th degree. The manual provided for the conditions required for each degree of a given factor, with the point value to be allowed under the degree determined. Rating was made by comparing the written job description against the manual's degree requirements. Petitioner sought to give each job rating factor that degree (from 1st to 5th) and hence that point value which was called for by the job conditions as described.

While the appraisement which petitioner made of these various rating factors is important, we think they need not be discussed in detail, in view of the admission of the parties relative thereto. It is conceded by the Board that some of the factors lend themselves to a rating as to point value capable of ascertainment to a mathematical certainty. On the other hand, certain other factors are not capable of a point evaluation with any degree of certainty. In other words, the evaluation of such factors for the purpose of determining their point value depends upon the experience and judgment of the evaluator. We do not understand that petitioner disagrees with the Board as to the manner in which it arrives at the point value to be ascribed to the different factors. In its brief it states, "Each described job is evaluated under certain factors according to the judgment of the evaluator, who assigns point values to the job to be used in comparing one job and its wage rate with another job and its wage rate." Moreover, petitioner's personnel manager as a witness admitted that the evaluation of some factors calls for a knowledge of the job rating system, familiarity with the job conditions involved and the exercise of a certain amount of judgment.

We think it is hardly open to dispute but that the total point evaluation assigned by petitioner to the eleven involved factors was not only directly related to the pay determined for each job but that it constituted an important consideration in petitioner's entire wage structure. Moreover, petitioner regarded such information as important to the Union in adjusting grievances arising in individual cases. Over a period of nine years of processing such grievances it had disclosed to the Union the "degree" ratings of 95 individual jobs out of a total of 238 in its plant. In fact, it was a company policy and practice to allow not only the Union but also individual employees, upon request and a showing of good reason, an opportunity to examine its evaluation information. Petitioner's personnel manager testified that the disclosure of such information resulted in the disposition of a number of grievances involving the hourly pay rate.

/THEORY OF EMPLOYER/

It is contended here, as it was before the Board, that the Union with the information supplied by the company was in as good a position as petitioner to evaluate the involved factors. The testimony of petitioner's personnel manager on this point, however, carried little weight because the witness in attempting to evaluate the points assigned to a certain job came up with a total far short of those which petitioner had previously found such job to merit. This evidently resulted from the fact that the evaluation service for petitioner was performed by a specialist in that field. The witness had not participated in the rendition of this service and hence was unable to determine the points to which the particular job was entitled. This was because the points assigned to a number of factors depended upon the judgment of the evaluator. It follows that an evaluation by persons equally competent and qualified was calculated to produce different results and consequently the wages determined by petitioner for each job would depend upon such varying judgment.

We think petitioner stresses to its disadvantage the fact that its point evaluation resulted from the exercise of judgment, with the consequent determination of the wage fixed for each job. In our view, the fact that the exercise of judgment is involved increases the area where controversy is likely to result. Petitioner in its brief states, "Surely the law does not require an employer to make such an analytical study for a Union." We assume that the law does not impose such a requirement, in fact, that it does not impose upon an employer the duty of making such a study for itself, but when it does so and its process produces a result upon which its wage structure depends, we are not able to discern any good reason why the Union is not entitled to such information in the course of its bargaining negotiations.

Petitioner also states in its brief, "As a matter of fact, there are many other job evaluation procedures which are available to the Union in analyzing the basic facts which it had in its possession." Assuming this is a correct statement, it begs the issue because any evaluation made by the Union in all probability would have differed from that made by petitioner. Thus, a solution of the controversy arising from the Union's demand for increased wages would have been dependent upon a reconciliation of the differing results obtained by the evaluators for the respective parties. We agree with petitioner that it would be just as reasonable to require the Union upon demand to furnish the employer with its evaluation data as to require the employer to furnish such data to the Union. However, we see no reason why either party to the bargaining process should not furnish the other any relevant data or information in its possession pertinent to the wages determined for a certain job or to the wage structure as a whole.

We agree with the Trial Examiner's statement that "Only full disclosure of /petitioner's/ wage structure based on the point values assigned to each factor for all jobs would enable the Union to know whether to press or modify a particular wage demand, whether inequities exist which merit discussion or correction, and whether other elements are present in the wage structure which, though impossible to visualize beforehand, appear to merit discussion once the full picture is available."

As already noted, petitioner deemed it appropriate to supply the information now in controversy in every case where it was relevant to an individual grievance. In this connection the Board stated, "It is clear that if the data is relevant and necessary in the case of individual grievances, it is equally relevant and necessary where the object of the negotiation is to establish broad pay formulas which will eliminate the necessity of filing individual grievances." With this reasoning as applied to the facts of this case we agree.

/THE AUTHORITIES/

Many cases are cited and discussed by the parties wherein the courts under a variety of circumstances have held that the Act requires an employer to furnish a union with information relevant to bargaining issues. Some of the more important of such cases are Aluminum Ore Co. v. N.L.R.B., 131 F.2d 485, 11 LRRM 693; N.L.R.B. v. Otis Elevator Co., 208 F.2d 176, 33 LRRM 2129; N.L.R.B. v. Whitin Machine Works, 217 F.2d 593, 35 LRRM 2215; N.L.R.B. v. The Item Company, 220 F.2d 956, 35 LRRM 2709, and Boston Herald-Traveler Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 223 F.2d 58, 36 LRRM 2220. We think no good purpose could be served in discussing or analyzing these cases. It perhaps is true, as asserted by petitioner, that the particular information sought by the Union in the instant case has not been involved in any of the court decisions. It is equally true, however, that the courts have announced and applied the general principle that an employer is obligated to furnish the union with data and information relevant to issues about which the parties are obligated to bargain. Typical of such cases is the decision of this court in the Aluminum Ore Co. case (131 F.2d 485, 487, 11 LRRM 693, wherein we stated:

"This /referring to the Act/ contemplates exchange of information, ideas and theories in open discussion and honest attempt to arrive at an agreement * * * In determining what employees should receive increases and in what amounts, it could have been only helpful to have before the bargainers the wage history of the various employees, including full information as to the work done by the respective employees and as to their respective wages in the past, their respective increases from time to time and all other facts bearing upon what constituted fair wages and fair increases."

Petitioner, relying upon N.L.R.B. v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 30 LRRM 2147, argues that its refusal to furnish the sought information does not in any event constitute a refusal to bargain in good faith. That case, however, is distinguishable from the instant case, as is shown by note 20, page 407, where it is stated, "This is not the case of an employer refusing to bargain * * * /because of an/ erroneous theory * * * of law" as to his bargaining obligation. It has been held in numerous cases that good faith is not open to an employer as a defense to an unfair labor charge based upon its refusal to bargain merely because it entertained an erroneous view of the law. N.L.R.B. v. J.H.Allison & Co.,165 F.2d 766, 770, 21 LRRM 2238; N.L.R.B. v. Corsicana Cotton Mills,178 F.2d 344, 346, 25 LRRM 2298; N.L.R.B. v. Berkley Machine Works & Foundry Co.,Inc.,189 F.2d 904, 28 LRRM 2176.

Petitioner raises other questions which we have considered and find without merit. The petition to review and set aside the Board's order is denied. The Board's request for enforcement is allowed and, upon presentation, an appropriate decree will be entered.

DECISION OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
IN MATTER OF J. I. CASE COMPANY (OFFICIAL TEXT)

United States of America
Before The National Labor Relations Board

J. I. CASE COMPANY (Rock Island, Illinois) and INTERNATIONAL UNION, UNITED AUTOMOBILE, AIRCRAFT AND AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT WORKERS OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO	Case No. 13-CA-2200
J. I. CASE COMPANY (Bettendorf Works) and INTERNATIONAL UNION, UNITED AUTOMOBILE, AIRCRAFT AND AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT WORKERS OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO, and ITS LOCAL 858.	Case No. 13-CA-2297

[MADE PUBLIC: July 11, 1957]

DECISION AND ORDER

On November 26, 1956, Trial Examiner Lloyd Buchanan issued his Intermediate Report in the above-entitled consolidated proceedings, finding that the Respondent had engaged in and was engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8 (a) (5) and (1) of the Act and recommending that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain action, as set forth in the copy of the Intermediate Report attached hereto. Thereafter, the Respondent, the General Counsel and the Union 1/ filed exceptions to the Intermediate Report with supporting briefs.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3 (b) of the National Labor Relations Act, the Board has delegated its powers in connection with this case to a three-member panel.

On January 4, 1957, Respondent moved the Board to dismiss the complaint, contending that certain members of the International Union's Board of Trustees are "officers" within the purview of Section 9 (h) of the Act but have not filed non-communist affidavits in compliance with that section. The Board has held that the Trustees of the International Union, UAW-AFL-CIO, are not officers required to file non-Communist affidavits under Section 9 (h) of the Act, Kohler Co., 117 NLRB No. 42. Moreover, the question as to who are constitutional officers under a union constitution for compliance purposes can only be raised in an administrative proceeding directed solely to inquiring into the compliance status of a union. Such questions are not litigable in representation and complaint proceedings. Kohler Co., supra; Shoe Corporation of America, 117 NLRB No. 158. Accordingly, Respondent's motion is denied.

The Board has reviewed the rulings of the Trial Examiner made at the hearing and finds that no prejudicial error was committed. The rulings are hereby affirmed. 2/ The Board has considered the Intermediate Report, the exceptions and briefs filed by the parties, and the entire record in this case, and hereby adopts the findings, conclusions and recommendations of the Trial Examiner, to the extent consistent with the following Decision and Order.

1. We agree with the Trial Examiner that Respondent violated Section 8 (a) (5) of the Act by refusing the Union's requests of March 15 and 26, 1956, for wage information.

At a meeting held on March 15 to discuss grievances, the Union requested Respondent to furnish time studies covering tractor line jobs at the Rock Island plant. Respondent without explanation declined to make these time studies available to the Union. On March 26, the Union requested the time studies and job evaluation data applicable to a job classified as "turret-lathe vertical" at the Bettendorf plant, which job had been changed from a single to a two-machine operation. At a meeting with the Union on April 12, Respondent's representative read off data from time studies on the turret-lathe vertical operation. The Union's representatives were dissatisfied with the information so given and requested that the time study information be supplied them on the forms used by Respondent so that they could submit the executed forms to the Union's time study experts for evaluation. Respondent's representative refused to give the information on the time study forms used by Respondent and also refused to supply the job evaluation data requested by the Union.

An employer's obligation to grant a bargaining agent's request for original time studies and job evaluation data applicable to particular jobs is well established. 3/ Contrary to Respondent's contention, the Union's right to such relevant wage information is not dependent upon processing a particular grievance through the grievance procedure adopted by the parties. 4/ Nor is it dependent upon the employer's use of such information to substantiate its bargaining position as to wages. As stated by the Board in the Woolworth 5/ case:

The Board with court approval, has consistently held that an employer is under a duty to accommodate a union's request during contract negotiations for relevant wage information. 2/ Like the Trial Examiner, the Board finds that such duty continues after a collective-bargaining agreement has been executed. 3/ The employer's duty, in either instance, is predicated upon the need of the union for such information in order to provide intelligent representation of the employees. When administering a collective-bargaining agreement, the union's need for current and authoritative information is no less real than it was before the contract was executed. Accordingly, in agreement with the Trial Examiner's rejection of the Respondent's other contentions with respect of its duty to furnish wage data, the Board concludes that the Respondent violated Section 8 (a)(5) and 8(a)(1) the Act by refusing to furnish the wage data the Union requested. 4/ (See footnote)

2. Contrary to the Trial Examiner, we find that Respondent further violated Section 8 (a) (5) of the Act by refusing the Union's request of March 28, 1956 for wage information covering all jobs in the bargaining unit at the

By letter dated March 28, 1956, alleging that it needed the information "for purposes of collective bargaining and contract administration," the Union asked Respondent for time studies, job evaluations, and other materials used to set incentive rates and to classify and evaluate jobs in the bargaining unit. At a meeting in April, Robert Burke, Industrial Relations Supervisor for the Bettendorf plant, advised the Union's representatives that Respondent did not consider itself "obligated" to furnish the requested information.

The requested information was unquestionably necessary to the Union's intelligent representation of the employees in the appropriate unit. Without this information, the Union could not compare jobs and so determine whether a particular grievance had merit and should be processed. Nor could the Union review respondent's wage system for purposes of future wage negotiations or for purposes of contract administration. Woolworth case, supra.

It does not appear from the record in this case that it would be unduly burdensome for Respondent to comply with the Union's request for all relevant wage data. Respondent never advised the Union that it would be unduly burdensome for it to furnish the Union with the requested wage data, nor did Respondent ever discuss with the Union methods of making this data available to the Union. Respondent, in fact, did not offer its defense of burdensome until the hearing before the Trial Examiner. It is clear, therefore, that the defense of burdensomeness was merely an after-thought on the part of Respondent. 6/ Further, while the time study data may be voluminous, it is collected in centralized files and may readily be made available to the Union for examination or duplication. All that is necessary, therefore, is for Respondent to enter into reasonable arrangements with the Union for obtaining the requested wage information. 7/

3. We concur in the Trial Examiner's finding that Respondent has not sustained its defense that the Union's requests for wage information were made for the purpose of harassing the Respondent. It cannot be disputed that the requested time studies and job evaluations were directly related to the setting of wage rates at a Respondent's plants. The union, accordingly, was under no obligation to show a specific immediate or prospective need for this information. 8/ Hence no inference of harassment can be drawn from any failure on the Union's part to demonstrate its need for the requested data. 9/ Nor, in the circumstances of this case, can a purpose of harassment be inferred from the Union's filing of several unfair labor practice charges at the Rock Island and Bettendorf plants merely because the General Counsel did not issue complaints upon these charges. 10/ ORDER: Upon the entire record in this case, and pursuant to Section 10 (c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, the National Labor Relations Board hereby orders that:

1. The Respondent, J. I. Case Company (Rock Island, Illinois), Rock Island, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall:

3/ N. L. R. B. v. New Britain Machine Co., 33 LRRM 2461 at 2462 (C. A. 2); N. L. R. B. v. Hekman Furniture Co. 207 F 2d 561 at 562 (C. A. 6); N. L. R. B. v. Leland Gifford Co. 200 F 2d 620 at 624 (C. 4/ Whitin Machine Works, 108 NLRB 1537.

a. Cease and desist from:

(1) Refusing to bargain collectively with the International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL-CIO, Local 806, its agents or representatives, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment, by refusing to furnish to the Union or its agents or representatives information and data concerning time studies and

(2) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining or coercing its employees in the exercise of the right to self organization, to form labor organizations, to join or assist International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL-CIO, Local 806, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all such activities, except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment, as authorized in Section B (a)(3) of the Act.

b. Take the following affirmative action, which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act.

(1) Upon request, furnish to International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL-CIO, Local 806, its agents and representatives, time studies and other wage data and information used by the Company in classifying or evaluating jobs or fixing rates of employees in the bargaining unit:

(2) Post at its plant in Rock Island, Illinois, copies of the notice attached hereto and marked Appendix A. 11/Copies of said notice to be furnished by the Regional Director for the Thirteenth Region, shall, after being duly signed by the Company's representative, be posted by the Company immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for sixty (60) consecutive days thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to its employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Company to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced or covered by any other material; and

(3) Notify the Regional Director for the Thirteenth Region, in writing, within ten (10) days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

2. The Respondent, J. I. Case Company (Bettendorf Works), Bettendorf, Iowa, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

a. Cease and desist from:

(1) Refusing to bargain collectively with International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL-CIO, its agents or representatives, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment, by refusing to furnish to the Union or its agents or representatives information and data concerning job evaluations and time studies; and

(2) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights to self-organization, to form labor organizations, to join or assist International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL-CIO, or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and to engage in other concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any or all of such activities, except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement, requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment, as authorized in Section 8(a) (3) of the Act.

b. Take the following affirmative action, which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act.

(1) Upon request, furnish to International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL-CIO, its agents and representatives, job evaluations and time studies and other wage data and information used by the Company in classifying or evaluating jobs or fixing rates of employees in the bargaining unit:

(2) Post at its plant in Bettendorf, Iowa, copies of notice attached hereto and marked Appendix B. 12/ Copies of said notice, to be furnished by the Regional Director for the Thirteenth Region, shall, after being duly signed by the Company's representative, be posted by the Company immediately upon receipt thereof, and be maintained by it for sixty (60) consecutive days. Thereafter, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to its employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Company to insure that said notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material; and

(3) Notify the Regional Director for the Thirteenth Region, in writing, within ten (10) days from the date of this Order, what steps have been taken to comply herewith.

1/ The term "Union" refers to the International Union as the certified representative at the Bettendorf Works, and also to its Local 806 as the certified representative at the Rock Island Plant.

2/ Respondent contends in its brief that the charges upon which the complaint was based were not properly executed in that the declarations to these charges were signed in the firm name of the attorneys representing the charging unions and not by a "person" as specified by Section 102.11 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The declaration in Case No. 13-CA-2200 was signed, "Katz & Friedman," and the declaration in Case No. 13-CA-2297 was signed "Katz & Friedman by Irving M. Friedman." Section 102.1 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Series 6, provides that the term "person" shall have the meaning set forth in Section 2 of the Act. "Person" as defined in the Act includes partnerships and legal representatives. It is clear that the declarations satisfy the requirements of Section 102.11. See, moreover, 68 C. J. S. Sec. 147 as to execution of documents in partnership name.

3/ Otis Elevator Company, 102 NLRB 770, enforced as modified, 208 F.2d 176 (C. A. 2): Taylor Forge and Pipe Works, 113 NLRB 693 enforced 234 F. 2d 227 (C. A. 7), cert. denied 352 U. S. 942. However, we do not agree with the Trial Examiner's statement that Respondent was obliged to maintain its job evaluation sheets in duplicate. Respondent could discharge its obligation to furnish the Union with this wage information in any reasonable manner, including permitting the Union to copy or duplicate the job evaluation records.

5/ F. W. Woolworth Co. 109 NLRB 196, enforced 352 U. S. 938, reversing 235 F. 2d 319 (C. A. 9).

6/ Taylor Forge and Pipe Works, supra. See also Boston Herald-Traveler Corporation, 223 F. 2d 58, 62-63 (C.A.1). enforcing 110 NLRB 2097. In view of our finding that it would not have been unduly burdensome for Respondent to have complied with the Union's request for all relevant wage data at the Bettendorf Works, we will not include in our order the limitation upon Respondent's obligation to furnish wage data recommended by the Trial Examiner in Part IV of his Intermediate Report entitled, "The Remedy".

8/ Boston Herald-Traveler Corporation, supra.

9/ Taylor Forge and Pipe Works, supra.

10/ We do not agree with The Trial Examiner that an unfair labor practice charge might be considered sham and frivolous, although permitted to be withdrawn without prejudice, because no explanation was offered for withdrawal.

11/ In the event that this Order is enforced by a decree of a United States Court of Appeals, there shall be substituted for the words, "PURSUANT TO A DECISION AND ORDER" in the caption the words "PURSUANT TO A DECREE OF THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS, ENFORCING AN ORDER."

J. I. Case Company

In the UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS for the Seventh Circuit

No. 12098 September Term 1957 January Session 1958

J. I. Case Company, Petitioner	)	Petition for Review and Request for Enforcement of an Order of the National Labor Relations Board.
v.	)
National Labor Relations Board, Respondent	)

March 12, 1958

Before DUFFY, Chief Judge, HASTINGS and PARKINSON, Circuit Judges.

HASTINGS, Circuit Judge. The J. I. Case Company petitions this court pursuant to Section 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), as amended, 29 U.S.C.A. Sect. 160(f), to set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board, reported in 118 N.L.R.B. 56, requiring that company to cease and desist from refusing to bargain collectively by declining to furnish the certified bargaining representative of its employees[1] at its Bettendorf and Rock Island plants certain information and wage rate data concerning time studies and job evaluation. The Board, in its answer, has requested enforcement of its order pursuant to Section 10 (e) of the Act.

The collective bargaining agreement in effect at all times material to this petition at the Company's Bettendorf plant was executed on January 27, 1956 and was to continue in force for two years. It was reopenable as to wages on January 30, 1957 upon sixty days written notice. Two sets of wage rates were set up under the contract: Schedule A rates were hourly rates and Schedule B rates were applicable to piece rate or incentive workers. It was provided that the company would establish piece prices by time study or other appropriate methods.

[1] Local 806 of the International Union Automobile & Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL-CIO was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees at the Rock Island plant of the Company in 1946 and has been recognized by the Company as such since that date. At the Company's Bettendorf works, the parent International Union has been, since 1953, the certified bargaining representative of the employees. In this opinion the term "the Union" will be used to refer to whichever bargaining representative is appropriate in the context.

* 13-CA-2200; 2297; 118 NLRB 56

"Classification rates" at ten percent higher than guaranteed minimum piece rates were to be in effect until piece rates were set. Further provision was made for review of a piece price in the event of a significant change in the nature of a job. The contract provided for the usual grievance procedure, specified that "/c/ complaints regarding piecework prices may be handled in accordance with the grievance procedure," and indicated that the agreement should be interpreted as disposing "of any and all issues subject to collective bargaining, except with respect to grievances **."

The Company had furnished the Union a summary of all jobs at the Bettendorf plant including the "vertical turret lathe" job which was indicated to be a single machine operation. After the execution of the bargaining agreement, the Company changed the job to a two machine operation but did not change the rate of pay. The Union made a formal request in writing on March 26, 1956 asking for certain data relevant to the job, including the time studies on the job as a two machine and as a one machine operation and the various criteria the Company used in setting up a job evaluation for the two machine job. The request from the Union suggested "that the information include what weight is given each factor used to arrive at a final decision on the established rate and what factors are considered in making such a decision." The Union stated in this letter that the information was needed before further discussion was possible.

There was no written reply to the Union's formal request, but, at the next regularly scheduled meeting between the Plant Grievance Committee and Company representatives, the superintendent in charge of the department making time studies, made an oral presentation of the time study information on the two machine and one machine jobs, and diagrammed the operation on a blackboard. The Company refused to give the time studies to the Union so that its time study experts could examine them. It also refused to supply the other data requested. The Union indicated its dissatisfaction with the information and some time later submitted a written request, pursuant to terms of the agreement, to negotiate a new rate for the job.

On March 28, 1956, the Union made a further request of the Company for information needed "for purposes of collective bargaining and contract administration ." This request was for "all data and time study information and material used in setting the incentive rates which are currently in effect for all jobs in the UAW Bargaining Unit at the Bettendorf works ," and for "all data, studies, and other information which is used to determine the value of each job currently listed in Schedules A and B ," as well as such data used in determining the respective labor grade for each job. The Company refused to supply this data, stating that since no negotiations were in progress, it was not obligated to do so.

The collective bargaining contract in effect at the Company's Rock Island plant was a two year agreement entered into on January 20, 1955. It was similar to the agreement at the Bettendorf works of the Company. The contract could be reopened after September 1, 1955 by either party, upon thirty days written notice, for negotiations on wage rates. The required written notice had to "set forth specifically the adjustments desired." The agreement contained provision for the usual grievance procedure and wage provisions, including a method for establishing piecework rates and a complete schedule of rates for the various labor classifications.

Some dissatisfaction arose among the Rock Island plant's tractor assembly employees over the failure of the company to announce piece rates. After these rates for the tractor line had been announced pursuant to a company time study, this dissatisfaction continued, and, on March 15, 1956, at a regular grievance meeting between the company representatives and the Bargaining Committee of the Union, the Union requested that the Company make available the time study data for the tractor line jobs. The Union repeated its request in writing on April 5, stating that it needed the time studies requested to "arrive at an answer as to whether there was a legitimate complaint or not." The Company, without explanation, refused to make these time studies available.

Unfair labor practice charges were filed with the Board by the International Union against the Company. The Trial Examiner found violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act in the Company's refusal of the March 15 and March 26 requests but found no violation in the refusal of the broad request made on March 28 for "all data and time study information" for "all jobs" in the bargaining unit at the Bettendorf works because such request was unduly burdensome and because the information so requested exceeded any need by the Union, existing or prospective. The Board, upon the undisputed facts presented, sustained the holding that the refusals to supply the data requested on March 15 and 26 were in violation of the Company's statutory bargaining obligations but found, in addition, that the refusal of the March 28 request was also a violation of the provisions of the Act.

Although the particular circumstances in each case must be considered in determining whether or not the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith has been met (N.L.R.B. v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149, 153 (1956), there are numerous decisions to the effect that a refusal by an employer to supply pertinent and relevant wage data concerning wage rates of the employees is a violation of the obligation to bargain in good faith. N.L.R.B. v. F. W. Woolworth Co., 352 U.S. 938 (1956), reversing 9 Cir., 235 F. 2d 319 (1956); Taylor Forge & Pipe Co. v. N.L.R.B., 7 Cir., 234 F. 2d 227 (1956); cert. den., 352 U.S. 942 (1956); Boston Herald-Traveler Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 1 Cir., 223 F. 2d 58 (1955); N.L.R.B. v. The Item Company, 5 Cir., 220 F. 2d 956 (1955); N.L.R.B. v. Whitin Machine Works, 4 Cir., 217 F. 2d 593 (1954); N.L.R.B. v. Otis Elevator Co., 2 Cir., 208 F. 2d 176 (1953).

The Company contends that, in light of the circumstances in this case, it fulfilled its statutory duty to bargain. It urges that it had no obligation to furnish the desired information because the Union's requests for data were not made in good faith for purposes of collective bargaining; the requested data pertained neither to a pending grievance nor to a request for negotiation under the contract; the production of the data would have been unwarrantedly burdensome since the Company did offer to supply some of the information orally; and, finally, the requested data had not been relied upon by the Company during negotiations with the Union but was used for internal management purposes only.

If, as the Company contends, the Union's requests, in each instance, were not made in good faith for the purpose of collective bargaining, the refusal to supply the data would not have been a violation of the Act. Boston Herald-Traveler Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 1 Cir., 223 F. 2d 58, 63 (1955); Superior Engraving Co. v. N.L.R.B., 7 Cir., 183 F. 2d 783, 794 (1950). The Board has never disputed this but urges that, on the record in this case, the Union's requests were made in good faith. Cf. Utica Observer Dispatch v. N.L.R.B., 2 Cir., 229 F. 2d 575, 577 (1956). In this connection, the Company failed in its attempt to prove a series of groundless requests for data all purportedly part of a general scheme of harrassment by the Union. There was also little to bolster the Company's claim that the Union indulged in the filing of groundless charges with the Board.

Putting aside the matter of the good faith of the Union in previous dealings with the Company, the question of whether the Union's requests in this case were made in good faith turns, as the Board indicates, on a determination of the relevance of the information to the Union's task as the bargaining representative. The Board urges that, in each instance, the data requested was required by the Union in the administration and policing of the collective bargaining agreements in force at the two plants here involved. The Company takes issue with the Board on this latter point and in so doing raises basic questions as to the nature of collective bargaining. The petitioner contends that the statutory duty to bargain in good faith is pegged to the existence of pending wage negotiations without which there is no obligation to bargain. It urges further that under its contracts with the Union all complaints regarding piecework prices must be handled by grievance procedures and that no grievances were filed in the instant situations.

These contentions stem from a basic disagreement between petitioner and the Board as to the proper conception of the Union's role as representative of the employees and of the very nature of the collective bargaining process. The contention that the Union's right to data is limited to pending wage negotiations overlooks the fact that collective bargaining is a continuing process which, "[a]mong other things,  involves day to day adjustments in the contract and other working rules, resolution of new problems not covered by existing agreements, and the protection of employee rights already secured by contract." Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 46 (1957). See also Aeronautical Industrial District Lodge 727 v. Campbell, 337 U.S. 521, 525 (1949). A collective bargaining agreement thus provides "the framework within which the process of collective bargaining may be carried on." Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. N.L.R.B., 1 Cir., 161 F. 2d 949, 955 (1947). The union not only has the duty to negotiate collective bargaining agreements but also the statutory obligation to police and administer the existing agreements. The provision in the Bettendorf contract that the agreement "disposes of any and all issues subject to collective bargaining, except with respect to grievances  " does nothing more than foreclose the Union from bargaining during the life of the contract about matters not covered therein. This clause does not affect the Union's right and duty to administer the contract.

There is no language in the contracts here involved which, under the circumstances, could be considered a waiver of the Union's right to receive the requested information. Cf. International News Service Division of the Hearst Corp. 113 N.L.R.B. 1067, 1070 where the Board held that there must be a clear and unmistakable showing that such a waiver occurred. Further, the Board has indicated that the statutory obligation to furnish data to the bargaining representative "is not satisfied by a substitution of the grievance procedure of the contract for /the employer's/ obligation to furnish the Union with information it needed to perform its statutory function." Hekman Furniture Co., 101 N.L.R.B. 631, 632, enforced, 6 Cir., 207 F. 2d 561 (1951); Leland-Gifford Co., 95 N.L.R.B. 1306, 1322, enforced, 1 Cir., 200 F. 2d 620, 624 (1952).

The Board seeks support for its position in this case in the recent decision by the Supreme Court reversing the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in N.L.R.B. v. F. W. Woolworth Co., 9 Cir., 235 F. 2d 319 (1956), and also in the decision of this court in Taylor Forge & Pipe Co. v. N.L.R.B., 7 Cir., 234 F. 2d 227 (1956). In the Woolworth case, shortly after negotiation and execution of a collective bargaining contract, the Union requested certain wage information including the number of hours worked per week by each employee and also each employee's total pay and rate of pay. This request was ignored by the Company. The Board found this to be a violation of Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act but the Court of Appeals denied the petition for enforcement. The Supreme Court without opinion summarily reversed that court's decision. N.L.R.B. v. Woolworth Co., 352 U.S. 938 (1956).

In many respects there is a close parallel between the Woolworth case and the instant case. The only ground for the request expressly asserted in Woolworth was that the information was needed for "intelligent and equitable administration of the Agreement." N.L.R.B. v. F. W. Woolworth Co., 9 Cir., 235 F. 2d 319, 322 (1956). There was also some reference to complaints by employees giving rise to potential grievances and creating the need for the requested data. Ibid. The position taken by the company in the Woolworth case in refusing the data was in all material aspects identical to that of the petitioner in the instant case. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit after noting the language of the Supreme Court in N.L.R.B. v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956) to the effect that cases involving requests for data must each turn on their peculiar circumstances, proceeded to reject the Board's findings and conclusions as without any rational basis and ruled that the Union must in such cases show more clearly some proof of relevancy of the information requested to its role as bargaining representative.

Although the Supreme Court, in summarily reversing without opinion the Court of Appeals in the Woolworth case, gave little guide for the determination of related cases, its rejection of the Ninth Circuit's decision clearly indicates that more weight must be given the Board's findings on the question of the relevance of the information requested to the Union's statutory obligation to police and administer the agreement.

EFU

The Court of Appeals in the Woolworth case did recognize that the Board was not enunciating a "per se" right to information. Clearly, there is no such right of the Union to information. The Board certainly does not so contend, although, as the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter in N.L.R.B. v. Truitt Mfg. Co., supra, at page 156 indicated, the Board has increasingly tended to approach the "good faith" and disclosure question in an overly mechanical fashion.

The Board likens the circumstances involved in this present case to those in Taylor Forge & Pipe Co. v. N.L.R.B., supra. In that case the Union's request was made during bargaining negotiations and was for data on certain "point ratings" which the Company used in determining each employee's rate of pay. The information was refused. The Board concluded that the requested information was relevant and essential to the parties' bargaining, and the Board's decision was affirmed by this court.

The Company in the instant case attempts to distinguish the Taylor Forge case and several others cited in support of the Board's position on the ground that in each case bargaining negotiations were involved. Because of the continuing nature of the bargaining process this distinction is not controlling. The fact that negotiations are pending may be an important factor in considering the relevance of the requested data to Union bargaining needs, but it is not the sole consideration. The courts have recognized that the information the Unions are entitled to have from management "should not necessarily be limited to that which would be pertinent to a particular existing controversy." N.L.R.B. v. Whitin Machine Works, 4 Cir., 217 F. 2d 593, 594 (1954); cert. den. 349 U.S. 905; specifically approved in N.L.R.B. v. The Item Co., 5 Cir., 220 F. 2d 956, 958 (1955); cert. den. 350 U.S. 905, and in Boston Herald-Traveler Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 1 Cir., 223 F. 2d 58, 62, 63 (1955).

We hold that the Board correctly found that each request by the Union was made in good faith for data directly related to the Union's functions as bargaining representative. The Union was interested in obtaining the time study data on the tractor line jobs at the Rock Island plant to determine whether or not there was any basis for employee complaints as to the piece rate for those jobs and, therefore, whether or not the Union should file or support a grievance with respect to the rates for the jobs. Similarly, the Union had a real interest in any time study or other data the Company relied upon in maintaining the same rate of pay on the turret lathe-vertical job at the Bettendorf plant after changing the job from a one to two machine operation. The Company did not satisfy its obligation by oral presentation of the complicated wage data during the regular meeting with the Plant Grievance Committee.

The much broader request of March 28 was likewise well founded. The time study data, job value information and labor grade data are all important considerations in the Company's wage structure. Taylor Forge & Pipe Co. v. N.L.R.B., supra at 229. In this respect there is no merit in the Company's contention that the data requested was used for internal management purposes only. Also, it is not material whether the Company relied directly on this information in its negotiations with the Union. The Board's order requires only the production of data used in classifying or evaluating jobs or fixing rates of employees. As in the Taylor Forge case only with the requested information available would the Union be able " 'to know whether to press or modify a particular wage demand, whether inequities exist which merit discussion or correction, and whether other elements are present in the wage structure which, though impossible to visualize beforehand, appear to merit discussion once the full picture is available.' " Id. at 230. Finally, as the Board points out, the Union in this case was actually preparing for contract negotiations the following January to which this data would be relevant. The Board thus had sufficient basis for overruling the Trial Examiner's finding that production of the information requested would be unduly burdensome and exceeded any need by the Union, existing or prospective. The facts were undisputed and no special weight attached to the Trial Examiner's conclusions in this respect. F.C.C. v. Allentown Broadcasting Corp., 349 U.S. 358, 364 (1955); N.L.R.B. v. Chauffeurs, Teamsters, Warehousemen & Helpers Local Union No. 135, 7 Cir., 212 F. 2d 216, 217 (1954). As already has been indicated the Union was entitled to this information for bargaining purposes. The fact that this case involved a large company using a complicated wage structure for a large number of employees does not lessen the Union's right to the information. The Union made suggestions for copying the information at its own expense which the Company did not accept. The greatest bulk of the information requested was the time study data. The Company did not even attempt to satisfy the Union request for information as to labor grade and job evaluation data for the some 250 jobs involved, which would not have been overly burdensome. It would seem that, before the hearing, the Company did not actually base its refusal of the Union requests on grounds that they were unduly burdensome. If it had, some arrangement could have possibly been made to lessen such "burden."

The parties have stipulated in this cause that, in the event this court upholds the finding of the Board that petitioners unlawfully withheld data from the bargaining representative of its employees, that the Board's order should nevertheless be amended:

> "  (1) by substituting as Paragraphs 1 (a) (2) and 2 (a) (2) of the Order the following language in lieu of the language now contained in said paragraphs:
> > In any like or related manner interfering with the efforts of the above-named labor organization to bargain collectively on behalf of the employees in the appropriate unit.

and (2) by substituting as the last paragraph of Appendices A and B the following language in lieu of the language now contained in said paragraphs:

> WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with the efforts of the above-named labor organization to bargain collectively on behalf of the employees in the appropriate unit."

The order of the Board is amended pursuant to this stipulation. The petition to review and set aside the Board's order is denied and the Board's request for enforcement of its order as amended by stipulation is granted.

EMPLOYER'S DUTY TO SUPPLY UNION WITH TIME-STUDY, JOB EVALUATION DATA

DEVELOPMENT: Looking on collective bargaining as a continuing process extending beyond the execution of a contract, the U. S. Court of Appeals at Chicago holds that a company violated its Taft-Hartley bargaining duty when it refused to supply time-study and job-evaluation data requested by a union bargaining agent during the terms of existing contracts. The information was not related to any pending grievance or negotiations, but the court finds it relevant to the union's functions of administering the contract and preparing for future negotiations.

The contracts involved ran for two years. They gave the company authority to establish piece prices by time study or other appropriate methods. They also provided for review of a piece price in the event of a significant change in the nature of a job. Complaints regarding piecework prices were subject to the grievance procedure.

The union made three requests for information. The first covered time studies for a particular job at one plant. The second covered all data and time-study information used in setting incentive rates for all jobs in the bargaining unit at this plant. The third covered time-study data for the tractor line jobs at a second plant. The company refused all three requests.

REASONS FOR REFUSAL

The company advanced these reasons in justification of its refusal: (1) The requests were not made in good faith for purposes of collective bargaining; (2) the requested data pertained neither to a pending grievance nor to a request for negotiation under the contract; (3) the production of the data would have been unwarrantedly burdensome, since the company had offered to provide some of the information orally; and (4) the data had not been relied upon by the company during negotiations but were used for internal management purposes only.

By these contentions, the court states, the company raises basic questions as to the nature of collective bargaining and the role of the union as a representative of the employees. The idea that the union's right to information is limited to pending wage negotiations, the court adds, overlooks the fact that collective bargaining is a continuing process involving day-to-day adjustments in the contract and other working rules, resolution of new problems not covered by the agreement, and the protection of employee rights already secured by the contract. The union not only has the duty to negotiate contracts but also a statutory obligation to police and administer existing agreements.

RELEVANCY OF DATA

Viewed in this light, the court reasons, all of the union's requests were made in good faith and were for information directly related to its functions as bargaining representative. The data regarding the specific jobs would permit it to determine whether there was any basis for complaints as to the piece rates for those jobs and whether to file or support grievances with respect to them. The data sought under the broader request applicable to all the jobs in the one plant would aid the union in preparing for negotiation of a new contract. There is no merit, the court adds, in the argument that the information was used for internal management purposes only.

Finally, the court rejects the contention that furnishing the information requested would have placed an unwarranted burden on the company. The fact that the case involves a large company using a complicated wage structure for a large number of employees, the court states, does not lessen the union's right to information. The union made suggestions for copying the information at its own expense, and some arrangement possibly could have been made for easing the claimed burden. The decision affirms that by the NLRB in the case in all respects. (J. I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 41 LRRM 2679).

BACKGROUND: How far an employer must go in furnishing wage data to a union in order to satisfy his Taft-Hartley obligation to bargain in good faith has been a hotly and frequently litigated issue.

EXTENT OF EMPLOYER'S DUTY

According to a long line of decisions under both the Wagner and the Taft-Hartley Acts, an employer may be required to furnish a union, on request, with sufficient data on wage rates, job classifications, and allied matters to permit the union (1) to bargain understandingly, (2) to police the administration of the current contract, and (3) to prepare for coming negotiations. See LRX 66 for a discussion of the cases.

Moreover, there have been decisions upholding the right of a union to obtain such data from an employer without showing exactly why it needs the information. In a leading case decided in 1951, the U. S. Court of Appeals at New York held that the union need not make an initial showing of relevance where the information sought relates to current wages. A showing of relevance is required, the court said, only if the data clearly appear to be irrelevant (NLRB v. Yawman & Erbe, 27 LRRM 2524.)

Then in 1956, the Supreme Court reversed a decision which imposed on the union a duty of showing specific relevance. The decision was by the U. S. Court of Appeals at San Francisco. It held that an employer was not obligated to give to a union, bargaining for a wage increase under an existing contract, information on the wages and hours of the covered employees in the absence of a showing by the union of the relevancy of its request or of a reasonable need for the information to meet a condition. The Supreme Court reversed this decision in a brief per curiam order, stating simply that the NLRB "acted within its allowable discretion in finding that under the circumstances of this case failure to furnish the wage information constituted an unfair labor practice." (NLRB v. F. W. Woolworth Co., 38 LRRM 2362, 39 LRRM 2151).

SPECIFIC DATA REQUIRED

The decisions also have indicated that an employer will not meet his obligation merely by furnishing general wage data; the information must be specific. In a case denied review by the Supreme Court in 1956, for example, the U. S. Court of Appeals at Chicago held that an employer violated his bargaining duty when he refused to give the union representing his employees a breakdown of the point ratings used in evaluating all of the jobs in the plant. The union requested the point ratings for use in negotiating a new contract (Taylor Forge & Pipe Works v. NLRB 38 LRRM 2230, 39 LRRM 2168). The U. S. Court of Appeals previously affirmed an NLRB order requiring an employer to provide employees' names and wage rates in such a way that the union could determine exactly which employee received each rate. The Supreme Court also denied review of this holding (NLRB v. Whitin Machine Works, 35 LRRM 2215, 35 LRRM 2730.)

SIGNIFICANCE: In a 1956 opinion dealing with an employer's obligation to furnish a union with information relating to his ability to pay a requested wage increase, the Supreme Court expressed the general principle that whether the obligation to bargain has been met in these cases should be determined in the light of the particular circumstances of each case (NLRB v. Truitt Manufacturing Co., 38 LRRM 2042).

Thus, despite the language of the Yawman & Erbe opinion and the per curiam reversal in the Woolworth case, a union is not likely to be upheld in requests for information bearing no reasonable relationship to the performance of the union's functions. The information sought in these cases dealt with wages--a topic clearly related to the union's functions. But so-called fishing expeditions or broad requests intended principally to harass the employer will not be sustained. Each case will be judged on its own facts. The opinion in the present J. I. Case Company case indicates how broadly the courts may construe the collective bargaining process, the functions of the union bargaining agent, and the duty of the employer to furnish information needed by the union in the performance of those functions. The requested information need not pertain to a particular grievance or to actual negotiation of a new contract. Since the process of collective bargaining continues during the contract term, the requested information may pertain to all matters relating to the administration and policing of the contract, including whether a basis exists for initiating a grievance and whether a particular demand should be readied for future negotiations.

ECONOMIC REVIEW

PUBLISHED BY AFL-CIO

Vol. 3, No. 6-7 June-July, 1958

In Brief

The vast majority of industries seek areas of growing markets, natural resources and available manpower with the necessary skills—not "right-to-work" laws. The kinds of industry that may be attracted by anti-labor laws are fly-by-night sweatshops and some low-wage, lower priced soft-goods plants that are looking for areas with available unskilled workers. "Right-to-work" laws do not and cannot promote a state's prosperous growth.

"Right-to-Work" Promises—False:

ANTI-LABOR LAWS vs. SOUND ECONOMIC GROWTH

Everyone knows that prosperity goes hand in hand with economic growth. Everyone wants prosperity—for his community, his state, and the nation as a whole.

This normal desire for prosperity has been twisted into a weapon by propagandists for anti-union legislation in the states. Since 1944, eighteen states have adopted laws forbidding labor and management to make union security agreements. Under these misnamed "right-to-work" laws, the union shop, maintenance of membership and other union security provisions are illegal.

Along with other confusing and misleading claims, propagandists for "right-to-work" laws have sought to prove that compulsory open-shop legislation will lead to more prosperous conditions in any state. Such laws, they say, attract new industry and stimulate economic growth.

Common sense economics, however, proves the opposite. Community prosperity, as everyone knows, depends on customers, with money to buy products of flourishing business. Attracting new industry depends on available manpower, on labor skills, on resources—both natural and man-made—on transportation, and on the general living and education standards of people in the area.

Low-wage, anti-union laws cannot create any of these attractions. Instead, such legislation can actually hamper improvements in wages, hours and working conditions by weakening union organization and collective bargaining.

"Right-to-work" laws, it is true, may attract some anti-union low-wage companies in soft-goods industries, such as textile and shoe manufacturing. Such companies look for areas with large numbers of unskilled workers who will work for low wages without union conditions.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Washington, D. C.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1958

(R-576)

N.L.R.B. ANNOUNCES CHANGES IN EXERCISE OF JURISDICTION

The National Labor Relations Board today announced changes in its standards for determining in which cases the Board will exercise its jurisdiction. The current standards were adopted in July 1954.

The new standards take immediate effect, applying both to all cases now pending before the Agency and to all cases which may be filed.

The various elements of the new standards will be set forth in decisions rendered by the Board following October 2, 1958.

The Board's action was taken pursuant to its statement of July 22, 1958, wherein the Board : (1) announced certain proposed changes in its standards; and (2) invited briefs or comments by any interested groups, organizations and persons. At that time the Board said:

"We are taking this action as a consequence of the situation to which the Supreme Court referred in the case of Guss v. Utah Labor Relations Board. Therein the Supreme Court adverted to 'a vast no-man's land, subject to regulation by no agency or court,' and declared; (1) 'Congress is free to change the situation;' and (2) 'The National Labor Relations Board can greatly reduce the area of no-man's land by reasserting its jurisdiction.'

"On Friday (July 18), the Congress voted approval of the Board's appropriation for the fiscal year 1958-1959. The total was $13,100,000, of which $1,500,000 took into allowance the extension of the Board's jurisdiction into some of the area covered by the so-called no-man's land.

"Today, we are announcing this action, so that more individuals, labor organizations and employers may invoke the rights and protections afforded by the statute."

Following are the new standards which revise somewhat the proposals set forth in the July announcement; under each statement appears, in parenthesis, the 1954 standards:

1. Non-Retail: $50,000 outflow or inflow, direct or indirect.[1/]

   (1954 - $50,000 outflow, $500,000 inflow, $100,000 indirect outflow, 1 million indirect inflow.)

2. Office Buildings: Gross revenue of $100,000 of which $25,000 or more is derived from organizations which meet any of the new standards.

   (1954 - Employer who leases or owns and who operates must be otherwise in commerce and utilize building primarily to house its own offices.)

3. Retail concerns: $500,000 gross volume of business.

   (1954 - Direct inflow of $1,000,000, or indirect inflow of $2,000,000 or direct outflow of $100,000.)

4. Instrumentalities links and channels of Interstate Commerce: $50,000 from interstate (or linkage) part of enterprise, or from services performed for employers in commerce.

5. Public Utilities: $250,000 gross volume, or meet standard 1 (non-retail.)

   (1954 - $3,000,000 gross volume.)

1/ Direct outflow refers to goods shipped or services furnished by the employer outside the State. Indirect outflow includes sales within the State to users meeting any standard except solely an indirect inflow or indirect outflow standard. Direct inflow refers to goods or services furnished directly to the employer from outside the State in which the employer is located. Indirect inflow refers to the purchase of goods or services which originated outside the employer's State but which he purchased from a seller within the State. Direct and indirect outflow may be combined and direct and indirect inflow may also be combined to meet the $50,000 requirement. However, outflow and inflow may not be combined.

6. Transit systems:[2/] $250,000 gross volume.

(1954 - $3,000,000 gross volume.)

7. Newspapers and Communication Systems

Radio, television, telegraph and telephone: $100,000 gross volume.

Newspapers: $200,000 gross volume.

(1954 - $500,000 test for newspapers, $200,000 for the others.)

8. National Defense: Substantial impact on national defense.

(1954 - $100,000 in goods or services directly related to national defense, and pursuant to government contract.)

9. Business in the Territories and District of Columbia:

D. C. ——————————Plenary

Territories ——————————Standards apply.

(Same as 1954.)

10. Associations: Regarded as single employer.

(Same as 1954.)

2/ Except taxicabs, as to which the retail ($500,000 gross volume of business) test shall apply.

Situation involving "no-solicitation" rule

Sec. 8(a) (1) of the T-H law says that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain or coerce workers in their right to organize. Specific cases have spelled out what this means in practice.

A common problem for organizers is how to get access to workers and put their message across. The situation described here raises a question of whether the employer is violating Sec. 8(a) (1). To get the basis for an answer, you must:

1 Use the index of the Casebook and write down the case references you think may apply.

2 Set down your answer, with any qualifications you think are necessary. Narrow down the cases to the ones you think are closest to the problem here.

The situation

An organizing campaign has been in progress at the Browntone Company. The organizers had signed up almost half of the employees before the company began taking notice. Then one or two foremen expressed doubts about the value of unions.

When one of the machine operators was found giving out union leaflets to other workers in the shower room, his foreman told him to stop. The foreman cited the company rule against any distribution of literature or solicitation on company property. The rule had been in effect for a long time, but it had never been invoked.

The company itself frequently posts notices, advertisements for local charities and other items of the same nature on its bulletin boards and leaves them at the time clocks. After warning the operator not to give out any leaflets, the company proceeded to distribute at the time clocks a letter to its employees describing the history of good relations between the company and its employees and expressing the hope that these good relations would continue.

Questions

Is the company in violation of Sec. 8(a) (1)?

Cite cases that may apply, and after reading the cases, circle the ones you think are most pertinent to this problem.

Are the rules different for employees than for non-employees?

PAGINATION INCORRECT

The T-H Law weakened the Wagner Act prohibition against employer interference with the so-called "employer free speech" provision in Sec. 8(c). It says that employer statements, oral or written, are no interference if they contain "no threat of reprisal or force" or no "promise of benefit." Again, actual cases must be examined to get specific meaning for these words.

Below are given some employer actions. Using the index, look up cases on each one and give the best answer you can consistent with these interpretations.

What employer does	Is he violating law? Cite case or cases
1 Employer sent letter to all employees saying he believed determination of unit by the Board was illegal and anyway, if the union won, he would refuse to bargain with it and would take the case to the courts.
2 Employer sent series of anti-union letters to employees and then issued a statement with the following assertion: "... in keeping with the company's progressive policy, since January, 1933, management has been working on a formula to make possible the payment of average earnings, rather than base rates for vacations and holidays."
3 Employer wrote in letter to employees that he had right to discontinue existing benefits and would insist upon starting negotiations from scratch if the union won an election.
4 Tell employees that the company prefers the contractual union to the rival union and that the company could not pay the higher wages required by the rival union.

Employer's right of free expression
Work Sheet

The question here is whether the employer has violated the prohibition against employer interference in Sec. 8(a) (1) or whether he is protected by the provisions of the "free speech" Sec. 8(c). Read the statements on data sheets 102 a, b, c, and d, underlining the parts you think are important. Then look up the cases, using the index, and work your way to an answer.

Testimony of Stella Stumpf

Q. Did a man whom I believe is usually referred to as Pa and Joe, did they ever come to you and talk to you about union activity?
A. They told me that I was the head of the union, and I told them no. The leader of the union and I said no.

Q. Did they say anything . . . about whether the union would get into the plant?
A. That it wouldn't.

Q. Did you remember if either of them gestured in any way? Did they move their hand or face in any particular way when they were talking to you?
A. Well, he shook a finger in my face.

Q. What was he saying when he shook a finger in your face?
A. Well, that I was the leader of the Union, and I sure started things, which I didn't.

Q. Did anyone else come to you immediately after that and talk to you?
A. Ed Hollfelder . . . he told me that if it wasn't for him I would have gotten fired a long time ago.

Q. Did he say why you would have been fired?
A. Because I was for the union.

Q. Did he also accuse you of being one of the leaders?
A. Yes, he did.

Q. . . . . did either of them tell you you would get into trouble if the union got in?
A. Well, they said I would lose my job. I would be fired.

Testimony of Draftsman Joseph C. Miller

Q. . . . will you tell us . . . what was said by Mr. Meyer to you when you got to his office on or about March 15, 1954 . . . ?

A. Well, the first thing he brought up was the disagreement we had about the time clock . . . He spoke also briefly about sick leave in general and overtime rates and also about our merit wage increases which I was told would be discontinued if the union was voted into X Company.

Q. Do you recall anything else he said about sick leave?

A. It is a gift that we give to you. Not every place has it. It can be taken away if need be.

Q. Now tell us about the conversation on merit wage increase items?

A. Well, point blank, the first statement he made to me was that if the union was voted in at X Company, merit wage increases would be discontinued. Very point blank he made that statement . . . he explained to me that it was also a gift which could be discontinued.

Testimony of Miller regarding interview by Personnel Manager

A. He just said that the one raise that I had gotten, the men in the shop would have to get two or three wage increases to equal that . . . He just mentioned nonchalantly that they were organized.

Q. Was anything said about the election the following day?

A. He just said that a vote of no would mean that the Company had confidence in you and if you voted yes, that means that you had no confidence in them.

Testimony of George Wyatt

Q. What did he say about the merit increases with respect to the Union?

A. He said that would be out of their hands then. Any raise we got, that he couldn't give us any merit raise any more outside of the general wage negotiations by the union . . . the substance of it was that if we were depending on the union for our regulation pay, that they couldn't give any more merit raises.

A. . . . If we were working under a contract which was agreed to, a negotiated contract, they couldn't give us any more merit increases . . . That is in substance what he said.

Data sheet - text of letter distributed by X - Company

"The law of the land does not require the X Company after an election to negotiate its present benefits into the contract that the union presents. In the case of the National Labor Relations Board vs Nash Finch . . . The Court of Appeals of the United States held that it was not unfair for the employer to tell the employees in advance of an election such benefits voluntarily given in the past would be discontinued. We deem it only fair to tell you that we have this right and that we do not propose to do anything but start from scratch if the Union becomes your bargaining agent, but we will negotiate collectively as required by the law but will not feel bound to voluntarily offer in any contract which the Union may negotiate any benefits which may have heretofore been given."

Employer preference expressed during raid on independent union

The situation

The ABC Union is raiding an independent union. A year ago, ABC filed a petition for the same plant, but at that time the Labor Board dismissed the petition on the ground that the plant had not yet reached its full complement of personnel and accordingly an election would be premature. About one year elapsed, employment increased and became relatively stable and the company recognized an independent union that formed in the plant. The company had a card check made, using an impartial arbitrator. The ABC Union was not around at the time, but now a year later ABC is back and it has filed a petition which is timely.

The election campaign is in full swing. Just recently, the company permitted the incumbent union to hold meetings in the plant and urged its employees to attend. The company also stated in a leaflet that it had developed "harmonious relations" with the independent and preferred to bargain with it. The company stated in a letter to employees that it could sell more products and "would not price itself out of the market by excessive wage costs" which would follow if the petitioning union was voted in.

QUESTIONS:

1 Are any of the following actions, in themselves illegal? Cite cases.

a) The voluntary recognition of the independent union.

b) The meetings on plant premises, with the employer urging attendance.

c) The employer statements in the letter, favoring the incumbent.

2 Assume the independent wins the election. If you wanted to make a case before the NLRB to set aside the election, what points would you make in your argument? Cite cases if you can find any.

Local 14 of the Amalgamated Confectionery Workers (ACW) has been trying unsuccessfully to organize the Sweet Supply House in East Eden, New York. Sweet makes syrups and a lemonade concentrate mix, Sweet-O, which he delivers in his own trucks to groceries in the area. Most of the stores are organized by the retail clerks and the butcher workmen. Sweet also supplies syrups to soft-drink bottlers, some of whom are organized by ACW.

Since everything else has failed, Local 14 decides to try something new. It passes a by-law prohibiting any member from handling or working on non-union goods. The penalty for refusal to live up to the by-law is suspension. An international representative is sent in to get some action on the Sweet campaign.

After reading page 105a, look up the cases in the casebook. Then answer the questions below. Use both the cases and the law to support your answers. Be ready to explain in each case whether or not the union action is legal and why.

The plant committee has been picking up rumors in the shop, apparently circulated by the company, to the effect that all existing benefits will be washed out if United Plastics Workers win the election. The incumbent union, Independent Plastics Workers of North America, is also claiming the same thing. Another rumor is to the effect that the wage comparisons put out in a leaflet by the United Plastics Workers are wrong. The Company has put up on the bulletin board what purports to be a photostatic copy of the actual wage schedule in the plant of the competitor in the plastics field (organized by UPW). These rates are substantially lower than those set forth in the UPW leaflet.

The committee makes two specific requests: (1) That UPW put out another leaflet branding the company figures as false and repeating the wage comparisons already published; (2) That UPW get a guarantee in writing from its legal department stating that no benefits can be lost if the members vote for UPW.

The Committee emphasizes that unless these two things are done, the election which is only one week off cannot be won.

The organizer has already checked the wage figures and finds that there is a complication he did not realize. The wage rates at the other plant are complicated by the presence of rate ranges, which apply in some departments of the plant. Furthermore, there are incentive earnings in some departments of the plant. The leaflet put out earlier had used the high end of the progression system. It had not said anything about incentive earnings, which vary from as little as two percent above the base rate to 15 percent. Earnings depend on standards set by the company.

QUESTIONS:

1 Can the organizer put out a leaflet branding the company wage figures as false and repeating the wage comparisons published earlier? Cite cases.

No: if not false - & don't repeat his wage comparisons if in last 24 hrs. no chance to answer - Normal Ballots Case

2 Is it possible to guarantee that no benefits will be lost if the employees vote out the incumbent union? Make point "threat to withdraw" is illegal & unions history is to matching & improve - but can't guarantee

No

3 Can the employer say that benefits will be lost?

4 If you were the organizer, how would you handle the situation?

(If time permits, have an act between the committee chairman, making the requests described above, and the international representative in charge of the organizing campaign. Discuss the questions afterwards, in the light of the way the organizer responded.)

Summary - Union Unfair Labor Practices

Previous exercises have dealt with prohibited secondary boycott activity and with possible union interference with free elections. The following brief situations describe some types of union activity which might or might not be unfair labor practices. Answer each on the basis of the law and cases, if available.

	Violation? Yes	No	Probably	Reference
1 Union runs a hiring-hall and sends only union men out on jobs.
2 Union pickets an employer who has just signed an agreement with an NLRB-certified union.
3 Union calls strike for recognition and prevents non-striking employees from going to work.
4 Company subcontracts indefinitely a cleaning job. The union strikes, claiming this work belongs to its members.
5 Employer A refuses to recognize the union. They picket employer B, who uses A's products.

Exclusions from law

The exclusions from the definition of "employee" in the T-H Law are listed in Section 2(3). Turn to that section of the law and write below in your own words the six groups excluded.

Sec. 2(3):

1) Agri. Labor

domestic service

employed by parent or spouse independent contractor

subject Rly Lab Act

As we have seen, the law excludes supervisors from its definition of "employee" and therefore from its protection. It also spells out what it means by a supervisor, in Section 2(11). Write out the section below in your own words.

A disputed "supervisory" job is described below. Using cases, list underneath the points that argue for supervisory status and those that argue against.

Jim Smith is called a lead man. He punches in with the other millwrights and uses the same locker facilities, but he is paid on a salary basis with no overtime pay unless his hours exceed a number set by the company. He is responsible to the millwright foreman, who in turn is responsible to the master mechanic. He has six to eight millwrights working under him, not always the same group. He goes to meetings, of supervisors, the last of which was a lecture called "Vitalizing the Foreman's Role in Management." He generally works with his own tools, although he takes maybe 25% of his time to get jobs set up and assign and direct his crew. He is paid more than an "A" Millwright on the basis of a 40-hour week, but some of his crew take home more than he does, counting overtime, call-in pay, etc., which he usually does not get.

The idea of the bargaining unit is as old as bargaining itself, but it has come to have special meaning since the Wagner Act. The law itself says very little about the matter. Give below in your own words what the law says in the sections indicated.

1 Section 9(b) - up to the first "provided".

2 Section 9(b) (2).

3 Section 9(c) (5).

Single versus milti-plant units

Read the data sheet for the ABC Electronics Manufacturing Company and then list below, in separate columns, the facts in the case which tend in favor of a single unit finding and the factors or facts which tend toward a multi-plant unit finding by the Labor Board. Be ready to cite decisions in support of your answers.

In favor of single-plant unit	In favor of multi-plant unit

for use with work sheet 2 03

The ABC Electronics Manufacturing Company has operated two plants in Arson, Wyoming for about five years. Neither plant was organized until three years ago. Then the Company voluntarily recognized the Amalgamated Association of Electronics Specialists for all production and maintenance workers in its Plant A at Arson. This plant has 600 employees and is located two and a half blocks away from Plant B, which has 800 employees at the present time. Employment in Plant B has fluctuated more than employment at Plant A for reasons related entirely to the product and market conditions.

Last year the Company negotiated a new agreement with the AAE, with an anniversary of June 1, 1959. On May 1 of this year the Greater Electronics Workers filed a petition with the Labor Board for Plant B. On April 28 the Company and the AAE had negotiated a supplement to their agreement, extending all provisions in the agreement to the Plant B employees.

At the hearing held by the Labor Board the Company took the position that the existing agreement was a bar to any proceeding. Then the Company developed arguments indicating that the two plants were integrated and must be found a single unit for purposes of collective bargaining.

The record shows:

1 Hiring is done through a central personnel office for the two plants. Employees assigned to Plant A tend to remain there, moving up the lines as they are promoted.

2 In 1956, there were large transfers from the A plant to the B plant, when the Company set up a new Department in the B plant, to which many of its semi-skilled and skilled people in Plant A were promoted. This had never happened before, and it has not happened since.

3 The agreement with the AAE for Plant A provided for departmental seniority in promotions and for company seniority in layoffs. Plant B has not been affected in practice by layoffs at Plant A and vice versa.

4 All personnel records for the two plants are kept in the central personnel office, but they are maintained by department within each of the plants.

5 There are separate time clocks and other personnel facilities in each of the plants.

6 The operations of the two plants are similar, although there is some degree of specialization between the plants. Plant A, which was built during the second World War, made electronic tubes exclusively until a year ago. Plant B has a more diversified line.

Professional, technical, and clerical employees

The law sets forth some special rules for the treatment of professional employees and defines what it means by "professional". In addition, the Board adopted rules for the treatment of technical and clerical employees. Write in your own words what the law says in the sections indicated.

Sec. 9(b)(1)

Board rules on craft severance

One of the most important labor board decisions spelling out its rules on craft severance is the American Potash decision of 1954. Read it in the case book and then write below in your own words what the Board said about each of the subjects listed.

1 True craft.

2 Traditional union.

3 Departmental units.

4 Industry exclusions from craft units.

Listed below are various bargaining unit issues that might arise before the National Labor Relations Board. For each one indicate what the Board would be likely to do and be ready to cite cases in support of your answer. If your answer depends on a contingency which is not clearly defined in the statement, indicate what the contingency is and your alternative answers.

1 Unit requested is: Maintenance Department, including different occupational groups such as machinists, millwrights, pipefitters, painters and various others in a large industrial plant which has never been organized. The occupations noted above are all in the company's Engineering Department under a Maintenance Superitendent, with various foremen for the separate occupations. The petition is filed by a Metal Trades Council.

1a Would it make any difference if another organization had filed the petition, for example, a union normally devoted to production workers in the industry? Would it make any difference if the plant had been organized earlier?

2 Unit requested is: Office, professional and technical employees in large industrial plant already organized by an industrial union. Petition filed by Independent Union of Professional and Related Employees.

3 Unit requested is: Instrument mechanics who work on pressure gauges and hydraulic devices. The plant has been organized on an industrial basis for three years. Petition filed by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Continue with the questions below, following instructions on page 2 10.

4 Unit requested is: Truck drivers who spend about 50 percent of their time loading and unloading at the company loading docks. The drivers spend some time each day inside the warehouse which is attached to the production departments, as part of their loading duties. The company has been organized by another union, for all production and maintenance workers, for two years. The petition is the Teamsters Union.

5 Unit requested is: Machinists and helpers and auto mechanics in a large industrial establishment. Petition filed by International Association of Machinists.

6 DECERTIFICATION proceeding - unit involved is: Shipping clerks and warehouse employees associated with other production and maintenance workers in large industrial plant.

7 Unit requested is: Custodial watchmen who spend a major part of their time doing janitorial work; they are not responsible for trespassers, are not armed. Petition filed by industrial union which bargains for other employees in the plant.

Continue, as on page 2111.

8 DISPUTED CLASSIFICATIONS: Warehousemen, scale house clerk and store room clerks in a plant making crushed limestone, when the issue is the inclusion or exclusion of these employees from a production and maintenance unit.

8a. If the issue were severance of these employees from the larger unit, on petition of the Teamsters' Union, what would the Labor Board decision probably be?

9 Unit requested is: Welders at a fabricating plant, which has been organized for several years. Petition filed by International Brotherhood of Boilermakers.

10 Unit requested is: Oilers in a new industrial plant, unorganized. Petition filed by Firemen and Oilers.

11 Unit requested is: Patternmakers in a metal-working plant which has been organized for many years. Petition filed by Patternmakers League.

12 Unit requested is: Powerhouse employees in a plant that has been organized for 30 years. Petition filed by Firemen and Oilers.

Continue, as on page 2 12.

13 Unit requested is: Circulation department employees of a newspaper, including clerical employees. Also employees who distribute papers to and collect from "honor boxes".

14 Unit requested is: Insurance agents whom company calls independent contractors. They set their own hours and have no fixed territory. They hire and pay their own clerical help at times. The company can inspect their books and investigate complaints. They are paid by a commission schedule with bonuses, with no minimum guarantee or drawing account.

15 Unit requested is: A group of previously unrepresented laboratory employees in a paper mill. The production and maintenance union wishes to add them to the large unit.

15a. What would the Board do if a union of technical employees sought to represent these employees in competition with the production and maintenance union?

16 Unit requested is: Production and maintenance workers of an aircraft instrument plant, including a separate planning department which keeps data on parts and materials used, advises purchasing department on procurement, and coordinates production.

Labor Board cases and intra-union dispute machinery

Union A had an agreement at a large plant with its anniversay on July 1, 1956. Sometime in May rumors began to circulate that Union B was planning to file a petition for one department in the plant. One June 1, while negotiations were in progress, Union B filed its petition. Union A immediately protested to the headquarters of the AFL-CIO that this petition was a violation of the No-Raid Pact. Union A also communicated this fact to the Board Regional Office.

Meanwhile meetings were held at the AFL-CIO, with representatives of both unions present. A settlement was reached, and Union B agreed to withdraw. However, when this decision was communicated to the local union of Union B, which had initiated the raid, the local refused to withdraw.

The headquarters of Union B wired the Regional Director to dismiss the proceedings on the ground that the issue was being handled under the disputes machinery of the unions.

What action will the Regional Director take? Cite cases.

Employer refusal to meet with union representative

After reading Data Sheet 3 01 a, answer the following questions, using your CASE BOOK.

1 Do you think the employer was within his legal right in refusing to deal with Joe Clark in this situation? Why, or why not?

2 Make a record from the Index of your CASE BOOK of the references you think have a bearing on this problem:

3 After reading in the CASE BOOK, do you still hold to the same answer you set down in (1) above? Explain.

4 From the cases list specific conditions or circumstances in which an employer might refuse to deal with a particular representative.

DATA SHEET - Employer refusal to meet with union representative
for use with work sheet

The I. Stone Company has recently been organized by the ATT Union -- the contract was signed last month. The organizing drive had gone on for 3 years. Although free from violence, it was full of bitterness on both sides.

During the past month twenty grievances had been filed. One has now reached the third stage -- Tony Methenson, the Industrial Relations Manager. The contract states that a man must be given two disciplinary warnings before he is fired. Jack B., who has been with the company for eleven years, had received one official warning for beingdrunk on the job, then appeared the next day obviously under the influence of liquor and passing a flask. The foreman fired him. The Union contends that this firing is in violation of the contract and demands his job back. The Company argues that he had been drunk for a week and that he had had verbal warnings, though unrecorded.

The Chairman of the Grievance Committee and the International Representative have gone into the office of the Industrial Relations Manager to take up the case. The Grievance Committee Chairman has explained his case and said, "I'm sure we both want to stick to our contract."

The Manager listens impatiently, interrupting when possible to state the Company position on drinking, its effect on safety and morale and then states that he refuses to discuss this case as the International Representative is not a legal representative of the Union. "By what right are you here?"

After discussion, during which the Grievance Chairman lets the International Representative carry the ball on explanations, the Manager pulls out the contract and reads:

> "Grievances shall be handled by union designated grievance men who shall represent aggrieved employees."

The Manager announces triumphantly, "You have not been designated by the employees. You aren't even an employee of mine. I don't have to deal with you."

Disputes and unfair labor practices

Ever since 1937 when the National Labor Relations Act was declared constitutional, discussions of "unfair labor practices" have occurred among union members. Much confusion surrounds this subject. Not everything that is "unfair" or "discriminatory" is an unfair labor practice in the limited meaning of the law. The following cases and questions are designed to distinguish between unfair labor practices under the law and company practices which must be dealt with by the union in other ways. Use the CASE BOOK for reference purposes.

2 John Doe was seen at a local store one evening during his work shift, by his foreman. On his return to the plant, he was fired. He had been reprimanded previously for "sloppy work and for using the women's room for shaving." John went to his steward and explained that he had forgotten his lunch and had gone to buy one. He said he felt he had the right to leave the mill for a few minutes since others did it all the time. The steward agreed and said the company was guilty of unfair labor practice. Do you agree? What would you do to get redress on this case?

4 The Fox River Textile Company is having extensive repair work done on its mill. It decided to employ an outside contractor to do the work, but when the building trades men came onto the job, the millwrights and other mechanics in the plant were angry. They saw the outside men doing many kinds of jobs that they themselves had been doing over the years, sometimes at overtime rates. The maintenance men think that the company is guilty of unfair labor practice. Are they right?

5 The Roundabout Chemical Company has several plants in different parts of the country. Each plant is under a separate agreement, with a different anniversary date. Each time the union negotiates with the Company for one of the plants the union has a hard time. The Company usually wants to give less than the pattern in the area, although the Company is a very profitable one, with good equipment, good sales and generally good prospects. But when the local union attempts to put pressure on the Company, just to get standard conditions, the plant manager laughs and says "Go ahead, shut her down." A few times the union has taken strike action, but more than once the union has been forced to let the men return to work, without the standard conditions. The Company transfers work from one plant to another and satisfies its customers that way. The union decides that it will try to get all the plants under one agreement, but the Company refuses. QUESTIONS: Is the Company guilty of an unfair labor practice? What can the union do to accomplish its objective?

6 The Praline Mill management decided it wanted to change from a 40-hour week to a 48-hour week. The manager discussed the problem with the union, but they couldn't come to an agreement about the new schedule. The manager wanted all employees to go on the new six-day schedule. Finally, the company told the union it would put its own schedule into effect if they couldn't reach agreement. The contract says that eight hours shall constitute a normal work day and that 40 hours shall constitute a normal work week. The union charged the company with unfair labor practice. Is the union right?

7 The Klamath Falls Newsprint Company has had a pension plan in effect for many years. It was put into operation by the Company, without union participation. In recent years the Company's employees have learned about the provisions of other pension plans and feel that they are not getting a fair break on theirs. In their negotiations they raise some questions about the plan with the Company, but the Company negotiators express regret, but say that they are not empowered to discuss this subject since there is a Board of Trustees which has all the authority on this matter. The Board of Trustees is made up of Company executives. The negotiators stubbornly refuse to do anything. They listen to the complaints about the pension plan and offer to transmit these to the Board of Trustees, but that is as far as they say they can go. QUESTION: Is the Company guilty of unfair labor practice?

8 An employer refused to negotiate a clause for paying his employees while they handle grievances, as representatives of the union. He argued that the Labor Management Relations Act prohibits such payments. Is he right? Could he be charged with unfair labor practice for refusing to put such a clause in the agreement?

The union and company are negotiating a new agreement. They have settled everything except wages, after some bitter arguments. The union is asking 10 cents across the board, the prevailing settlement in the industry. The company says it cannot grant this and still meet its tough competition.

Several times the company representative, who is Vice President of Personnel, and the local chairman have tangled. The personnel man has risen fast in management ranks, coming off the production line, and prides himself in his hard-headed knowledge of the business. The man he succeeded six months ago was easy-going and never got technical with the union, but this fellow is a stickler for the contract and is always waving it at the union. Already he and the local chairman have had several chewing matches. Each time the international representative has stepped in and kept matters from geting out of hand.

The local chairman feels his prestige is at stake here unless he can come up to the industry settlement. He makes a strong pitch for the 10 cents, after which the personnel man says:

"That is the kind of irresponsible talk you might expect from a guy in the shop who doesn't understand how you have to operate a business. Now you international men get around more and see things from a broader point of view. Why don't you straighten these fellows out?"

Before the international rep can answer, the local chairman blows his top and delivers some choice language. He ends up with: "You're so ignorant yourself it's a wonder you aren't pushing a broom somewhere."

The vice-president says that the chairman must apologize immediately or he will be fired for insubordination.

QUESTIONS:

1 If you were the international representative, what would you say or do at this point?

2 Could the Company carry out its threat to discharge the chairman? Cite cases.

3 Could the company refuse to meet the union committee as long as the local chairman was present? Cite cases.

1 An agreement with an anniversary date of June 1 has no clause prohibiting strikes or lockouts, although there is a limited kind of arbitration clause in the agreement. A number of issues are specifically exempt from the arbitration procedure. The union gave a 60-day notice of desire to change the agreement and then the 30-day notice to the Mediation Service, as required by law. But negotiations had not produced new terms of agreement by June 1. At that time the union and company signed an extension agreement reading, "This agreement will remain in full force and effect until July 1." On June 15 the union became convinced it was useless to talk further. Strike action was taken, and on June 18 the men were out on strike. The company charges this action is a violation of the extended agreement. Is the strike legal, or not? Explain.

2 A company and union have agreements covering three different plants organized at different times. The agreement at Plant A has its anniversary date on June 1, the agreement at the other two Plants (B and C) have anniversary dates one month later. The union is determined in view of difficulties it has been having with the company to put all three plants under one agreement. The company has different ideas. This year the union has begun negotiating at Plant A early in May, but by June 1 no agreement has been reached on anything. The anniversary passes, and still no agreement has been reached. By now it is time to negotiate at the other two plants. The union brings its committees from the three plants together and attempts to discuss a single agreement for the three plants with the company. At first the company is unwilling even to talk to the joint committees, but finally does so. By July 1 there is still no agreement on the issue of one agreement for the three plants. The local unions take strike action and on July 3 they are all out. Is the strike legal? Assume that proper notices were given.

3 An agreement contains the following clauses:

"This agreement will remain in full force and effect until June 1, 1958, and from year to year thereafter unless either party gives 60-days' notice prior to June 1 of intention to negotiate changes.

"This agreement may be reopened for wages only upon 60-day notice in writing prior to June 1, 1957."

The Union used the wage reopener in 1957 and failing to reach an agreement, called a strike on June 4. The agreement did not contain a no-strike clause. Is the strike legal, or not? Explain.

4 Would the answer to situation 3 be different if the agreement contained the following provision:

"There shall be no strikes or lockouts during the life of this agreement."

5 An agreement with an anniversary date of June 1 has a standard grievance and arbitration clause. The term of the agreement is as follows:

"This agreement shall remain in full force and effect until June 1, 1957, and from year to year thereafter unless either party gives 60-days' notice in writing of intention to negotiate changes."

When the company discharged a union officer for theft, the local union held a special meeting, following which the department in which the discharged officer had worked did not return to their machines. The company has heard through its grapevine that the local meeting took official action to strike this department. Is the union action legal?

Economic and Unfair Labor Practice Strikes

The Labor Board makes a distinction between an "economic" strike and an "unfair labor practice" strike. Look up cases under these headings and then answer the questions below.

Union action	Which is it? Economic	Unfair Labor Practice
1 A strike at the end of a contract for a wage increase.	____	____
2 A strike during the contract because the employer discriminated against union officers for union activity.	____	____
3 A strike for recognition.	____	____
4 A strike at the end of a contract for a wage increase. The employer refuses to meet further with the negotiating committee until the strike is called off.	____	____

What difference does it make if a strike is classified as "economic" or as "unfair labor practice"?

What are the special hazards involved in "unfair labor practice" strikes?

Questionnaire - enforcement of union shop

1 The Boston Company entered into a union shop agreement on January 1 providing "all employees must join and maintain membership in good standing." Fred Turf, an employee for 15 years refused to join because his religious beliefs and principles forbade him joining or supporting any organization other than his Church. The Union asked for his discharge. The Company reluctantly complied. Was his discharge legal under Taft-Hartley?

2 A union shop agreement was in effect at a paper box factory in the midwest. All new workers were required to join the union within two weeks after employment by paying initiation fees and being initiated into the union by the officers at a union meeting. Phil Block paid his initiation fee and signed a checkoff authorization on the day he was hired but refused to attend the initiation ritual. Therefore the union claimed he was not a member of the union.

a) Could he be discharged?

b) What power did the union hold in this case?

3 The Credit Bldg Company, operating under a union shop agreement, employed Stu Kazlinski who was continually delinquent in payment of his union dues. After six months, the union imposed a fine on him and said they would not accept any further dues payments until the fine was paid. He tried to pay his dues several times, but the union continued to refuse to accept them. He continued to refuse to pay the fine. A month later, the Company informed him that the union was willing to accept his dues and if he paid them, he could retain his job. He did not offer to pay and was discharged.

a) What right did the union have in refusing his dues?

b) Was the Company right in discharging him? Why, or why not?

4 Martin Lavender was in arrears in his dues payments. Under the union constitution, a member had 90 days in which to pay his dues. Lavender's 90 days were up January 1. The union requested his dismissal under the union shop clause on January 2. On January 3 he sent in his dues, but on January 4 he was fired. Was his dismissal legal?

The National Labor Relations Act and decisions of the Board have gone far to limit, restrict and define "collective bargaining." Some of these effects are covered in the questions below, all to be answered "yes" or "no." The issue is whether or not the employer is obligated by the law to take whatever action is indicated. Be ready to cite cases in support of your answer and also to express your opinion as to the desirability or undesirability of the Board's interpretation of the law on each issue. What are the effects upon the union in each case - good or not so good?

Must an employer under the law:	Yes or No
1 Bargain with the union at one time for all his five plants, which are under separate agreements?
2 Make specific counterproposals or concessions to the union?
3 Hold off making wage increases effective until the union involved has accepted them?
4 Bargain with the union over subcontracting of work if there is no mention of it in the agreement?
5 Recognize a union in the absence of an NLRB election?
6 Sign an agreement with a union containing a provision that he will not handle "hot cargo."
7 Recognize the steward in the first step of the grievance procedure?
8 Grant superseniority for union officials?
9 Submit a matter to arbitration if he thinks it is not a proper subject for arbitration. The contract has a standard arbitration clause?
10 Bargain over the work load of individual employees?

Supreme Court's Steel Strike Decision Dims Hopes for Taft-Hartley Revision

By Julius Duscha

SENATOR George A. Smathers (D.-Fla.) and some other Congressmen are still talking about rewriting the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, but the Supreme Court decision upholding the steel strike injunction seems to have effectively nullified any proposals to change the nation's basic labor law. Even if the steel dispute is not settled by the time the second session of the 86th Congress convenes on January 6, it is unlikely that a majority could be mustered on Capitol Hill in the coming Presidential election year for any proposal even to tinker with the Taft-Hartley Act.

Congressmen now have a relatively safe judicial standard to which they can repair as they ride out 1960. If the Court's decision had not been so one-sided—with only Justice William O. Douglas dissenting, and even then not on the constitutionality issue—they might be more disposed to giving serious consideration to the manifestly unfair workings of the injunction. Unfortunately for the labor movement, Justice Douglas carries little weight on Capitol Hill.

But disappointing as the decision may be to labor in particular and to liberals in general, it does put a solid judicial foundation under several controversial aspects of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Court clearly stated that the national emergency provisions of the law are constitutional, even though they may at times result in inequities to the employes or employers involved in a dispute:

"Congress was not concerned with the merits of the parties' positions on the conduct of their negotiations.

"Its basic purpose seems to have been to see that vital production should be resumed or continued for a time while further efforts were made to settle the dispute."

In upholding the right of Congress to provide for the issuance of an injunction to halt a strike, the Court said that Congress set out adequate procedural safeguards and limitations on the injunctive power. The Court noted the requirements for a public report by a fact-finding board, the vast political and executive responsibilities of the President, the provisions for continued bargaining during the first 60 days of the injunction, and the limitation of the injunction to 80 days.

Turning to the words "national health or safety," in Section 208 of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Court passed over the question of what constitutes a peril to the "national health" and then went on to give in effect a rather broad interpretation of what constitutes a threat to the nation's safety. Arthur J. Goldberg, counsel for the Steelworkers Union, had argued that both the words "health" and "safety" ought to be narrowly construed. In his dissent, Douglas cited with a good deal of persuasion the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act in the Senate in support of Goldberg's thesis.

However, the majority said: "The statute was designed to provide a public remedy in times of emergency; we cannot construe it to require that the United States either formulate a reorganization of the affected industry to satisfy its defense needs without the complete reopening of closed facilities, or demonstrate in court the unfeasibility of such a reorganization."

Douglas argued that the District Court should have tried to find out what steel plants needed to be reopened to remove the strike's threat to the nation: "I would remand the case to the District Court for particularized findings as to how the steel strike imperils the 'national health' and what plants need to be reopened to produce the small quantities of steel now needed for the national 'safety.' There would also be open for inquiry and findings any questions pertaining to 'national health' in the narrow sense in which the act uses those words."

The other eight Justices did not really resolve the narrow-vs.-broad interpretation of the words "health" and "safety," but the majority certainly leaned noticeably in the direction of a broad interpretation. Anyone who would now argue before the Court for a narrow construction of these two key words would probably find even less sympathy for his thesis than Goldberg did.

As for Goldberg's argument that the emergency provisions of Taft-Hartley require the courts to carry out executive functions which the Constitution prohibits them from exercising, the Court replied: "We conclude that the statute entrusts the courts only with the determination of a 'case or controversy' on which the judicial power can operate, not containing any element capable of only legislative or executive determination."

Thus, the findings of the eight-man majority were brief but for the most part quite clear. One does not have to agree with the majority opinion to recognize that the Taft-Hartley Act has been clarified to a considerable degree by the steel strike which it has failed so far to settle.

In his dissenting opinion, Justice Douglas devotes most of his argument to narrowly delimiting the "national health and safety" phrase. He also argues that if the steel strike was indeed imperiling the national safety, it was not necessary to force all 500,000 steelworkers back to work when only a handful of them is needed to produce the steel required by the defense program.

Here, however, a question as philosophical as it is practical arises. Could the courts, as the majority opinion notes, be expected to reorganize, even temporarily, the steel industry, to meet defense needs in a time of an emergency caused by a labor-management impasse? A court hardly seems to be the best instrument for making such an essentially economic and executive finding.

The bitterness with which the steelworkers greeted the Supreme Court decision is understandable. Many strikers believed that their walkout was beginning at last to apply the economic pressures on the industry which would have led to a settlement of the dispute if the Government had not intervened. But once the machinery of the Taft-Hartley Act was set into motion by President Eisenhower, the pressure on the industry for a settlement was markedly eased. The industry had everything to gain and little to lose by waiting out the judicial proceedings. As expected, the courts found for the Government—and in this case, the industry.

The injunction vividly etches upon the record the inherent unfairness to one side or the other in the use of such proceedings in a labor dispute. Here, then, is a further persuasive argument for flexible procedures to replace the rigid restrictions of the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

But what sort of flexible procedures should be substituted for the 80-day injunction? There is still considerably less unanimity about how the Taft-Hartley Act ought to be amended than there was on the Supreme Court when the Justices were confronted with the steel case.

Persons in Washington who are knowledgeable about labor-management relations are thinking more and more about bringing in the Government much earlier in labor disputes such as the steel strike which can quickly have a harmful effect on the national economy. The problem which concerns everyone, and which no one has yet solved, is how to use Government action without having Federal arbitration become a highly doubtful and dangerous substitute for free collective bargaining.

The Railway Labor Act is a distressing example of what too much Government interference can do. The Government long ago decided that strikes cannot be tolerated in as vital a segment of transportation as the railroads still represent. Yet the price which has been paid by both the railroad unions and the railroads is the loss of any genuine collective bargaining to fact-finding boards.

Senator Smathers' proposal for a Supreme Court of Labor-Management Relations, with the power to enforce its decisions, represents an extreme position that is unlikely to find any supporters among either labor or management. Yet compulsory arbitration may be the ultimate result if a solution which preserves most of the present prerogatives of collective bargaining is not worked out by Congress.

Somehow, a plan must be devised which gives the public interest greater representation at the bargaining table in such industries as steel, where the decisions that both labor and management make have far-reaching effects throughout the nation's economy. This would seem to be an ideal project for a group like the Joint Congressional Committee on the Economic Report, and for the Banking and Currency Committees in both the Senate and the House.

The election-year atmosphere of 1960 may not be conducive to thoughtful discussion of economic legislation. Nevertheless, the second guessing on the steel strike, now a popular Washington indoor sport, ought to lead to more than economic politicking in the second session of the 86th Congress which convenes just 20 days before the steel injunction runs out.

SHOULD UNIONS BE MADE SUBJECT TO THE ANTI-TRUST LAWS?

By EMANUEL CELLER
Congressman from New York;
Chairman, House Judiciary Committee

This article by Congressman Celler is in response to an address by E. J. Hanley, president of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corporation, which was printed in U.S. News & World Report on August 10. The Celler article also appeared originally in that magazine.

DOES our national policy to encourage collective bargaining mistakenly discriminate against corporate management and coddle labor? Should labor unions be made subject to the federal anti-trust laws?

Proposals to repeal the Clayton Act's exemption of labor unions from the anti-trust laws recur with especial persistence in times of public debate over the labor issue. During the recent Congressional consideration of controversial labor legislation, we were again bombarded with the proposition that the anti-monopoly laws ought to treat associations of workingmen identically with business combinations.

A recent expression of this viewpoint is the address of E. J. Hanley, president of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corporation, before the Iron and Steel Institute, as printed in U.S. News & World Report for August 10, 1959, urging that the public be educated to bring pressure on Congress "to do the obvious thing * * * by applying to monopoly unionism the restrictions of the anti-trust laws."

There is no immediate prospect for the adoption of this expedient, but its repeated public advocacy is a favorite weapon of those who desire drastic reduction of organized labor's strength.

I am convinced that the proposal to subject unions to the anti-trust laws reflects, at best, a naive misconception of the nature of the monopoly problem on the one hand and of collective bargaining on the other. At worst, I fear, it exploits a superficially plausible but factually untenable analogy between human labor and the commodities of commerce, for the purpose of depriving working people of their right to bargain collectively.

In either event the proposal raises a false issue and beclouds and embitters the search for solutions of the labor problem. Although Congress has since enacted a labor bill which at least avoids the extremity of Mr. Hanley's proposal, this provocative proposition requires a thorough airing.

Only if the objectives of our anti-trust policy and the nature and purpose of labor unions are understood will the epithet "monopoly unionism" fall into its proper place, clearing the way for constructive solutions of public issues affecting labor.

FREE enterprise competition has always been the foundation of American economic policy. Underlying this policy is the premise that competition is the best regulating force in a free economy; that monopoly control of a commodity in any particular market is undesirable because it enables the monopolist to raise prices and to profit unjustifiably from the needs of consumers.

In the United States, the Nineteenth Century gave rise to an unbridled tendency toward monopolization and restrictive practices. Industrial giants absorbed enterprise after enterprise into ever greater and fewer combinations, ruthlessly trampling out resistance. When the people became aroused by this threat to the survival of competition, Congress responded by enacting the Sherman Act of 1890, which proscribes monopolization and combinations in restraint of trade.

Such was the impetus of the drive toward concentration, however, that further legislation was found necessary, and in 1914 Congress enacted the supplementing amendments of the Clayton Act. Together, these two statutes express the fundamental national concern that free enterprise competition shall be preserved.

Because some courts had applied the Sherman Act to labor unions, Congress in the Clayton Act clearly provided that "the labor of a human being is not a commodity of commerce." It is this straightforward recognition of the difference between human labor and goods in commerce whose proposed repeal, after half a century, is the subject of the present article.

It may be noted that there are also other aspects of industrial activity in which, for special reasons, Congress had determined that unfettered competition is not in the public interest.

Thus, farm cooperatives, which do millions of dollars of business annually, enjoy anti-trust exemption, and the nation's railroads, truck lines, air lines, water carriers, pipelines and communications carriers are all exempted from the anti-trust laws exchange for submission to the supervision of federal regulatory agencies.

With a few exceptions, however, it is an axiom of our system that competition must be preserved and that monopolies, which suppress or destroy competition, are contrary to the public interest.

As long as workers have labored in factories, they have banded together in an effort to obtain better wages and working conditions from their employers. Individually, the workers were helpless to bargain for a wage. Their choice was to take what was offered or go without. Acting in concert, they were better able to bargaining because they were in the position more effectively to withhold their labor. For what is known as collective bargaining, in its nature, implies the right to strike if an impasse is reached.

By the beginning of the present century, the phenomenal growth of large corporations had so far diminished the bargaining power of individual workers that unionization became virtually indispensable. In 1920 Chief Justice Taft, who was never a radical in labor law, stated:

Labor unions "were organized out of the necessities of the situation."

"A single employe was helpless in dealing with an employer. He was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and his family. If the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment. Union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on equality with their employer." (In American Steel Foundries versus Tri-City Central Trade Council, 257 U.S. 184, 209.)

Since one of the basic purposes of a labor union is to eliminate competition among the employes in a labor market, a literal application of the anti-trust laws to labor would require the dissolution of even the smallest union. For members of every union agree not to compete for jobs by undercutting each other's wages, and every strike or picket line seeks to eliminate the employer's alternate supply of labor. Thus, if human labor were to be equated with a commodity of commerce, all unions and virtually all the practices they engage in would become illegal.

Proposals to apply the anti-trust laws to labor overlook or ignore this contradiction, even when their authors disavow any purpose to destroy unions or collective bargaining as such. For example, Mr. Hanley in his speech, as printed in U.S. News & World Report, declares:

"Of course, labor had always been specifically exempted from the anti-trust laws—and why not? Labor, after all, is merely the organization of individuals. Individuals, the theory goes, have to be banded together to give some balance of power when dealing with businesses having so much influence on their destiny. And I don't believe that anyone would argue with that theoretical objective." (Emphasis supplied.)

Yet this very speech closes with an eloquent appeal to induce Congress to apply the restrictions of the anti-trust laws to what he calls "monopoly unionism"!

The contradictory character of these two positions should be self-evident. If human labor is to be equated with an article of commerce, all unions must be dissolved, for they exist for the purpose of eliminating wage competition among workingmen. If, on the other hand, the distinction between human labor and commodities of commerce merits continued legislative recognition, then all unions, regardless of size, strength and effectiveness, should be permitted to organize, bargain and resort to economic sanctions, within the ground rules laid down by Congress in the public interest.

CONGRESSMAN CELLER

Presumably the object of subjecting labor unions to the anti-trust laws would be to restore competition to the labor market. This means direct competition between workers for jobs. But the labor market is so different from the commodity market that it would be folly to apply the same rules to both.

In the first place, what the worker sells is not property; it is a part of his physical self. The value of his labor, if withheld, can never be recovered. He cannot store it or ship it in the manner of goods, but must exercise or lose it.

Second, in his effort to secure fair wages, the individual worker is always confronted by a combination. To quote Adam Smith in his classic, "The Wealth of Nations":

"Masters are always and everywhere in a sort of tacit, but constant and uniform, combination not to raise the wages of labor above their actual rate. * * *"

Third, individual workers are forced to compete with each other for wages to an extent far exceeding the competition of employers for labor. They lack either the knowledge or the mobility to move their homes and families to places where wages are higher.

It is also misleading to compare labor unions to business monopolies. Unions do not have the control over the labor of their members that is enjoyed by owners over the goods they sell. No more than their individual members can unions store or ship that labor. Nor are they in a position to make unrestricted delivery of it. This imperfect control, compared to the control exercised by sellers over their goods, sharply limits the power of unions. They are not truly sellers but brokers of labor —a perishable, variable and relatively immobile product.

Finally, whether organized or unorganized, the workers lack financial reserves comparable to those available to employers of labor. To treat trade unions as monopolies and to prohibit their activities as restraints of trade would thus fly in the face of the industrial realities.

It is hardly surprising that our national policy touching labor relations has long distinguished between labor unions and business monopolies and has consistently encouraged employes' self-organization and collective bargaining. The history of this policy may be briefly traced.

Courts once regarded labor unions as criminal conspiracies in restraint of trade. But this repressive view gradually gave way to the more realistic formulation that unionization was not in itself illegal and that concerted activities of workers were permissible if they sought lawful objectives—such as higher wages—by lawful means.

As Justice Stone has put it:

"A combination of employes necessarily restrains competition among themselves in the sale of their services to the employer; yet such a combination was not considered an illegal restraint of trade at common law when the Sherman Act was adopted, either because it was not thought to be unreasonable or because it was not deemed a 'restraint of trade.'" (In Apex Hosiery Company versus Leader, 1940, 310 U.S. 469.)

Nevertheless, prior to 1914, the courts often misused their injunctive power and applied the Sherman Act to various types of labor disputes, so that, when the Clayton Act was considered in 1914, unions succeeded in persuading Congress to enact the famous Section 6 which states specifically that:

"The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the anti-trust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor * * * organizations, * * * or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the anti-trust laws."

NOTWITHSTANDING the clear-cut provisions of the Clayton Act, the judiciary's continuing abuse of the injunction power finally led to the adoption of the Norris-LaGuardia Act in 1932. This statute was designed to protect union activity from government by injunction, and contains an eloquent appraisal of the need for collective bargaining which recognizes that "* * * the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor. * * *"

In the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, Congress reiterated its commitment to collective bargaining, prohibiting a number of employer practices vis-à-vis employe self-organization as "unfair." Twelve years later, in the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, Congress prohibited certain unfair labor practices on the part of labor unions—such as secondary boycotts. The fundamental commitment to collective bargaining, however, was reenacted without change. It remains unchanged under the Labor Act of 1959.

To summarize: Since 1914 it has been the consensus that a healthy democratic society must place its faith in collective bargaining for the settlement of labor disputes. To this end, the anti-monopoly laws have been held inapplicable to unions acting in the interest of their members. Undesirable practices by unions have been prohibited, not by the anti-trust laws, but by the special statutes regulating labor relations.

WHAT are the arguments by which proponents of the subjection of labor unions to the anti-trust laws would justify turning back the clock to the days of open-shop, sweatshop, yellow-dog-contract labor relations? In sum, they are that:

1. Government unduly or unfairly favors labor over other segments of the economy;
2. Some unions are "too big";
3. Some labor personalities and unions have been guilty of transgressions; and,
4. Organized labor is responsible for "wage-push inflation."

The attempt to present labor as a unique beneficiary of government assistance is most unpersuasive, since Congress has exempted several other aspects of industrial activity from the impact of the anti-trust laws. Virtually the entire transportation, communications and power industries are in this category. So are farm cooperatives.

Moreover, the equalization of bargaining power through the guarantee of collective bargaining rights hardly compares to the heavy subsidies which the federal government affords a number of industries. Consider the subsidies to agriculture and the shipping industry, and the public supports to the oil and other extractive industries in the form of percentage depletion allowances for tax purposes. In contrast, the Labor Relations Act merely protects individual workers in their right to bargain collectively.

Furthermore, the cry of "bigness" sounds strangely from that quarter which has contended, in the area of anti-trust enforcement, that bigness alone does not warrant federal interference. In the labor area, the argument runs that industry-wide or area-wide or pattern collective bargaining somehow becomes monopolistic.

The fact is that collective bargaining relationships between local unions and employers have taken varying forms in response to the special economic problems and traditional practices of different trades and industries. Multi-employer bargaining has not been the sole creation of unions but, rather, a response by both union and management to the exigencies of the situation.

Moreover, there is no substance in the charge that labor viewed as a whole exercises too great economic power vis-à-vis the employers. Looking at the total picture, the greater strength is still predominantly on the side of the employers. Only a minority of all wage-earners are organized—18,500,000 as of 1956, or one out of four—and many of them are organized in unions which cannot begin to match the economic power of the employers.

With respect to the transgressions against the public interest of which organized labor or its protagonists may be guilty, the informed consensus remains that such matters should be made the subject of prohibition in the regulatory statute which applies to labor relations. As the late Senator Robert A. Taft, a symbol of conservatism, declared:

"You would practically have to write an anti-trust law for labor because I do not think the Sherman Act is really aimed at it."

Finally, it is becoming daily more evident that inflation is neither as great nor as imminent a threat to our economy as has been urged in labor-baiting quarters. Nor is it to be laid at the doors of labor alone. The few decades during which labor has enjoyed federal protection of its right to organize have marked the most unprecedented material advance of our economy. They have seen the successful prosecution of a cataclysmic war. They have produced ever greater personal prosperity for all.

Free enterprise capitalism, with collective bargaining, has given Karl Marx the lie. It would be fantastic to jettison the system under which these gains were realized in a misguided attempt to crack down on labor.

AN ACT

To amend the National Labor Relations Act, to provide additional facilities for the mediation of labor disputes affecting commerce, to equalize legal responsibilities of labor organizations and employers, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SECTION 1. (a) This Act may be cited as the "Labor Management Relations Act, 1947."

(b) Industrial strife which interferes with the normal flow of commerce and with the full production of articles and commodities for commerce, can be avoided or substantially minimized if employers, employees, and labor organizations each recognize under law one another's legitimate rights in their relations with each other, and above all recognize under law that neither party has any right in its relations with any other to engage in acts or practices which jeopardize the public health, safety, or interest.

It is the purpose and policy of this Act, in order to promote the full flow of commerce, to prescribe the legitimate rights of both employees and employers in their relations affecting commerce, to provide orderly and peaceful procedures for preventing the interference by either with the legitimate rights of the other, to protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to define and proscribe practices on the part of labor and management which affect commerce and are inimical to the general welfare, and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes affecting commerce.

* Section 201 (d) and (e) of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 which repealed Section 9 (f), (g), and (b) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, and Section 505 amending Section 302 (a), (b), and (c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, took effect upon enactment of Public Law 86–257, September 14, 1959. As to the other amendments of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, Section 707 of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act provides:

> The amendments made by this title shall take effect sixty days after the date of the enactment of this Act and no provision of this title shall be deemed to make an unfair labor practice, any act which is performed prior to such effective date which did not constitute an unfair labor practice prior thereto.

INDUSTRY and COMMERCE

THE INVESTMENT BANKERS ASSOCIATION has advised members to expect the FEDERAL RESERVE to raise its discount rate in the near future, although it isn't saying just when. It has also advised members to look for another rise in the prime rate—interest to highest rated borrowers—soon. RESERVE BANKS discount rate now stands at four percent and private banks are already charging a 5.0 percent rate to "prime" borrowers. Both discount and prime rates are expected to rise one-half percent. Reason being given is tightness of money in the presently upsurging economy.

TIGHT MONEY policies of the EISENHOWER ADMINISTRATION may become an election issue of significance if the economy shows signs of slowing down before next November's election. Presently, there are no indications that the Administration will relax the monetary brakes to supply credit needed to sustain the present upsurge. With the steel strike settled and the renewal of the upward phase of the business cycle, the reverse is in prospect. PRES. EISENHOWER has again called for removal of the 4.5 percent interest ceiling on long term U. S. bonds but this proposal is again meeting stiff opposition in CONGRESS. Meanwhile, first reports of major banks show that profits are hitting another all-time high and are up from 12 to 24 percent over last year. High interest rates sparked by present monetary policy is given credit for the bonanza earnings of the bankers.

A DISSENTING voice to claims of long term boom has been raised by the UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS BUSINESS REVIEW. This publication finds that the upsurge of 1959 was brought on largely by the build-up in steel inventories preceding the strike, consumer credit expansion and other inventory renewal. It sees no reason that the present upsurge, which it terms a renewal of the boom of last spring, should necessarily be of a continuing nature. It sees inventories in steel renewed by next June, and auto inventories rebuilt by the end of this quarter and doubts that the auto industry will be able to sell all cars produced.

ON THE OTHER HAND the CHICAGO FEDERAL RESERVE has painted a rosy picture of the months ahead and has pointed to increased business investment and a likely boost in "employment, income and consumer expenditure." The FEDERAL RESERVE of NEW YORK is more cautious and sees "many uncertain elements in the situation," although it is quite optimistic for the short term. One of the elements bothering the New York bank is that while there is "continuing strength" in business expenditures for new plant and equipment, the "anticipated rate of growth is slower than during the first three quarters of 1959."

A STEPPED-UP PACE of automation in production and in record-keeping is in prospect. WALTER H. FINKE, president of MINNEAPOLIS-HONEYWELL DATAMATIC, has predicted that new "second generation" electronic computers and related data processing devices will speed up office automation appreciably in 1960. T. R. JONES, president of DAYSTROM, INC., has reported that a rigid six-month test of almost completely automated power generation in a plant of the LOUISIANA LIGHT & POWER CO. has been eminently successful. RICHARD ABBOTT III, head of an engineering firm, told the recent convention of the NATIONAL RETAIL MERCHANTS ASSN. that a completely automated warehouse with goods stored and shipped by machine is almost a real-life fact.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING DEVELOPMENTS

BENJAMIN FAIRLESS, president of the AMERICAN IRON & STEEL INSTITUTE, has stated that he feels that major strikes can be eliminated by enlightened management and labor in the "reasonable future" without intervention by the federal government. He declared in a talk to the WASHINGTON (D. C.) BOARD OF TRADE that meetings between top level labor and management should be "on an almost daily basis" not just when contracts run out. Meanwhile, PRES. EISENHOWER asserted in his STATE of the UNION MESSAGE that he endorses a labor-management summit and the ADMINISTRATION is reported to be working to that end. Both PRES. EISENHOWER and LABOR SEC. MITCHELL have declared that the recent steel settlement is non-inflationary.

A NEW CONTRACT between the UNITED AUTO WORKERS and ALCOA provides wage increases of 28.5 cents per hour over a three-year period. The new pact covers some 4,000 UAW members at company plants in Cleveland, Garwood, N. J., Chicago and Vernon, Calif. The pact is similar to those negotiated earlier with ALCOA by the UNITED STEELWORKERS and the ALUMINUM WORKERS. BRICK AND CLAY workers have reached agreement with 12 companies with plants in 10 states for 10,000 members. Workers had remained on jobs under contract extensions since old pacts expired last June.

THE NEWLY FORMED INTERNATIONAL MARITIME WORKERS UNION, which is supported by the NATIONAL MARITIME UNION and the SEAFARERS INTERNATIONAL UNION, halted the unloading of a U. S. owned ship flying the LIBERIAN flag when it threw up picket lines in Philadelphia. IMWU stated that two officers and 15 of the 17 unlicensed seamen on the 10,000-ton Liberty ship had designated it as bargaining agent. Seamen are seeking fair pay and safe and decent working conditions aboard such runaway ships.

TALKS WITH employers to establish new methods to govern wage payments have been announced by the DRESS JOINT COUNCIL of the INTERNATIONAL LADIES' GARMENT WORKERS. Present pay procedures were established in 1936, and since that time production methods have change significantly. New methods are designed to assure greater conformity and better enforcement of the complicated wage system of the industry. CHARLES ZIMMERMAN, manager of the JOINT COUNCIL, stated that with fundamental changes in production techniques "it would be fairer for all employers and fairer for our members to have a single standard that would apply to all types of production."

OIL, CHEMICAL AND ATOMIC WORKERS has reached a settlement with AMERICAN OIL for members employed at the firm's Texas City plant, after a 191-day strike. Key issues in this strike and a strike at the El Dorado, Ark., plant of the company involved contract language governing job assignments. A strike of 700 members of OCAW against the parent STANDARD OIL OF INDIANA is still continuing over similar issues. This latter strike has been going on for more than six months, and another strike of similar length is continuing against JOHNS-MANVILLE at Marrero, Iowa, where 600 members are involved.

THE LABOR DEPARTMENT has estimated that wage increases won last year averaged slightly below nine cents per hour. At the same time the NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD found that payrolls moved upward by eight percent last year and that costs of all fringe benefits—those negotiated by unions, higher social security taxes, workmen's compensation, unemployment compensation—rose about 12 percent.

ECONOMIC INDICATORS

WITH THE STEEL strike settled, unemployment in December dropped by 93,000. Joblessness at 3.6 million was still 5.2 percent of the labor force, however, although this was down from the 5.6 rate of last November. Employment, at 65.7 million, was the highest for December on record. Recalls resulting from the new flow of steel were largely responsible for an increase in factory employment of 152,000.

RETAIL SALES hit a record level of $215.6 billion last year, about eight percent higher than in the 1958 recession year. Retail stores now expect the first half of 1960 to continue to show gains, although not as great percentagewise as in the first half of last year. A survey of the delegates to the convention of the NATIONAL RETAIL MERCHANTS in New York indicated that merchants expect sales in the first weeks of 1960 to be four percent higher than in the same period of last year.

AUTO OUTPUT is 30 percent over last year as the industry rebuilds inventories depleted by the steel strike. With production scheduled for 176,000 units for the third week of January, output was the highest for any week since December of 1955. New compact cars were accounting for about a fifth of output. Industry was predicting the second best auto year on record. GM chairman FREDERIC DONNER has estimated total sales for 1960 at 8.0 million units, including half a million imports. AMERICAN MOTOR head GEORGE ROMNEY is slightly less optimistic and has predicted sales of 7.5 million with imports holding their present position.

STEEL OUTPUT in December hit an all-time record of more than 11 million tons. The industry now is running at 95 percent of capacity and is expected to maintain high levels through the first half of the year.

NEW PRIVATE HOUSING starts in December rose seasonally to an annual rate of 1,310,000 and total starts for the year were 1,341,000 compared with 1,141,500 in 1958. The December upturn was greater than expected but government officials still see a falling off of home starts in 1960 to 1.1 or 1.2 million. Actual home starts in December were 81,700 compared with 90,700 in November but the decline was less than usually takes place.

NLRB AND THE COURTS

NLRB majority has ruled that even though a company is guilty of closing its plant to avoid dealing with a union, the employees laid off because of the permanent shutdown are not entitled "to any monetary compensation for the period subsequent to the permanent cessation of business operations..." In a sharp dissent, BOARD MEMBERS JENKINS and FANNING charged that "the remedy...in this case is woefully inadequate." The dissenters asserted that "no impediment exists to an award of back pay to the [employees] until such time as they secured employment substantially equivalent to what was illegally taken from them..." BOARD MEMBER RODGERS dissented from the majority opinion that BARBERS IRON FOUNDRY, of Bridgeton, N. J., was guilty of unfair labor practice charges filed by the INT'L MOLDERS AND FOUNDRY WORKERS.

TRIAL EXAMINER LLOYD BUCHANAN has recommended that charges filed against DEERING, MILLIKEN & CO. by the TEXTILE WORKERS UNION be dismissed since the firm did not control the operations or labor relations of DARLINGTON MANUFACTURING CO. The recommendations are included in BUCHANAN's third report to the BOARD since DARLINGTON was originally found guilty of closing its plant to avoid dealing with the TEXTILE WORKERS. The union has charged that DARLINGTON was only a part of the DEERING, MILLIKEN empire and that the parent body should be penalized for its affiliate's actions. In his latest report, BUCHANAN declared that while DEERING, MILLIKEN owned a majority of the DARLINGTON voting shares, cooperation between the two organizations in "financial, technical, and administrative matters did not impinge on or affect DARLINGTON's full and sole control of its labor relations." BOARD is expected to review all three of BUCHANAN's reports jointly before issuing its order.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COURT JUDGE WILLIAM SWEIGERT has upheld the constitutionality of the LANDRUM-GRIFFIN BILL's "hot cargo" ban. In a case involving the AMALGAMATED LITHOGRAPHERS, the judge granted the NLRB an injunction forbidding the ALA to strike for the inclusion of a secondary boycott clause in its contracts with lithographers and printing companies. ALA has challenged the constitutionality of the new law's provision and is preparing to appeal JUDGE SWEIGERT's decision to the SUPREME COURT. Union charges that the "hot cargo" ban violates the due-process clause of the FIFTH AMENDMENT and the free-speech guarantee of the FIRST AMENDMENT. ALA's two-month strike against SAN FRANCISCO lithography employers will continue since inclusion of the secondary boycott clause is only one of many issues in dispute.

BOARD committee on rules revision headed by MEMBER JENKINS has proposed major changes in the handling of unfair labor practice cases. One of four changes would "confine the representation of parties in cases before the NLRB to lawyers except that companies and unions may be represented by their own officials." In addition, those appearing before the BOARD would be "subject to disciplinary action or even disbarment for improper professional conduct." According to the committee, the recommendations are in accord with the practice of the courts and other administrative agencies. The committee would permit present "non-lawyer practitioners" to continue to practice if they obtain permission of the BOARD. At present, anyone may represent interested parties in NLRB cases. Recommendations of the committee are subject to the approval of the full BOARD.

UNIONS WERE certified as bargaining representatives at three UNITED STATES GYPSUM CO. plants during December. The INT'L ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS won bargaining rights in Staten Island, N. Y., following an earlier 259 to 51 election victory. In Wabash, Ind., the PULP, SULPHITE & PAPER MILL WORKERS was certified following a 103 to 65 vote. In South Plainfield, N. J., the OIL, CHEMICAL AND ATOMIC WORKERS won a representation election by a 49 to 2 margin. UNITED AUTO WORKERS has won an election at STUBNITZ GREEN CORP., in Chester, Pa., by a 491 to 193 margin over DISTRICT 50, UNITED MINE WORKERS.

ON CAPITOL HILL

REP. EMANUEL CELLER (D., N.Y.), chairman of the HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, has accused Republican members of the RULES COMMITTEE of sacrificing civil rights legislation with a "political payoff." CELLER charged that the coalition of Dixiecrats and Republicans control eight of the 12 votes on the RULES COMMITTEE and that GOP members of the committee could get the moderate bill passed by his committee to the floor by switching their votes. CELLER's attack was included in a request for additional signatures on a discharge petition that requires 219 names before the bill can be taken out of committee. Of the slightly more than 150 present signatures on the petition, CELLER said "only a handful" are Republicans.

OTHER ITEMS OF INTEREST

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE PRES. ERWIN D. CANHAM has called for more "public economic education" to combat "strong factors working in favor of anti-business legislation." Speaking at the annual dinner of the NATIONAL RETAIL MERCHANTS ASSOCIATION, he told the merchants that they could do more than any other businessmen to "safeguard our free market economy." CANHAM singled out for special attack a proposal to place retail employees under the protection of the FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT. He complained that expanded federal minimum wage coverage would be "inflationary."

Equal Treatment for All

The preamble of Taft-Hartley says that the law is designed to promote collective bargaining. Nevertheless, the secondary boycott provisions of the law have for years been used to deprive unions of their legitimate rights to picket and conduct effective strikes.

The building trades unions were first to feel the brunt of the law. A decade ago, these unions tested their right to picket at a construction site where employees of more than one subcontractor are employed. The case was taken from the NLRB through the courts.

The Supreme Court held that picketing at a common construction site by a building trades union is an unlawful secondary boycott because it involves picketing allegedly "neutral" employers. This is the gist of the Denver Building Trades case decision.

The construction unions have since sought legislative relief through passage of a "situs" picketing bill permitting striking building craftsmen to picket at the job site where they are employed. There can be no doubt of the justice of the building trades unions' position and need for legislative relief so that they can exert effective pressure against their employers in economic disputes.

In arguing that they need relief, the building trades unions have charged that the subcontractors are not "neutral" employers. They have taken the position that the various subcontractors are equivalent to factory departments working under common direction toward a common end.

The Industrial Union Department, together with the rest of the labor movement, has strongly supported the building trades unions in their battle for legislative relief from the onerous Denver Building Trades ruling. This support remains firm, but a new dimension has been added.

Today, industrial workers and their unions also are being victimized by rulings based upon the Denver decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled in the General Electric case and other similar cases that industrial workers cannot picket the premises of their employers at gates allegedly set aside for subcontractors. It has ruled—in the Tennessee Coal and Iron case—that industrial workers cannot picket to protest the contracting out of work they have historically performed where a subcontractor is called in to do the job.

Such interpretations may well become endless. They threaten to weaken the ability of industrial unions to represent their members effectively. These rulings can be used to encourage contracting out of maintenance work historically performed by industrial workers. They can be used to permit subcontractors to come into plants, perform parts of the manufacturing operation, and undercut the standards of production workers.

The Open Gate

The Industrial Union Department, in self-defense and in the interests of all labor, has called for equal legislative relief for all affected by the Denver decision. It is continuing to call for relief for building trades craftsmen but is also seeking modification of the law so it cannot be used against the interests of those whom its unions represent. The IUD would be less than honest and forthright should it do otherwise. It is for this reason that it has urged enactment of the Holland bill (H.R. 6409).

IUD Sec.-Treas. Carey has explained in testimony that the Department position is that the Denver Building Trades Rule should be reversed "in toto." He has pointed out that the Thompson bill, supported by the building trades unions, would reverse the Denver ruling so far as construction sites are concerned, but would let the ruling remain to plague industrial unions and industrial workers.

The IUD position is logical, fair, and evenhanded. It seeks only equal treatment and equal protection for all. It is a position taken in the best interests of the labor movement which, after all, cannot afford to tolerate second class citizenship or treatment for any of its parts.

The Home Front

With good reason, the eyes of most Americans are turned toward the international scene. Here, history is being shaped and the next several weeks could be crucial.

At the very least, the tempo of the cold war will be stepped up and the competition between this nation and the Soviet will grow more intense. In this situation, America will neglect the problems of the home front only at her own peril.

The much-heralded recovery here at home is proceeding at a snail's pace. The loud hurrahs that greet a sales pace 20 percent below last year in autos hardly obscure continued high joblessness. The cheers for a 60 or 65 percent output level in steel have a hollow ring.

The fact is that production rose only half of one percent in March, and there is little sign of a significantly higher level. Unemployment persists as a grim reminder that all is not well in the world's wealthiest nation.

Now comes news that the expected recovery pace will be slow, and that by the year's end, this nation might be where it was supposed to be, where it should have been, perhaps two years ago. Meanwhile, another 1.4 million of our youth will enter the labor market when school ends this summer.

There is grave danger that America faces another incomplete recovery, this time with five to seven percent of the labor force unemployed. Such a recovery cannot last long. America, then, faces the coming period of intensified international struggle with prospects of a sagging economy at home.

Joblessness at home is uncalled for and callous. It is time for a bold program of public works, sharp reversal of monetary policy to cut interest rates and, perhaps, a tax cut.

Tax Reforms Should Start At Bottom, Carey Asserts

Tax reform should "start at the bottom," IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey declared following release of President Kennedy's recent tax message to Congress.

The President's message stated that he now is having prepared a comprehensive program of tax reform which he will place before the next session of Congress.

At the same time, the President called for an immediate program of "business incentives" which would give tax credits to firms for investment in new plant and in modernization. The President's tax program would permit firms to offset incentive credits against tax liability. Companies could have up to 30 percent of their tax liability forgiven in any given year. In effect, the program seeks to meet business demands for faster tax write-offs on present plant and equipment.

The tax credit allowances would cost the U. S. Treasury about $1.7 billion annually. To make up for this loss, the President has proposed to close certain tax loopholes, but not including present oil depletion allowance.

One major loophole that would be closed is of key importance to industrial unions, since it would help to prevent U. S. companies from running to foreign nations. This is the tax haven loophole. The President has proposed that profits made by U. S. companies abroad be called home for tax purposes.

The President also proposed to end lush tax-free expense accounts. He urged that interest and dividend income be subjected to the same tax treatment as other income and that it be subjected to a withholding tax at the source.

Carey welcomed the closing of the loopholes listed by the President but stated that industrial labor is "opposed to business incentives which would not help the economy and which, in practice, would chiefly benefit the big corporations."

He added that the beneficiaries of tax reform should be the "low and middle" income families of the United States.

"The best way to get business expansion is to put present unused plant capacity to work and to end unemployment. Further tax incentives for big business will simply increase the pace of automation and layoffs without increasing the market for industry's end products. We are strongly opposed to faster tax write-offs in any shape or disguise," Carey declared.

He noted that there is no shortage of capital for new plant and that over the past five years, industry has spent $170 on new plant while setting aside $102 billion as depreciation reserves and retaining $47 billion more as undivided profits.

"Tax reform should seek to close loopholes and to apply the income made available to those who will use it for better diets, clothing, housing, appliances, and other goods and services required to maintain an American living standard. As a first step, dependency allowances should be raised from the present unrealistic and inadequate $600 a year to at least $700. The results would show up at once in almost every paycheck in the country and almost every retail store," Carey said.

Labor Pledges Aid To Non-Bias Group

Forty-two labor leaders met with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity early in May to pledge full cooperation in carrying out the Administration's non-discrimination order on federal contract work.

Vice-Pres. Lyndon Johnson, chairman of the committee, and Labor Sec. Arthur Goldberg explained the Administration's policy to the unionists, as they had done at an earlier meeting of businessmen.

President Kennedy created the special committee through an executive order.

Rubber Workers Win Wage Gains

The United Rubber Workers has reached agreement with the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. providing wage increases up to 14.5 cents an hour over a two-year period.

Under the new pact, workers in five tire plants will get an additional 7.5 cents an hour starting June 5, and another seven cents, effective June 11, 1962. Workers in the company's three industrial product plants will receive a 3.5 cents an hour boost this June and an additional four cents in June 1962.

The contract, covering 16,000 Firestone workers, marked the first time that wage increases were not negotiated across the board.

A joint statement issued by the union and company pointed out that costs in non-tire plants may place the company in a non-competitive position and that the URW has a responsibility in protecting job security at both tire and non-tire plants.

Other gains won by the union include: an eighth holiday, extension of SUB payments to cover a maximum of 39 weeks with maximum payments increased by $5, a provision permitting employees with five years of seniority who have been laid off for more than two years to receive a lump sum separation payment, a liberalized vacation plan, and a clause dealing with the problems of automation and job displacement.

Four days before reaching agreement with Firestone, the union came to terms with Goodyear on non-economic issues. The contract is similar to the Firestone agreement and led to speculation that the URW would reopen wage talks with Goodyear.

While rubber industry contracts have standard expiration dates covering non-wage items, wages traditionally have been opened on 60 days' notice. The industry's last wage increases, amounting to 9.5 cents an hour, went into effect last July.

L-G Hits Employer

The first suit against an employer for violation of Landrum-Griffin has been filed by the Labor Department.

The case involves Olson Rug Co., of Chicago, which failed to report money it spent to hire a detective agency to spy upon activities of the United Textile Workers of America. The civil action named as defendants, W. E. Olson, president, and J. E. Heckle, treasurer, of the rug firm, and Sol D. Gabney, president of Illinois State Detective Agency.

UNEMPLOYMENT RALLY. Wayne County AFL-CIO and United Auto Workers sponsor a mass rally of jobless workers to support organized labor's legislative "Get America Back to Work" program. The rally was first of a series called for by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

Henderson State Witness Arrested in Shooting Case

When eight members of the Textile Workers were convicted of conspiring to dynamite the struck Harriet-Henderson mills, the chief witness for the State of North Carolina was Harold Aaron. Today, Aaron is under arrest in Virginia on the charge of malicious wounding — an offense that carries a 20-year sentence.

Aaron was arrested near Martinsville after he allegedly shot John Layton Pulliam when Pulliam refused to leave a motel room that was occupied by Aaron and a 17-year old girl. According to police, Aaron had two pistols in his possession.

During the Harriet-Henderson trial, the union claimed that Aaron—a man with a prior police record—had been used by the state as an agent provocateur. At the trial, Aaron admitted receiving money from the State Bureau of Investigation and testified that the defendants hired him as a dynamite expert. No dynamite was ever found in the possession of the defendants.

Despite defense claims of entrapment, the Textile Workers — including Vice-Pres. Boyd Payton — were sentenced to prison terms ranging from two to eight years. At the present time, Payton is teaching school in prison.

Following Aaron's recent arrest, the Raleigh News and Observer declared that the latest development "cannot increase the State's confidence in the righteousness of the conviction." It called its editorial: "New Reason for Scrutiny" and stated that in the interest of justice, the case should be reopened.

Gov. Terry Sanford, who took office after the convictions and sentencing, has been quoted as saying that the volume of mail on the case is increasing. He added that in replies to these letters, he has promised to seriously consider all aspects of the case.

Commenting on the Aaron arrest, TWUA Pres. William Pollock asserted that the latest development "should challenge the conscience of North Carolinians to ask whether eight union men without any previous criminal record belong behind bars solely because of testimony of Aaron."

"Our eight officers and members have already served more than five months of their long sentences," Pollock said. "They were behind bars while the State's principal witness was engaged in the disgraceful episode involving a 17-year old girl in a motel room."

Other union officials have compared the lengthy sentences of the "Henderson Eight" to the 30-day jail terms of the electrical industry executives convicted of price-fixing and bid-rigging. They have noted that the union members are serving long terms for allegedly conspiring to dynamite, while the industry executives have already been released after admitting participation in a swindle involving billions of dollars.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

IUD Asks Picketing Rights

The IUD is of the view that the rule of the Denver Building Trades case should be reversed, but that relief should be granted both industrial and craft unions.

The IUD position was pinpointed by Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey in testimony before a subcommittee of the House Labor Committee last month.

IUD testimony followed that of the AFL-CIO, presented by Pres. George Meany in a letter read to the subcommittee on his behalf by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. The AFL-CIO took the position that relief should be granted to the craft unions by passage of H. R. 2955, the Thompson Bill.

Carey urged passage of H. R. 6409, the Holland bill. This bill would grant both industrial and craft unions the right to picket sites at which they are employed.

He explained that the Denver decision of the Supreme Court found that a secondary boycott existed when employees of a subcontractor picketed a building site at which employees of other subcontractors are employed on different aspects of the same job.

"The Denver case requires union men, working under union conditions, to work side by side on a single construction project with people who are undermining their standards. I believe that union men in the building and construction industry should have the same right that workers in an industrial plant have to regard the standards in every part of the shop as a matter of common concern to all employees of the shop," Carey said.

He added that the IUD is opposed to the rule of the Denver case and would "ordinarily give support to bills now pending before you which relate only to the building and construction industry."

But, he added, because of the "action of the union leadership, or some of it, in this industry," the Industrial Union Department is not now "prepared to give such support."

Carey cited specifically the Tennessee Coal and Iron Case in which members of the United Steelworkers struck after the company contracted out work that they had previously performed. In this case, the building trades unions joined with the company and contractor in filing secondary boycott charges because the work involved was being performed by an allegedly "neutral" employer.

TCI and the contractor dropped their charges after agreement on a division of work was negotiated locally. The building trades unions continued to press charges, which were upheld by the National Labor Relations Board. The D. C. Court of Appeals, where the Building and Construction Trades Department had filed an amicus brief citing the Denver ruling in support of its position, has ruled against the Steelworkers and the case is expected to go to the Supreme Court.

Carey noted in his testimony that in TCI, the building trades are seeking to use the case "as a vehicle to expand the Denver rule so as to prevent industrial unions from taking action to protect their own membership."

The IUD officer further stated that the building trades unions have "mounted a nation-wide campaign in cooperation with the Teamsters' Union to induce all industrial employers to sub-contract their maintenance work. This alliance has distributed brochures widely, telling employers they 'will have no seniority problems'; they will 'have no retirement or costly insurance plans to administer' . . . if they will eliminate their own maintenance employees and contract out their maintenance work. . . ."

He explained that while the question of the right of industrial workers to picket their own employer's premises is now in litigation in several cases, legislative relief is required to prevent further developments of a similar nature.

"It is for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that the Industrial Union Department has adopted the position that it has with regard to the situs picketing bills. The position is simply that any bill passed should reverse the Denver Rule in toto. . . ," Carey declared.

In further testimony, IUD General Counsel David Feller stated that the Labor Board has taken legislation passed in 1947 and construed it in an entirely different manner than intended. He said that if the present law is "applied literally," strikes would be illegal, "since the purpose of strikes is to prevent employers from doing business."

In earlier testimony, Pres. Al Hayes of the International Association of Machinists declared that the Thompson bill should be "tightened" because there is danger that it might be "misinterpreted" to give building trades unions sole bargaining rights at missile bases. He stated the language of the bill should be altered so that picketing at a common site where missiles are built cannot be used against union crews sent by manufacturers to install launching and other equipment at these construction sites.

I. W. Abel, secretary-treasurer of the United Steelworkers, also urged passage of a broad measure such as the Holland bill. Abel cited Taft-Hartley and its history, saying that it was always assumed that the law did not intend to interfere with primary picketing at industrial plants whether to persuade employees of the primary employer or "third party" employees not to cross picket lines.

SITUS PICKETING TESTIMONY. IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey and Dep't General Counsel David Feller testify before House Labor subcommittee studying the need for new situs picketing legislation. IUD spokesmen urged the subcommittee to support a measure introduced by Rep. Elmer Holland (D., Pa.) that would protect all workers from secondary boycott restrictions at common work sites.

Fair Trade Act Defeat Sought

Calling for defeat of the so-called Fair Trade Competitive Practices Act, I. W. Abel, secretary-treasurer of the United Steelworkers of America, has declared that the legislation would "place a strait-jacket over the U. S. pricing system."

Abel's charge was contained in testimony filed with the Special Fair Trade Subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee. Abel, a Department vice-president, filed on behalf of the IUD.

The IUD vice-president stated that small merchants are "deluding" themselves if they believe that fair trade laws will protect their interests.

"At best," he said, "they will become the captive outlets of brand-name manufacturers. At worst, they will lose their freedom of action and then find the consumer turning against them to purchase non-brand merchandise—or non-fair traded goods—elsewhere."

Abel charged that the law would, in effect, create monopoly conditions for brand name merchandising, and lead to price-fixing on a grand scale.

"Organizations seeking resale or fair trade laws have been among the most vociferous in combating what they call federal bureaucracy. . . . Some are now fighting legislation intended to protect the public against price gouging and unsafe conditions in the drug field. Yet they would haul before the federal courts merchants who dare sell a hundred aspirin tablets at a nickel less than the manufacturer's resale price," he asserted.

Abel said that fair trade legislation would turn the U. S. consumer completely over to such manufacturers as General Electric and Westinghouse, despite their record of price-fixing. He called the proposed law an invitation to inflation and said that it would add from $1 billion to $10 billion to consumer prices. He also predicted that passage of the law would result "in large-scale price bootlegging in the brand name area."

Power Project Fight

Attempts by private power interests to prevent the nation from getting peaceful benefits of atomic power were set back when the Senate included $95 million to use the heat generated at the Hanford, Wash., atomic energy plant for power. The House, under pressure from the power trusts, had defeated the measure. At present, steam generated from Columbia River water used to cool atomic reactors goes to waste.

WHEELCHAIR ON PICKET LINE. Injuries suffered when strikers were run down by a non-union truck driver fail to keep workers off their picketline. Mrs. Rita Sylvia, in wheelchair, and Mrs. Mary Ross, on crutches, were hit by truck during American Bakery & Confectionery Workers strike against Peter Paul Inc., candy manufacturer.

Old Fears Raised as New Fight for Health Plan Begins

While no bill is expected to be acted upon at this session of the Congress, new House hearings on medical care for the aged got under way recently with a shouting match between HEW Sec. Abraham Ribicoff and Rep. Bruce Alger (R., Tex.), an ultraconservative.

As the IUD Bulletin went to press, Department Pres. Walter Reuther, Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and IAM Pres. Al Hayes were scheduled to present testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee. As in the past, labor and liberal forces were in complete opposition to organized medicine, the insurance industry, and America's die-hard conservative and reactionary political blocs.

Nothing seems better able to make a conservative lose his bearings than mention of health care for the aged. For some reason unknown, conservatives appear to equate such care through a national health insurance pool with the breakdown of the American way.

Yet, just north of the border in Canada, there now is a national hospitalization plan under which all citizens are provided with such care through national insurance. The Canadian Medical Association announced some time ago that 93 percent of its members are in favor of negotiating an acceptable plan for a national health service and 83 percent said that they consider a tax-supported medical plan either probable, inevitable or imminent. Canadian conservatives have seen no breakdown in that democracy's system of living.

The health plan now being considered is more modest than the Forand Bill, proposed in the 86th Congress. An Administration measure has been proposed by Rep. Cecil King (D., Calif.) which would provide 90 days' hospitalization, 180 days in a nursing home, and health home visits for those over 65 receiving Social Security benefits. This coverage would eventually apply to 95 percent of today's workers and immediately to 14.5 million persons now over 65. In the Senate, a companion bill has been introduced by Sen. Clinton Anderson (D., N. Mex.). Both bills provide that the aged must pay $10 per day for the first nine days of hospital care.

Costs of the plan are to be covered by a one-fourth of one percent additional Social Security tax on worker and employer. Because costs are expected to run slightly higher than originally anticipated, Sec. Ribicoff has proposed that the earnings base to which the tax would apply be raised from the present $4,800 maximum to $5,200.

Alger interrupted Ribicoff's lead-off testimony by shouting that it would be a mistake to add old age health care to Social Security because the system isn't financially sound and would "crash" of its own weight. Ribicoff responded with "righteous wrath," and pointing out that a Social Security Financing Advisory Council appointed by former President Eisenhower had found the system sound.

Coalition Wins On School Aid

The children lost again when the House Rules Committee tabled the $2.5 billion general school aid bill, a college scholarship bill, and the revised National Defense Education Act.

The vote in Rules was eight to seven. Ranged against the bill were the GOP-Dixie coalition who want no aid of any kind and Rep. James Delaney, Brooklyn, (D., N.Y.) who demanded inclusion of aid to parochial and other private schools in the general school bill. All in the minority were Democrats, including two of the Catholic faith.

Limited aid to parochial and other private schools was included in the National Defense Education Act. This would have included long-term, low interest loans for construction of non-religious classrooms, such as those set aside for science, language and mathematics.

The action to table probably means no school bill for at least this session. It has strengthened an already re-emboldened conservative coalition. It was a major victory for Rules Chairman Howard Smith (D., Va.).

When Congress met this year, there was much talk from House liberals about the need to modify the rules to prevent legislation from being bottled up. As a compromise, the Rules Committee was enlarged and as a result some key legislation was speeded through.

The defeat of the school aid bill shows again the need for fundamental reform, such as the 21-day rule under which a bill could be called out of the Rules Committee.

The alternatives now are discharge petition, suspension of the rules, or Calendar Wednesday. The first requires 219 signatures; the second requires a two-thirds majority, and the third requires the consent of all committees alphabetically preceding the Labor and Education Committee and that of the House Speaker.

One aspect of the school bill—aid to federally-impacted areas—may get by in a separate bill. Communities affected by federal installations will be badly hurt if aid is terminated, and even conservatives seem ready to go along on impacted areas as a separate measure.

Meanwhile, Dep't of Commerce projections indicate that over the next two decades school enrollments may rise from 46 million now to 75 million by 1980. By 1965, some 54 million children will probably be enrolled in the nation's elementary and high schools.

NOONTIME DEMONSTRATION. Protesting company violations of their contract, some 1,500 employees of the ITT Federal Laboratories in Nutley, N. J., conduct weekly mass demonstrations before the firm's plant gates. The employees, including both white and blue collar workers, are members of Int'l Union of Electrical Workers Local 400.

Court's Separate Gate Rule Overturns Boycott Charges

Abiding by the Supreme Court's "separate gate" ruling, the National Labor Relations Board has upheld the right of an industrial union to picket a plant gate reserved for "neutral" employees engaged in work normal to the struck plant's operations.

In a case involving the Int'l Union of Electrical Workers and General Electric, the Court had set two criteria that must be met before an industrial union can be found guilty of an illegal secondary boycott.

The Court held that: (1) the "neutral" employees must enter and leave the struck plant by a special gate not used by striking workers; and (2) the "neutral" employees cannot do work that is normal to the struck plant's operations.

With the Court decision serving as a guide, the NLRB overruled a trial examiner's recommendation that the United Steelworkers be found guilty of secondary boycott activities against the New York Central Railroad.

The union had maintained pickets at a railroad gate owned by New York Central and used to service the struck Carrier Corp. The NLRB found that while the gate to the Carrier plant was on a right-of-way owned by the railroad instead of being reserved by the company for the railroad's use, this fact was not material.

A Board majority declared that "the key to the problem," as the Court stated, "is to be found in the type of work being done by those passing through the gate. . . . If this work is related to normal plant operations, the secondary boycott prohibition does not apply."

The Board said that the New York Central was attempting to deliver empty boxcars to the Carrier plant and transport full boxcars from the plant. "It cannot be disputed," the NLRB added, "that the services performed by New York Central . . . were services rendered in connection with the normal operations of Carrier."

An earlier NLRB decision, made prior to the Supreme Court's ruling, has been reversed by the District Court of Appeals, because the Board failed to consider the Court's "separate gate" criterion.

In a case involving Gonzales Chemical Industries, the Board had ordered the Teamsters to cease inducing the employees of an independent contractor to observe a union picketline. The NLRB held that the "neutral" employees were easily identified by the green helmets they wore to work.

The appeals court noted that there may be little difference between separate gates and distinct uniforms as the NLRB had claimed, but declared that "as a legal matter, we cannot deny that a separate gate is a controlling consideration . . ."

AFL-CIO Honored

The American Heritage Foundation has awarded the AFL-CIO an "outstanding citizenship" citation for the Federation's role in getting citizens to register and vote in last year's elections.

Interest Rates Stay High; Put Brake Upon Recovery

So far at least, the Kennedy Administration's moves to bring down interest rates have had little success.

Across the country, mortgage interest rates have dropped only by a quarter of one percent since last fall. With housing construction picking up somewhat, there is little likelihood of further declines unless other steps are soon forthcoming on a broader scale. Interest on conventional mortgages now is reported to average six percent nationwide.

The prime rate—the interest rate charged by metropolitan banks to blue-ribbon borrowers—has gone down slightly from a record five to four and a half percent. This is cold comfort to the average farmer or businessman who is still paying six percent or more for money, or to the consumer who still faces interest charges as high as ever.

States and localities also are continuing to pay high rates for funds needed to finance schools, local facilities, and other construction. This is inhibiting public construction at a time when an expansion of public works is badly required to bolster the economy and provide new jobs.

Total new public construction in April was up 12 percent over March but the rise was less than seasonal. The normal seasonal increase is 18 percent. Much more than a seasonal increase is called for by the turn of economic events.

So far, the Kennedy approach to monetary policy has had two major aspects. The more important has turned around an increase in the amount of credit available. To this end, the Federal Reserve had agreed to purchase long term U. S. bonds in the open market. So far, FRB purchases have been somewhat less than token in magnitude. They have had little effect upon interest rates.

As a secondary approach, the Administration has tried to "talk down" interest rates and Joseph McMurray, new head of the Home Loan Bank, has tried to get loan associations to cut mortgage rates. So far as can be determined, there has been no success.

Democrats on the Joint Congressional Economic Committee have hit the FRB's lack of "vigor" in cooperating in policies to lower long-term interest rates. They have called for more vigorous action including a call—in the name of reciprocal trade—upon European nations to cut tariffs on U. S. goods. They have also called for elimination of the legal requirement that the U. S. Treasury hold gold equal to 25 percent of money in circulation.

Republicans on the Committee have, as expected, warned against "soft-money."

The Kennedy program has called for bringing down "long-term" rates while holding "short-term" interest rates stable. This approach has come out of an adverse balance of payments position—the U. S. owing more than it takes in in international payments. Because of this, the U. S. has faced a drain on its gold reserves.

The U. S. payments position has changed drastically for the better in recent months, and the gold outflow has all but stopped. The U. S. payments deficit now is running at less than $1 billion annually, although Treas. Sec. Dillon still calls the situation "touchy."

Dillon now is bothered because of indications that bank lending rates will again go up in response to the slight upsurge in the economy. He recently told a press conference that there is "no justification" for this, and that it would strike "a very serious blow" to recovery.

With the gold outflow halted, the excuse that "short term" rates must be held up and that therefore "long term" interest rates—mortgages and the like—cannot be reduced no longer holds good.

A vigorous approach to monetary policy would utilize all the tools of the Federal Reserve Board. This would include a further cut in the discount rate which still stands at three percent and which holds up the price of money. It would also require far more than token purchases of long term bonds.

A Congressional inquiry into banking practices may also be in order. In the 1958 recession, it was necessary to lower the discount rate to 1.75 percent before interest rates dropped significantly.

New ILG Contract

The Int'l Ladies Garment Workers has reached a new two-year agreement with New York's coat and suit industry providing wage increases of 14 cents an hour, fringe benefits worth four cents an hour, and increased employer payments to the retirement and welfare fund.

Although contract talks were originally limited to wages, both the union and industry agreed to boost welfare fund payments to bolster declining contributions caused by poor business conditions.

Some 45,000 workers will benefit from the new agreement.

NORRIS CENTENNIAL. National Centennial Conference will be held in Washington during May to mark the birth of the late Sen. George W. Norris. A great conservationist, Norris is known as the father of TVA.

Court Reverses Board Decisions

The Supreme Court has overruled five key National Labor Relations Board decisions, finding—as labor has long charged—that the Board had gone far beyond Congressional intent in its anti-union interpretations of the law.

In a case involving the legality of hiring halls, the NLRB had ruled that contracts cannot provide that unions refer workers to an employer unless there is a specific guarantee of fair treatment for non-union members in the agreement.

The Court held that hiring halls are legal even if these safeguards are not expressed in contract language.

Following its hiring hall decision, the NLRB had held that when such halls are found to be illegal, unions must refund dues to all members. The Court ruled that the Board has no power to make such a move since it was engaging in unauthorized punitive action.

The Board had held that the Int'l Typographical Union could not demand contract clauses calling for a foreman to be a union member and permitting the ITU's General Laws to govern relations with management when they were not in conflict with federal or state statutes. According to the NLRB, these demands were illegal. The Court found that the Board had erred.

In another ITU case, the NLRB ruled that the union could not insist that a foreman who hires workers must be a union member. The Court held that the Board was again exceeding its authority.

In another hiring hall case, the Court found that the NLRB could not decide that the hiring hall per se was unlawful.

Steel Industry Profit Fine Despite Sag in Production

The steel industry did just fine last year despite the recession that began before 1960 was half over.

"Operating at 70 percent of capacity for the third straight year, the industry absorbed two pay hikes, spent nearly $1.5 billion on capital improvement, and earned more than six percent on its investment. All this without a price increase," Iron Age, trade publication, commented recently.

A study of the United Steelworkers' research department showed what happened in the industry last year. In only four previous years has the industry made more profit. Of the 28 major companies, only three lost money.

In the third quarter of last year, the industry operated at only 52.5 percent of capacity. It had a net profit of $101.8 million. In the final quarter, the operating rate was 50.4 percent but profits rose to $128.1 million.

By the end of last year, according to the study, one in three steelworkers was jobless. In January of this year, total production and maintenance employment was 366,900 against 533,700 the year previous.

The average steelworker who had a job was on short-time most of last year. In every month from May 1960 through January 1961, weekly hours averaged less than 35.

Total net profits of the top 28 companies in the industry were $772.4 million for last year. The firms had a net worth of over $10 billion. They paid dividends of $496 million.

As of the present time, there is some pick-up in steel as users replenish inventories. The operating rate now is about 65 percent but is not expected to go much higher in the immediate future. At this operating rate, the companies are assured an even better year than in 1960.

Steel employment is not moving ahead with any great speed. The Steelworker study found that as "production picks up there are indications of some increase in employment but there is little prospect of a return to employment levels of a year ago." This has been the story in steel, and in other basic industry, following each post-war recession.

Meanwhile Roger Blough, U. S. Steel chief, has denied that automation is displacing workers from jobs and has attributed falling employment to lack of demand for steel. Blough called for holding down employment costs by ending "restrictions" on the use of technology.

The U. S. Steel head all too obviously was again looking at work rules—the issue in the last steel strike. He seemed again to be calling for speedup in the mills as his answer to the tired old bugaboo of foreign competition.

Blough's talk was delivered at U. S. Steel's annual stockholders' meeting. Earlier, another steel boss, E. F. Martin, president of Bethlehem, had called for price increases to pay for "modernization." Despite industry profits, Martin was once more seeking to blame labor for any price hike. In his first quarter report to stockholders, Martin said that the industry would have to wait until business got a little better before raising prices.

Bethlehem has been operating at higher levels than the rest of the industry. It has booked $534 million in new business for the highest levels since the second quarter of 1959. It now is planning a big program of modernization aimed at improving efficiency.

Such is Bethlehem's poverty that it has announced that it will need no new external financing to meet modernization costs, meaning that it will meet costs from retained profits.

Steel operations, as a percent of capacity, must now be estimated since the industry ceased issuing these statistics. The industry is known, however, to have over 30 percent of capacity standing idle.

Reactor Case Before Court

Late in April, the Supreme Court heard oral argument on the Atomic Energy Commission's issuing of a construction permit for a fast-breeder reactor without first ruling that the reactor would not cause undue risk to the public safety.

The legal question was first raised in August 1956 when three IUD affiliates challenged the right of the Power Reactor Development Corporation to build a reactor in the populous Detroit-Toledo area.

Last June, the U. S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld the position of the unions — United Auto Workers, Int'l Union of Electrical Workers, and United Papermakers and Paperworkers. The court ruled that AEC could not issue a construction permit without first finding that the public safety would be protected.

The case went before the Supreme Court when AEC and the power company appealed the lower court ruling.

In their Supreme Court brief, the unions charge that the AEC's Advisory Committee on Reactor Safeguards could not give assurances that the PRDC reactor could be operated without public hazard. Despite this lack of assurance, the AEC granted a provisional construction permit without ruling on the safety question as mandated by law.

Meanwhile construction of the PRDC reactor has neared completion. Originally scheduled for operation in December 1960, the company asked for a 12-month postponement because of flaws in the core design and other problems.

BRIEF OUTLINE OF LABOR LAW DEVELOPMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Labor legislation today is that comprehensive body of laws and regulations governing the working conditions of the wage earner and the relationship between the employee and the employer. Such legislation is never static. It reflects the efforts that have grown out of our social and economic conditions, which are continually changing. Labor standards were slow in developing in the United States but advanced steadily during the 19th century. During the 20th century, remarkable developments have taken place in protective legislation for the worker.

Early Developments

The first labor laws to be passed in the United States were child-labor laws. In the early days when the textile industry was starting, manpower was scarce and child labor was cheap. Young children were employed in the mills, usually working from dawn to dark. These children, of course, were getting no schooling. In 1813 Connecticut passed a law requiring mill owners to have the children in their factories taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. In 1836 Massachusetts required children under 15 working in factories to attend school for three months a year. The next step was in 1842, when a maximum 10-hour day was set in Massachusetts for children under 12 and in Connecticut for those under 14. The first State adopting a minimum age by law was Pennsylvania in 1848; this was a 12-year minimum in textile plants. The first law requiring school attendance for non-working as well as working children was passed in Massachusetts in 1852, requiring children between 8 and 14 years of age to attend school 12 weeks a year.

In the meantime agitation was developing for shorter hours. A 10-hour "legal working day" for all workers was set by law in New Hampshire in 1847. In 1852 Ohio enacted a law limiting hours of work for women to 10 a day in a place used for mechanical or manufacturing purposes. However, it was not until 1879 that the first enforceable maximum 10-hour law for women was enacted. This was in the form of an amendment to a Massachusetts law of 1874.

The second half of the 19th century also saw the rise of national organized labor unions--the Knights of Labor in the 1870's and the American Federation of Labor in the 1880's. With these unions pressing for better working conditions, particularly as to hours of work, came more women's hours and more child-labor laws as well as some hours laws for men. In addition, a few other types of labor laws were making their appearance, such as those requiring guards for machines and those regulating private employment agencies. Significant moves also were the establishment in 1869 of the first bureau of labor statistics--Massachusetts, and 10 years later, also in Massachusetts, provision for a special enforcing agency--i.e., three factory inspectors to enforce the child-labor, safety, and women's hours laws.

At the turn of the century, what was the status of labor legislation? Considerable progress had been made.

Twenty-four States, including most of the industrial States, had enacted laws requiring a regular pay day or payment in lawful money, at least in some industries.

About a dozen States required safeguarding of machinery in factories, while around 25 had laws relating to mine safety.

A few States regulated sanitary conditions in factories or in places where industrial homework was done.

Ten States had laws regulating private employment agencies.

The first public employment office had been established in Ohio in 1890; other States were just beginning to follow in 1900.

About 17 States provided for mediation of labor disputes.

Twenty States set a legal limit to the hours of work for women in one or more industries.

Twenty-eight States had child-labor laws, usually setting a 12- or 14-year minimum applying to work in factories or mines.

Some 30 States had compulsory school-attendance laws.

Seventeen States provided inspectors to enforce the laws and some 25 had bureaus of labor statistics.

The First Two Decades

In the first two decades of the 20th century, great strides were made in improving and extending laws already existing in some of the States, and in passing new types of legislation. The most significant accomplishments were the establishment of unified labor departments, the development of administrative rule-making power, the first workmen's compensation and the first minimum-wage laws, and great expansion in women's hours and child-labor laws. In New York a single department of labor was formed in 1901,by consolidating three bureaus formerly separated: statistics, inspection, and mediation and arbitration. Wisconsin in 1911, in unifying its labor functions, devised a new method to make industrial safety legislation workable--granting rule-making authority in this field to its labor commission. Within the next five years, several of the large industrial States expanded the authority of their labor departments to include such administrative powers.

Workmen's compensation laws began in our country in 1908 with an act passed by the Federal Government covering civil employees. In 1911 the first State laws were enacted. Washington and Kansas were the first States to enact such laws, although the Wisconsin law was the first to go into effect. In addition to these three, seven other States passed workmen's compensation laws that year.

The first minimum-wage law for women and minors was passed in 1912 in Massachusetts, with eight other States following her example the following year, and six more, as well as the District of Columbia and one Territory, by 1923.

In 1911 the first law prohibiting the employment of women before and after childbirth was passed in Massachusetts, followed by similar laws in New York and Vermont in 1912. Equal-pay laws--prohibiting discrimination in the rate of pay because of sex--originated at the end of the first World War with the passage of acts in Michigan and Montana (1919). Maximum-hours legislation for women had been enacted by 1920 in 41 States and the District of Columbia.

The first State anti-injunction law came in 1913 in Kansas, followed in 1917 by Utah and Minnesota, and in 1919 by North Dakota, Oregon, Washington, and Wisconsin. A 1911 Wisconsin act amended in 1915, later served as a pattern for our modern laws authorizing systems of voluntary apprenticeship under State supervision.

Many States also adopted or improved child-labor laws. In 1903 alone, comprehensive child-labor laws were passed in 11 States, five of them having had no previous laws whatever on this subject. By 1912 all of the States had some child-labor provisions; in 1913, 31 States amended their laws to set better standards. Two Federal child-labor laws were passed in this period--in 1916 and 1919. Although both were subsequently declared unconstitutional, they influenced Federal legislation in this field during the 'thirties.

During this period, also, the U. S. Department of Labor was established--on March 4, 1913. It included the former Bureau of Labor that had been established in 1884, which had been part of the Department of Commerce and Labor since 1903.

Advances During the 'Thirties

The decade of the 'twenties brought some extension and some strengthening of the existing body of State labor law and its administration, but there was little legislation in new areas. During the 'thirties, however, great advances were made in labor legislation favorable to the worker as a result of the severe hardships brought about by the Nationwide depression.

While up to this time, the States had passed practically all the labor laws in existence, in this decade the Federal Government stepped into the picture with several very important acts. The first was the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932, which limited the powers of Federal courts to issue injunctions in labor disputes. This act, also, specifically encouraged the organization of labor unions and the principle of collective bargaining, as did the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933 (declared unconstitutional in 1935), and the National Labor Relations (Wagner) Act of 1935. The National Labor Relations Act was the first Federal law dealing specifically and entirely with problems of trade-union organization and activities outside of the railroad industry. (The Railway Labor Act had been passed in 1926.) In 1933, the Wagner-Peyser Act was passed, which established the United States Employment Service as a bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor and provided cooperation with the States in the development of a national system of public employment offices.

In 1935, also, the Social Security Act was passed. This law, as amended, provides for an all-Federal system of old-age and survivors' insurances; a Federal-State plan of unemployment insurance; a Federal-State plan of public assistance with monthly cash payments to certain types of needy persons: older persons, dependent children, the blind, and persons who are permanently and totally disabled. In addition, it provides grants to the States for maternal and child-health services, services for crippled children and child-welfare services. As originally enacted, this act also authorized grants-in-aid for additional public health services and vocational rehabilitation. The vocational rehabilitation provisions have been supplanted by the Vocational Rehabilitation Act and the public health provisions by the Public Health Service Act.

In 1936, the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act was passed, which sets basic labor standards for work done on United States Government contracts for materials, supplies, and equipment exceeding $10,000. Such standards include minimum-wage provisions, overtime, safety and health requirements, and child-labor provisions.

An act of particular significance in labor standards was the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, which applies to employees engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce. It prescribes minimum-wage rates for all employees--whether men, women, or minors; provides for overtime after 40 hours a week (44 during the first year of the act's existence and 42 during the second year); and regulates child labor.

Legislation favorable to the workers flourished also in the States during this decade. Under the impetus of Federal legislation, every State adopted an unemployment insurance law and every State set up State employment services. A few States passed "little Wagner" acts, and many passed laws similar to the Federal anti-injunction law.

Child-labor and school-attendance laws, workmen's compensation laws, industrial homework laws, and industrial safety codes were all greatly strengthened. Connecticut in 1939 re-enacted its minimum-wage law to make it, like the Federal act, applicable to men, as well as to women and minors. Fifteen new laws in the minimum-wage field brought the roster of those with such laws to 28 States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico by 1941.

World War II and Beyond

During World War II, while there were many temporary relaxations of legislation, particularly in the child-labor and women's hours fields, there was no general permanent loss of standards. In fact, two new types of labor laws had their origin about this time.

One of these was legislation to provide benefits for unemployment due to non-work-connected illness, called temporary disability insurance laws. The pioneer State in this field was Rhode Island in 1942. Since then California, New Jersey, and New York have also adopted such laws.

The other new type was the fair employment practice acts designed to eliminate discriminatory employment practices based on race, creed, color, or ancestry. Laws of this type were first passed in New York and New Jersey in 1945. Other States have followed their example.

Minimum-wage laws were passed in five States not previously having such legislation: in Idaho, New Mexico, and Wyoming in 1955, in Vermont in 1957, and in North Carolina in 1959. All of these acts applied to both men and women, and all set statutory minimum-wage rates. In 1955 three new equal-pay laws were passed--in Arkansas, Colorado, and Oregon--and Hawaii, Ohio, and Wyoming adopted such legislation in 1959. In the last few years, also, one-fourth of the jurisdictions have enacted legislation to deal with special health and safety hazards involved in developing atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

A shift in legislative policy occurred in the 'forties in connection with labor-management relations legislation. The trend began in the late 'thirties and reached its peak in 1947 when 30 States passed regulatory measures affecting unions and union activity. These included laws prohibiting or placing restrictions on union-security agreements; regulating picketing, strikes, and the check-off; prohibiting secondary boycotts or jurisdictional disputes; providing for compulsory arbitration of controversies affecting a public utility; and those affecting the internal affairs of unions. While since 1947 a few of these have been repealed, others have been passed, including a few "right-to-work"laws, which are now in effect in 19 States. (One additional State has a right-to-work act, but it is applicable to agricultural laborers and certain processors only.)

In the Federal field, the Wagner Act was replaced by the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 (the Taft-Hartley Act). Under this law, employment discrimination based on an employee's union membership or activity or his nonmembership or refraining from union activity was prohibited on the part of both employers and labor organizations. The closed shop was banned; the union shop and check-off were permitted under certain conditions. Secondary boycotts, under most circumstances, and jurisdictional strikes were prohibited. A detailed definition of collective bargaining requiring 60-day notice of change or termination of contracts was one of the innovations of this law. The act also provided procedures to cope with strikes affecting the national health or safety.

In 1958, the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act was passed, which requires administrators of welfare or pension benefit plans to make copies of the description of such plans and their latest annual reports available for examination by any participant, and to file copies of such descriptions and reports with the U. S. Department of Labor. This was followed in 1959 by the enactment of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, the purposes of which are to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations, employers, and labor relations consultants to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, and to provide procedures with respect to the election and removal of officers of labor organizations. It also regulates organizational and recognition picketing, and makes certain other limited amendments to the Labor Management Relations Act. As it affects State legislation, one of its main provisions was to permit the States to regulate labor relations in the former so-called "no-man's land"--those cases that were formerly refused by the Federal Board but forbidden to the States to handle. Thus the jurisdiction of the States has been greatly enhanced.

The Present Picture

Looking back over the last half century, it is evident that much progress has been made in enacting labor legislation favorable to the worker. For instance, today:

> Every jurisdiction has a workmen's compensation law, a child-labor law, an unemployment insurance law, and free employment services.

Minimum-wage legislation is now on the statute books of 33 States, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia. Of these, the laws of 15 States and Puerto Rico apply to persons regardless of sex. Wage payment laws are in effect in all but three States, with wage collection provisions included in over one-third of the laws.

As to working conditions for women, forty-three States and the District of Columbia regulate working hours; nearly half establish a 6-day week; over half provide for meal periods and several for rest periods; all but four have laws requiring seating facilities. Twenty-two States now have equal pay laws.

Laws granting general rule-making authority in the field of occupational safety are in effect in 41 jurisdictions and most of these have utilized this authority to a con iderable extent.

Private employment agencies are regulated by law in all but six jurisdictions.

All but five jurisdictions have a State mediation service. Fourteen jurisdictions have State labor relations acts.

Temporary disability insurance laws are in effect in four States.

Fair employment practice acts are in effect in 21 States and Puerto Rico, and laws against discrimination in employment providing for voluntary compliance are in effect in three others. Laws prohibiting discrimination against older workers are in effect in 12 States and Puerto Rico.

Twenty-nine jurisdications have laws setting up apprenticeship programs, while apprenticeship agencies have been established under the supervision of the Governor or the Commissioner of Labor in three others.

Certainly the worker's lot during this time has been immeasurably improved. Yet, as shown above, there are States that have adopted only a few of the protective laws. In addition, of the laws already in existence, many are inadequate. Only a few States have strong coordinated labor departments; few have adequate staff or facilities. Much remains to be done in every field--such as extending coverage so the laws will apply to all workers rather than exempting certain groups; enacting minimum-wage and equal-pay laws in additional States; raising benefits for unemployed and disabled workers; and improving safety practices to cut down occupational accidents.

7 Win $8,000 After Illegal Firing in Norfolk

NORFOLK, Va.—Illegally fired by the Virginia Tomato Co. in September 1963, seven Local 26 members have received a total of $8,000 in back pay recently through an NLRB trial examiner's decision.

The local organized the shop and won an NLRB election and a first contract in July 1963. While the plant, then owned by the Lewis Tomato Co., was closed down for the summer, it was sold to the Virginia company. When Virginia reopened the plant in September of that year, it refused to rehire any former employees or to bargain with the local, and the union filed unfair labor practice charges.

NLRB trial examiner Samuel M. Singer heard the case and ordered the company to reinstate the seven union members with back pay. Five are now back at Virginia, while the others declined reinstatement.

Eighteen other workers were fired at the same time, but they did not testify at the board hearing, and the examiner said he did not have sufficient evidence to order their reinstatement.

The firm now employs 15 workers, and Local 26 is continuing its re-organizing efforts at the shop.

"I hope that we'll be able to bring it back into the local soon," Pres. Lock Parker said.

Overtime pay ruling won for Navy workers

The Navy disregarded rights guaranteed under the union contract when it arbitrarily changed the work week of storeroom and warehouse employees at the Charleston, S.C., Naval Shipyard last summer.

That is the ruling of an impartial arbitrator in a work week dispute between the Navy and the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council of Charleston, Johann D. Bose, financial secretary of IAM Lodge 694, reports.

Lodge 694 is an affiliate of the Council. Bose is chairman of its grievance committee.

The storeroom and warehouse employees worked Monday through Friday, the basic work week agreed upon in a contract negotiated by the Metal Trades Council at the shipyard last May. The Navy also assigned these employees to work Saturday and Sunday but paid them the overtime rate as required under the union contract.

Without consulting the union, the Navy last summer changed the storeroom and warehouse employees' work week so some worked three days on the day shift and two days on the night shift and some had to work Saturdays and Sundays without being paid overtime.

Robert M. Steedley, one of those ordered to work Saturday and Sunday without receiving overtime pay, charged a violation of the union contract. The Metal Trades Council took the case to arbitration, the first such action under the nine-month-old contract.

The Navy tried to claim it has a right to establish any work week any time without consulting the union.

The union showed that the Navy paid supervisors the overtime rate while unfairly requiring other employees to accept regular wage rates for Saturday and Sunday work.

The contract calls for a normal work week extending from Monday through Friday and requires the Navy to consult with the union before changing it, the union pointed out.

The arbitrator, after getting the facts, told the Navy to reinstate the Monday-through-Friday basic work week for store room and warehouse employees and to get together with the union before changing it.

The next move is up to the Navy. Presidential Executive Order 10988, under which the arbitrator made his ruling, directs that such rulings be advisory instead of mandatory. Executive Order 10988 spells out collecting bargaining rights of Federal employees.

Grand Lodge Rep. Desford Smith, Saul S. Stein, recording secretary of the Metal Trades Council, and Bose presented the union's case.

Court upsets plant closing, OK's lockout

labor law

In labor decisions last week the U.S. Supreme Court laid down these two principles:

► A multi-plant corporation cannot close one plant to avoid a union if its motive is also to discourage organizing throughout the chain.

Justice Harlan

► Lockouts by employers are legal in certain circumstances if they are not motivated by anti-union bias or other illegal purposes, but have basic economic motives.

The tactic of closing one plant to discourage organizing in the rest of the chain has long been a policy of some big corporations.

The high court ruled out this practice in a unanimous opinion by the seven Justices participating. The decision, written by Justice M. Harlan, came in a famous case involving Darlington Manufacturing Co., Darlington, S.C., part of a 27-plant textile chain.

The company president, Roger Millikin, closed that mill in 1956 after the employees voted for the Textile Workers Union in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The company president, Roger Millikin, closed that mill in 1956 after the employees voted for the Textile Workers Union in a National Labor Relations Board election.

Holding that an employer objecting to a union can go out of business entirely if he wants, the Supreme Court declared:

Partial closing unfair

"A partial closing is an unfair labor practice if innovated by a purpose to chill unionism in any of the remaining plants of a single employer and if the employer may reasonably have seen that such a closing will likely have that effect."

The court sent the case back to the Labor Board for further findings as to the effect of the Darlington, S.C., closing on employees in other plants in the company's chain. The NLRB has held that the company closed the plant to avoid the union. The company argued it was for economic reasons only.

In two decisions involving lockouts the Supreme Court reversed the Labor Board. The Board had held the employers were guilty of an unfair labor practice in each case.

Replacements hired

One involved a Retail Clerks dispute at Carlsbad, N.M., where the Clerks struck one of five grocery stores with which they were bargaining jointly. The other four stores promptly locked out their union employees, hired temporary replacements and kept on operating.

The court called it a legitimate defense against a so-called "whipsaw" strike.

The other lockout case involved the American Shipbuilding Co. and eight unions at four Great Lakes yards. The court held the employer had a right to close down its Chicago and Buffalo yards in 1961 for legitimate economic reasons when negotiations broke down.

The so-called "Right-to-Work" without a union is just about the only "right" guaranteed by law in the 19 "Right-to-Work" states. The only exception is Nevada.

On laws protecting workers, these states lag far behind the rest of the nation. As the table shows:

Misnamed "Right-to-Work" laws hold back union organizing and bargaining. As a result, labor in those states lacks the strength to win protective laws. Here are the specifics:

Unemployment Insurance—Almost half the states without "Right-to-Work" laws provide benefits of $48 a week or more and 24 of the 32 provide at least $40 a week. Among the 19 "Right-to-Work" states only one meets the $48 a week standard and only six pay $40.

Workmen's Compensation—Nearly all states free of "Right-to-Work" restrictions pay at least $40 a week to a temporarily disabled worker. Less than half the "Right-to-Work" states meet this standard.

Wages & Hours—A good majority of the free states have a minimum wage law calling for at least $1 an hour and a higher rate for overtime. Only a handful of "Right-to-Work" states have such laws.

Fair Employment Practices—Only one "Right-to-Work" state has such a statute. Twenty-two states free from "Right-to-Work" laws have FEPC laws.

Repeal by Congress of Sec. 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act would end "Right-to-Work" laws.

So-Called RTW Laws Holding South Back

Carolina Labor News 4/23/65

Low factory wages and so-called "right-to-work" laws go hand in hand. This is borne out by U.S. Labor Dept. figures for 1963, the latest year for which all the facts are available.

While the average hourly factory wage that year for the U.S. as a whole was $2.46, here are the averages in the 15 southern states for the same year (*indicates "right-to-work" state):

1. W. Virginia $2.61
2. Maryland 2.48
3. Louisiana 2.39
4. Texas 2.35*
5. Kentucky 2.34
6. Oklahoma 2.27
7. Alabama 2.11*
8. Florida 2.06*
9. Tennessee 1.96*
10. Virginia 1.96*
11. Georgia 1.83*
12. Arkansas 1.82*
13. S. Carolina 1.71*
14. Mississippi 1.69*
15. N. Carolina 1.68*

You will note that wages in the five southern states free from misnamed "right-to-work" top those in every "right-to-work" state of the South except Texas, the most industrialized.

Even Texas compares poorly with other industrial states, such as California, $2.88; Ohio, $2.83, and Illinois, $2.67. None of these has a "right-to-work" law.

To keep southern states from falling further behind the nation as a whole, labor seeks repeal of Sec. 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. This is the federal law that permits states to enact so-called "right-to-work" statutes.

NLRB Weighs Charges at Broom Firm

AUTAUGAVILLE, Ala.—The NLRB will hold a hearing June 1 on the RWDSU's unfair labor practice charges and refusal to bargain charge against the Crystal Lake Broom and Mop Co. The union is asking the board to name it as bargaining agent for the 90 employees without an election.

The charges are based on the company's conduct during an organizing drive at the company last fall and winter. Under a year-old board policy, the Bernel doctrine, if the NLRB finds that both the charges are true and that the company destroyed the union's majority, it may grant the union bargaining rights without an election.

Org. Henry Jenkins is confident of a favorable decision.

The Crystal Lake case has some unusual aspects, even for an anti-union small town in the deep South. Last September, having signed up a majority of the company's employees, the union asked the owner for a meeting to discuss recognition. The management refused. The union then petitioned the NLRB for an election, which was set for Nov. 13.

But long before the election, the company began its anti-union work. It threatened reprisals if the workers voted for the union, threatened to close the plant permanently, and brought in state highway patrolmen to intimidate the workers, most of whom are Negroes. In an atmosphere where a free choice was impossible, the RWDSU lost the election by a 51-31 margin.

When the RWDSU protested the result, the board threw the result out and ordered a second election. But a week before that one, in January, the union asked the board to cancel it because the company was up to its old tricks, again making a free election impossible.

The union has continued to organize among the workers.

"The campaign is holding up and we're still meeting with the people regularly," Jenkins said.

being pressed by RWDSU locals in three different areas of the country.

Case History No. 1: In Autaugaville, Alabama, a clear majority of the workers at Crystal Lake Broom Works joined the union. The employer then went to work with the particular technique of a Southern employer: There was the usual interrogation of employees, letters with false information about the union, threats to close the plant, etc. But the workers held fast. So state highway patrolmen and sheriff's deputies were thrown into the breach. The highway patrolmen —who are whites—stopped cars going into the plant to intimidate the workers—most of whom are Negroes; checked the licenses of drivers; walked through the plant with the owner. Sheriff's deputies and a co-owner of the plant drove up to a house where a union meeting was being held, ordered the union leader to unlock his car and searched it, then blocked the driveway so that other union supporters could not attend the meeting.

3-Point Program:

Steps Urged to Speed Labor Board Justice

Labor South

Detroit—Accelerated procedures to speed the slow pace of justice for victims of unfair labor practices have been proposed by the National Labor Relations Board's principal legal adviser.

The NLRB could take one or all of the following steps to shorten the time lag caused by the mounting pressure of rising caseloads, Solicitor William Feldesman told the Michigan State Bar's labor relations section: AFL-CIO News

- Revive the late Pres. Kennedy's Reorganization Plan No. 5, which would have authorized NLRB trial examiners to issue final decisions and orders in certain "uncomplicated" types of cases, subject to discretionary board review.
- Set up an automatic court review plan under which a board order would be enforced by court decree unless an aggrieved party applied to the court within 30 days for a review of the NLRB's decision. 10/16/65
- Give NLRB regional directors more authority to make final decisions in unfair practice cases, subject to possible review by the board and the courts.

Reorganization Plan No. 5 was killed by the House of Representatives in 1961. Its aim was to enable an injured party to get a quick decision without a "full dress review" in unfair practice cases falling into well-defined areas of policy and law, and involving only uncomplicated issues of fact.

"There is much truth in the maxim 'justice delayed is justice denied,' " Feldesman told the bar association group. "Multiple levels of review . . . are ordinarily superfluous in certain classes of cases, bringing unneeded delay."

The automatic court review plan, as Feldesman saw it, would not solve any problem of delay before the board issued an order but would speed final decisions by cutting down the time between NLRB order and court decree, the solicitor explained.

The proposal to give regional directors more authority in unfair practice cases was made by retired Circuit Court Judge Henry Friendly in the American Bar Association Journal. Feldesman would modify the plan, but urged that it be analyzed and studied.

"Is it really sensible that if Jim Smith loses his job for a couple of months through discriminatory discharge, he should have to wait several years for the few hundred dollars he needs now? Ought we not think such an unthinkable thought as that of vesting final decision in such minor matters in NLRB regional directors, without review . . .?"

Feldesman said he agrees with Friendly's approach to speedier justice but added that, though Smith's backpay may be a "trifling sum," he has been injured in other respects—"he has been discriminated against, restrained and coerced in his privilege freely to join or not join a union."

But there are other victims, said Feldesman, declaring that "public rights, not the satisfaction of a private claim, are at stake."

Walsh-Healey Act, Passed in Depression To Prop Wages, Shows Little Sign of Life

By JOHN A. GRIMES
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—Labor Department officials and some business representatives are tiptoeing about a seemingly lifeless body of labor-management law. Both groups are avoiding any suggestion that it might be dead, yet hardly a breath of life can be detected.

The "corpse" is the Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, viewed by many employers as a thorn in their sides ever since it was enacted in 1936. The law empowers the Secretary of Labor to set minimum wages for businesses selling the Government more than $10,000 in goods under a single contract. The law originally aimed largely to combat wage-cutting in Depression days, but many businessmen have long lambasted it as forcing unrealistic and inflationary wage increases.

In all, 121 wage floors have been set under the law, affecting some of the nation's biggest industries. In recent years, the Labor Department announced half a dozen rulings a year. But for nearly two years, no determinations have been issued, and none is in sight. The reason: A pair of damaging court decisions in actions brought by industry groups. One decision apparently barred the Labor Secretary from setting certain wage minimums, and the other in effect opened to the scrutiny of objecting employers some information the Labor Department collected on a confidential basis.

"Don't Stir Things Up"

Yet rather than sounding gleeful victory cries, business opponents of the law are taking care to say little. "We don't want to say it's dead because we might get something in its place that we don't like either," says one. "Let's don't stir things up."

Federal officials hotly retort, for the record, that rumors of Walsh-Healey's demise are greatly exaggerated. Almost any day they assert, it will spring to life again. Union strategists urging a revival contend that even in a rising economy the law can "bolster the lower end of the wage spread" and that in another recession it could help avert outright reductions.

But the law's administrators aren't at all certain how a resurrection can be accomplished. "We have a number of possible new procedures under study," declares Max Schiferl, assistant administrator of the department's wage, hour and public contracts division, "but we aren't ready to discuss them."

Other officials take a dimmer view of prospects for any early revival of Walsh-Healey. "I think the thing has all kinds of problems," says one.

What Do the Words Mean?

The problems plaguing the law are but the latest in its troubled history. Sponsored by then Sen. David I. Walsh and then Rep. Arthur D. Healey, both Democrats from Massachusetts, the act sought to prevent both wage-cutting and a possible breakdown of health, safety and other working conditions below the standards required under the National Recovery Act after it was declared unconstitutional in 1935. Soon after it became law in 1936, Walsh-Healey ran into trouble: The law's mandate that persons employed in making or furnishing goods to the Government will be paid "not less than the minimum wages as determined by the Secretary of Labor to be the prevailing minimum wages for persons employed on similar work or in the particular or similar industries or groups of industries currently operating in the locality" bred numerous business-vs.-Government conflicts as to just what the words meant and how they should be applied.

One of the more recent clashes came in 1962, when the Scientific Apparatus Makers Association and the Electronic Industries Association disputed proposed minimums of $1.35 an hour for the electrical indicating instruments and service test equipment branch of the electronics industry and $1.50 an hour for other branches. These minimums, it was argued, would lead to average hourly wage increases of 6.9 cents and 8.8 cents and would breach the Administration's anti-inflation guidelines based on productivity gains of around 6 cents an hour. But Labor Secretary Wirtz in effect rejected these contentions.

During the years since World War II, issuance of new wage determinations has become increasingly difficult, partly as the result of a 1952 amendment sponsored by Democratic Sen. Fulbright of Arkansas, calling for judicial review of the Labor Secretary's actions under the law. Business has responded by more frequent court tests.

The most recent and most effective challenges have come from machine-tool and electrical manufacturers. In one case, several machine-tool concerns disputed Secretary Wirtz's authority under the law to establish two different minimums for different occupations within the same industry, saying he could set only a single rate. (He made a separate determination of $1.65 an hour for blueprint-machine operators and draftsmen after decreeing a $1.80 minimum for all other workers covered.) A Federal district court ruled against the Secretary, the Government appealed and the appeals court sent the case back to the Labor Department, where it currently rests.

Later Ruling More Damaging

This case apparently confirmed that the Fulbright amendment did effectively provide for judicial review, but a second decision is considered more damaging to continued administration of the law.

Starting in 1961, several motor and generator manufacturers, led by the National Electrical Manufacturers Association, sought to examine Bureau of Labor Statistics data on which the Secretary's wage determination for that industry was based; they claimed there were numerous errors and discrepancies in the Government data.

A Federal court overturned a Labor Department hearing examiner's decision that the manufacturers weren't entitled to view the data, and in a decision that sent chills through the department, a concurring appeals court majority declared: "Ordinarily the Government cannot take action adverse to a citizen, in an administrative decision aimed directly at him or his group, without disclosing the evidence on which it relies."

"New Procedures" Sought

The problems raised by this decision are, it's agreed, more than considerable. Letting employers examine Bureau of Labor Statistics information on which wage determinations are based would "put the BLS out of business," one official contends; the bureau would no longer be able to insure the secrecy of information given to it.

Thus the task of reviving Walsh-Healey is centering on what "new procedures" can be developed to comply with the decision on disclosure. It is a task that appears fraught with problems; the prospect of having to collect wage information under Government subpoena, as a possible substitute, "has caused considerable concern," says one Labor Department official.

Whatever the solution attempted, it's highly likely that any new Walsh-Healey determination issued will immediately be challenged in court. "I anticipate that litigation will continue to haunt this statute," declares one Federal official.

Added to these problems is the opinion among some scholars, and even some of Walsh-Healey's friends, that the law in its present state is incapable of producing the desired results rapidly enough. It's their view that rather than a patchwork repair job of "new procedures," the law needs a full legislative overhaul or else should be shelved.

For their part, union supporters don't want the law shelved, but they do want it to operate more quickly. A prime union criticism is that Walsh-Healey wage rulings take so long to put in effect that the minimums established by the Labor Secretary's orders are perennially outdated.

Herbert C. Morton, a Brookings Institution scholar who has just completed a study of the statute, concludes that it might as well be dead. He finds "the wage determination program has been ineffective" and, even if improved, "doesn't have a high priority today." He reasons that in low-wage industries today, Walsh-Healey wage determinations would be the same or only slightly higher than the general $1.25-an-hour minimum set by the Fair Labor Standards Act.

"Congress could well repeal the act without fearing that in doing so it was discarding a valuable instrument for protecting the welfare of the worker," Mr. Morton declares. He does recommend, however, that the act be kept on the books, if only as a Government statement of principle on wages and working conditions.

Union Organizers Given Equal Time—and Space

An employer who abused his free-speech rights has been ordered by the National Labor Relations Board to give union organizers the right to present their views to workers at meetings on company time and property.

Facilities "customarily used for employe meetings" shall be made available to the union for a one-hour meeting at each of the H. W. Elson Bottling Co.'s two plants in Marquette and Ishpeming, Mich., the board ruled in what it said was an attempt to "recreate the conditions and relationships" formerly existing before Elson management launched an unlawful campaign against the unaffiliated Teamsters Local 328.

Elson employes started their own organizing campaign in May 1964 and then went to Local 328 for information. Within a few days 11 of the 23 workers signed membership applications.

Management, the NLRB reported, then "embarked upon a campaign of coercive speeches," threatened employes with layoffs and curtailed plant operations, and promised wage increases.

As part of its unlawful campaign, the board said, the company called employes into the office one by one to give them an "opportunity" to sign either of two documents—one a notice of withdrawal from the union, the other a disclaimer of interest.

One form or the other was signed by all 12 union applicants and 11 who had not yet joined. Then, said the NLRB, management "put the promised wage and commission increases into effect and rejected the union's bargaining request because all its employes had 'voluntarily' signed."

The board declared it would be an "anomaly" if an employer were barred, as he is, from destroying a union's majority but permitted to prevent such a majority status from ever being attained.

Rejecting the union's request for an order compelling the company to bargain with it, the NLRB instead ordered Elson to mail notices to all workers that it will stop interfering with their rights; grant the union "reasonable" access to its bulletin boards for organizing purposes; and permit the union to hold one employe meeting in each plant. If management complies, the NLRB then will conduct an election upon request by the union, the board ruled.

Employer Ordered To Rehire Brother

AFL-CIO News Dec 25, 1965

An employer violated the Taft-Hartley Act when he fired his brother—a $10,000-a-year man—from his desk job and had him removed as a company director for testifying "unfavorably" in a National Labor Relations Board hearing, an NLRB trial examiner has ruled.

The law protects any person, regardless of his status, who is penalized for testifying in answer to an NLRB subpoena, Examiner Louis Libbin held.

It makes no difference, the examiner wrote, that George Liberman was a 20 percent owner of the Valley Forge Flag Co. in the Reading, Pa., area, and was not a supervisor or production worker when his brother Sidney fired him after George testified at a labor board Sept. 9 and 11, 1964.

The law must be applied, Libbin ruled, even though George Liberman set up the Betsy Ross Flag Co. after being fired by Valley Forge and now competes actively with the firm that fired him.

It may be true, said Libbin, "that George's operation of this competing business may have been brought about by . . . unlawful reprisals against him" but "I do not believe it will effectuate" the law to have as a company director a person who is actively operating a competing business.

Therefore he offered George his choice of remedies:

- Valley Forge shall offer to restore George to his former position and salary if within a reasonable time he divests himself of all connection with the competing firm.
- Valley Forge shall make George whole for any loss of earnings from Jan. 1, 1965, to the date of an offer to reinstate him, plus interest at 6 percent but minus his net earnings during that period.

In either case, Valley Forge must post notices of any NLRB order that later issues.

Affiliates Boost Victory Ratio In NLRB Votes

AFL-CIO unions increased their share of election victories in 1965, the National Labor Relations Board has reported.

Affiliates won 58.6 percent of the elections in which they participated in the first half of 1965, and 57.5 percent in the second half. Their percentage of wins was 55.7 in 1964's latter half, 52.2 in the first half, according to NLRB records.

A report for the last half of 1965 showed that for elections participated in by AFL-CIO unions, there were 109,681 eligible members in units won by affiliates, 4,631 in units won by the ousted Teamsters, 17,037 in units won by other unaffiliated unions, 103,987 where no union was chosen.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council reported at the convention last December in San Francisco that affiliated unions participated in nearly 10,500 NLRB elections in the 23-month period ending May 31, 1965, and won approximately 5,800, or 55.2 percent.

Through such victories, the council said, AFL-CIO unions won bargaining rights for some 425,000 workers.

Court Upholds Union Right to Proof When Company Pleads 'Competition'

Portland, Ore.—An employer who refuses a union request for a wage increase on the ground of competitive disadvantage is obliged to supply proof asked by the union, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled.

The decision, upholding a National Labor Relations order that the Western Wirebound Box Co. here must bargain in good faith with the Woodworkers and Local 3-3, will strengthen the position of union bargainers everywhere, IWA Vice Pres. Ronald F. Roley asserted.

The court in its decision related that, in negotiations beginning May 1, 1962, management had countered the union's proposal for a wage hike of 10 cents an hour with an offer to cut wages —first by 8 cents an hour, then 4 cents—or to keep them unchanged.

Company Pres. Walter W. Green said price-cutting by competitors made wage hikes impractical, but refused information on productivity and production costs asked by the union.

The IWA local struck June 11, 1962, when the firm refused to supply the requested data and offered a wage boost of 2.5 cents an hour only to employes called "enders." The workers stayed out for approximately three years before the strike was finally terminated by stipulation.

The appeals court cited a leading case—NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co.—in which the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a labor board bargaining order and said:

"Good faith bargaining necessarily requires that claims made by either bargainer should be honest claims. This is true about an asserted inability to pay an increase in wages. If such an argument is important enough to present in the give and take of bargaining it is important enough to require some sort of proof of its accuracy."

Reasoning of Court

The appeals court judges commented: "We see no reason why, under the same rationale, an employer who insistently asserts that competitive disadvantage precludes him from acquiescing in a union wage demand does not have a like duty to come forward, on request, with some substantiation."

In both cases, the judges ruled, the give and take of collective bargaining is "hampered and rendered ineffectual when an employer mechanically repeats his claim but makes no effort to produce substantiating data."

This kind of conduct, they declared, runs counter to the labor law "which admonishes both employes and employers to 'exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements concerning rates of pay, hours and working conditions.'"

The hallmark of lawfully adequate negotiations is good faith, and "good faith contemplates that both negotiating parties will do what is reasonably possible to reach agreements," the court said.

Negotiations may be at arm's length but "this does not contemplate erection of artificial barriers and resort to patent technicalities to obfuscate the proceedings," it concluded.

AFL-CIO News 2/12/66

The National Labor Relations Board has adopted a new rule requiring employers to furnish, for union use, names and addresses of employes eligible to vote in any representation election it schedules.

The rule requires management to provide the employe roster within seven days of board action setting an election date.

The unanimous decision of the five-member NLRB was reached Feb. 6 to become effective 30 days later.

The board refused to set aside the results of elections lost by unions which had earlier been denied a list of names and addresses by employers.

The ruling went part way in meeting the request of the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions for improvement in NLRB election rules. The board, however, ruling in two related "captive audience" cases, rejected union requests for a rule requiring equal time for unions to address employes on premises used by an employer to defeat union organizing attempts.

Calling union attention to the new names-and-addresses rule, the board said it should "provide employes with increased opportunity for communication from all sides in pre-election campaigning."

The board therefore deferred reconsideration of other present rules—which do not usually permit unions equal time to address workers on company premises—until after the effects of the new rule become known.

The decisions came in these four cases:

- Excelsior Underwear Inc. and Saluda Knitting Inc., where on Dec. 6, 1963, employes at two Saluda, S.C., plants voted 206-35 against representation by the Clothing Workers.
- K. L. Kellogg & Sons, Long Beach, Calif., where workers turned down Operating Engineers Local 3 and Local 12 in a 21-9 mail ballot vote held May 15-28, 1964.
- General Electric Co., Los Angeles, where the vote in an election Aug. 26, 1964, was 31 for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, 39 against.
- McCulloch Corp., Somerset, Ky., where the result in an election June 6, 1963, was 571 for, 656 against the Auto Workers.

In the GE and McCulloch cases, the unions asked for new elections on the ground that the employers had made "captive audience" speeches to employes but denied equal access to union representatives. In Excelsior and Kellogg, the unions asked new elections because the employers had refused their requests for names and addresses of employes eligible to vote.

The board certified the results of three elections and in the McCulloch Corp. case—denied the UAW's request for review of a regional director's decision certifying the results, but set forth the names-and-addresses rule for the future.

The NLRB cited its mandate from Congress to see that elections are conducted fairly. Such elections, it reasoned, should give employes an opportunity to vote "under circumstances that are free not only from interference, restraint or coercion" but also from "other elements that prevent or impede a free and reasoned choice."

The board noted the common requirement that names and addresses of voters shall be posted in political election and in corporate management or proxy contests among stockholders, and specifically cited the Landrum-Griffin Act provision that any candidate for union office is entitled to have the union distribute his campaign statements to all members.

The AFL-CIO had filed a "friend of the court" brief supporting the unions claim for new elections.

Names Needed

As to name-and-address lists, the federation asserted in its brief and in oral argument that "a fair and free election cannot be held when the union lacks names and addresses of employes eligible to vote" and the employer rejects request for them.

Though union organizing committees now spend a third or more of their time trying to run down names and addresses, they ordinarily have finished campaigns lacking almost half the total number, the AFL-CIO reported.

California Union Gain Greatest in 8 Years

NLRB RULES EMPLOYERS MUST GIVE UNIONS PAYROLL DATA IN ELECTIONS

Carolina Labor News 2/18/66

WASHINGTON—The National Labor Relations Board has adopted a new rule requiring employers to furnish, for union use, names and addresses of employes eligible to vote in any representation election date. The unanimous decision was reached Feb. 6 to become effective 30 days later.

The board refused to set aside the results of elections lost by unions which had earlier been denied names and addresses by employers.

The ruling went part way in meeting the request of the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions for improvement in NLRB election rules. The board, however, ruling in two related "captive audience" cases, rejected union requests for a rule requiring equal time for unions to address employes on premises used by an employer to defeat union organizing attempts.

Calling union attention to the new names-and-addresses rule, the board said it should "provide employes with increased opportunity for communication from all sides in pre-election campaigning."

The board therefore deferred reconsideration of other present board rules, which do not usually permit unions equal time to address workers on company premises, until after the effects of the new rule became known.

The rulings came in four cases:

● Excelsior Underwear, Inc., and Saluda Knitting, Inc., where on Dec. 6, 1963, employes at two Saluda, S.C., plants voted 35-206 against representation by the Clothing Workers.

● K. L. Kellogg & Sons, Long Beach, Calif., where workers turned down Operating Engineers Local 3 and Local 12 in a 21-9 vote (mail ballot) held May 15-28, 1964.

● General Electric Co., Los Angeles, where the vote in an election Aupg. 26, 1964, was 31 for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, 39 against.

● McCulloch Corp., Somerset, Ky., where the result in an election June 6, 1963, was 571 for, 656 against the Auto Workers.

In the GE and McCulloch cases the unions asked for new elections on the ground that the employers had made "captive audience" speeches to employes but denied equal access to union representatives. In Exelsior and Kellogg, the unions asked new elections because the employers had refused their requests for names and addresses of employes eligible to vote.

The board certified the results of three elections and in the McCulloch Corp. case denied the UAW's request for review of a regional director's decision certifying the results, but set forth the names-and-addresses rule for the future.

The NLRB cited its mandate from Congress to see that elections are conducted fairly. Such elections, the board reasoned, should give employes an opportunity to vote "under circumstances that are free not only from interference, restraint or coercion" but also from "other elements that prevent or impede a free and reasoned choice."

The board noted the common requirement that names and addresses of voters shall be posted in political elections, in corporate management or proxy contests among stockholders, and specifically cited the Landrum-Griffin Act provision that any candidate for union office is entitled to have the union distribute his campaign statements to all members.

NLRB Cancels Election Loss, Cites Anti-Union Campaign by Community

Labor-Law: AFL-CIO News 2/19/66

The National Labor Relations Board, citing an inflammatory anti-union campaign by community leaders in Mississippi's Simpson County, set aside a 1965 election lost by the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and ordered a new vote free of hostile pressures.

The unanimous order upholding IBEW unfair practice charges was issued despite a recent agreement between the union and the company that benefited from the community campaign—the Universal Manufacturing Corp. They signed contract terms Jan. 31 which gave 950 members of IBEW Local 2198 increases of 46 cents an hour and other benefits.

The board set aside the election, held Apr. 23, 1965, on the ground that actions by community leaders, who had backed a $1.2 million bond issue for the company's plant in Mendenhall, Miss., "rendered impossible the rational, uncoerced selection of a bargaining representative." The board directed a second election at a time to be set by its regional director.

An IBEW spokesman said, however, that since recognition has already been granted, an election would be unnecessary and the union would withdraw its charges.

Employe Targets

In its decision the board related that employes of the company, which makes fluorescent light components, had been the target of strongly anti-union newspaper advertising, editorials, cartoons and handbills between Mar. 5 and Apr. 23 last year which:

- Made inflammatory, irrelevant appeals to racial feelings.
- Linked unions, civil rights and communism as parts of a "single pernicious entity" and implied that union dues would reach Communist Party coffers.
- Threatened possible plant closure and blacklisting of union members from other employment in the area.

The board voided the election, lost by a vote of 287-272, because the employes, "faced with pressures of this sort, were inhibited from freely exercising their choice in the election."

The NLRB noted that the only two area newspapers had rejected union advertisements while accepting ads and editorials opposing the union. The ads in one paper were paid for by "Friends and Neighbors of Simpson County" and in the other by the editor, one of a number of business and professional men organized by the company's attorney.

The board found also that the union could not rent suitable meeting places and had to hold meetings near Jackson, Miss., 30 miles away.

Board members disagreed with the regional director's finding that the "specter of communism introduced into the campaign may be condoned" because it appears so often in campaigns that workers can properly evaluate it. Frequent use, the NLRB said, cannot "blunt the explosive emotional impact" of such a theme.

The company plant was opened in 1963 after Simpson County voters approved a $1.2 million bond issue to finance it and leading citizens established the Universal Advisory Board to work with management.

Fortas Leads Strong Dissent:

Court Ruling Opens Unions to Libel Suits

A closely divided Supreme Court ruled that parties to a labor dispute may sue for libel under state laws if they claim that untrue charges were made with malice and caused provable damage.

The 5-4 decision overruled lower court dismissal of a $1 million libel suit brought by an official of the Pinkerton Detective Agency. The suit was against a Detroit local of the unaffiliated United Plant Guard Workers, two union officers and a Pinkerton employe who circulated a leaflet during an organizing campaign.

A federal district judge and the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals had held that state libel laws did not apply because Congress had given the National Labor Relations Board exclusive jurisdiction to police union representation campaigns.

Justice Tom C. Clark, speaking for the court majority, said the NLRB's concern applies only to the effect of libelous statements on the free choice of workers and provides no redress for "personal injury caused by malicious libel."

Two strong dissents were entered by the minority.

Justice Abe Fortas charged the decision "jeopardizes the measure of stability painstakingly achieved in labor-management relations. It introduces a potentially disruptive device into the comprehensive structure created by Congress for resolving these disputes." He said no libel suit should be allowed in a labor dispute "where the allegedly defamatory statement is confined to matters which are part of the fabric of the dispute."

2 Join Fortas

Fortas was joined in his dissent by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas.

Justice Hugo L. Black, in a separate dissent, said the decision "tosses a monkey wrench into the collective bargaining machinery Congress set up to try to settle labor disputes."

The objective of the National Labor Relations Act, Black stressed, was "to settle disputes—not to aggravate them."

He said it would be "difficult to conceive of an element more certain to create irritations guaranteed to prevent fruitful collective bargaining discussions than the threat or presence of a large monetary judgment gained in a libel suit generating anger and a desire for vengeance."

The court majority acknowledged that it found it "difficult" to draw a line between the area pre-empted by federal labor law and "the traditional concern and responsibility of the state to protect its citizens against defamatory attack."

It noted also that language "commonplace" in labor disputes might be grounds for action under some state laws, without the need to prove specific damage.

The decision sought to meet this problem by declaring:

"We therefore limit the availability of state remedies for libel to those instances in which the complainant can show that the defamatory statements were circulated with malice and caused him damage."

Flaw Noted

It noted that the libel suit brought by the Pinkerton official did not specify the nature of the claimed damages and therefore would not meet the court's criterion. It said the complainant should be given permission to revise his suit if he still wishes the case to go to trial.

The leaflet which touched off the court battle alleged that "Pinkerton guards were robbed of pay increases" and that "Pinkerton managers were lying to us."

The suit was brought by an assistant general manager of the Pinkerton agency, William C. Linn, who claimed that he was one of the managers referred to in the leaflet, and that the statements were "defamatory and untrue."

Previously the agency had filed unfair labor practice charges against the union on the basis of the leaflet, but both the regional director and the NLRB general counsel refused to issue a complaint.

The court majority left open the possibility of reconsideration if the line it sought to draw between state and federal jurisdiction proves through experience to interfere with federal labor policies.

If this should be the case, "the court will be free to reconsider" the issue, the decision noted, since its ruling does not rest on "a constitutional issue, but solely with the degree to which state remedies have been pre-empted" by federal law.

Job Bias Ruling Sustains Charge Brought by Union in Mississippi

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has sustained the first complaint ever filed by a union under the equal employment provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The commission ruled that a Mississippi cottonseed oil firm violated the law in a number of ways, most notably by paying Negro workers inferior wages because of their race.

The Chemical Workers Union, which joined five Negro members in the complaint first filed last December, said the ruling could establish a "yardstick" leading to justice for thousands of workers.

The EEOC report said Planters Manufacturing Co. of Clarksdale, Miss., violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act by:

- "Maintaining segregated restroom, locker room and drinking facilities.
- "Maintaining a discriminatory wage differential between Negro and white employes who perform essentially the same duties.
- "Excluding Negroes from the job classifications of solvent plant operator, solvent plant trainee and in clerical positions.
- "Maintaining a discriminatory system for awarding paid vacations to its employes based upon race."

Commission investigators also concluded that the company "unlawfully discharged" one of the workers as an act of reprisal for filing complaints with EEOC.

Chemical Workers Pres. Walter L. Mitchell said: "The decision could become a veritable Magna Carta for southern workers. The commission is saying that the lack of a rational wage rate structure at a plant can be evidence, on its face, of racial bias.

"The traditional pattern of discrimination has been to provide different rates of pay for Negroes and whites who perform identical jobs, but to divide jobs into 'white' jobs and 'Negro' jobs and to pay Negro jobs at a lower rate than the skills required would justify.

"The Commission took the commendable step of comparing job skills and ratings on a national basis to determine whether the wage differentials in the Mississippi plant were racially motivated. If the agency continues to apply the same yardstick, it will provide justice to thousands of workers in situations unions have been powerless to remedy through collective bargaining."

The next step in the EEOC procedure will be to attempt to conciliate the differences between Planters and the union.

The Chemical Workers and five members of its Local 795 filed suit in federal court last March 10 when EEOC action on their complaint seemed stalled.

Mitchell said the union intended to continue to press the suit, but would be "willing to meet with the company any time to work out an agreement."

The Chemical Workers won a National Labor Relations Board election to obtain bargaining rights for some 120 Planters workers, but have been unable to gain a contract because, it said, the company insisted on retaining those employment practices the EEOC has now called illegal.

The union is represented in the proceeding by the Washington law firm of Feller and Anker.

Supreme Court Rules Management Can Sue For Libelous Statements in a Union Drive

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court cleared the way for management to sue a union under state law for libelous statements made during a union organizing campaign.

The High Court by a 5-to-4 vote, overturned a lower-court ruling that a libelous statement would constitute an unfair labor practice and therefore, under Federal labor law, would be within the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board and outside the reach of state law.

Justice Clark, writing for the majority, was careful to say that even "the most repulsive speech" made during a labor-management fight is immune from state libel laws "provided it falls short of a deliberate or reckless untruth." However, he added, "it must be emphasized that malicious libel enjoys no Constitutional protection in any context. After all, the labor movement has grown up and must assume ordinary responsibilities. The malicious utterance of defamatory statements in any form cannot be condoned and unions should adopt procedures calculated to prevent such abuses." Unions similarly could bring libel suits against management under the ruling.

In other labor-law actions the Supreme Court:

—Agreed to review a lower-court finding that the NLRB shouldn't have stepped into a labor dispute in which contract grievance procedures hadn't been exhausted.

—Left standing a lower-court ruling that will require many labor-relations consultants to disclose to the Government full lists of their corporate clients.

The Libel Case

The libel case stems from a campaign by the United Plant Guards of America to organize Detroit-area employes of Pinkerton's National Detective Agency, Inc. A Pinkerton official, William C. Linn, brought suit under Michigan law, charging the union had made false and defamatory statements about him. The company also filed an unfair-labor-practice action with the NLRB, charging the union had libeled Mr. Linn. But the NLRB, which can issue a cease-and-desist order but can't award damages, declined to issue a complaint against the union.

A lower court, without considering the merits of Mr. Linn's suit, dismissed it on a finding that the matter was solely within the jurisdiction of the NLRB.

The Supreme Court majority, in reversing the lower court, recognized that union organizing campaigns "frequently are characterized by bitter and extreme charges, counter-charges, unfounded rumors, vituperations, personal accusations and distortions. Both labor and management often speak bluntly and recklessly." Justice Clark's opinion said that the NLRB frequently must consider such statements and "it has allowed wide latitude to the competing parties." The board doesn't censor "propaganda" used in representation elections and will set aside an election only where there has been misrepresentation of material facts, Justice Clark said.

Given the board's limitations, the High Court majority decided that state libel laws are a necessary protection for "the defamed individual."

The case concerning labor grievance procedures that the High Court agreed to review involved a United Auto Workers union contract covering employes at Acme Industrial Co.'s Laflin Street plant in Chicago. The NLRB told the High Court that "innumerable collective bargaining agreements" contain grievance procedures and "all are potentially affected . . . in this case."

The UAW contract at the Acme plant provides that if the company moves any plant equipment to a different location, workers may claim jobs in the new location. It also sets procedures for settling grievances arising from that or other provisions of the contract.

The union in 1964 discovered some machinery was being moved and asked the company why it was being transferred and where it was going. The company declined to supply the information. When the union filed an unfair-labor-practice charge, the NLRB decided the union had a right to the information.

An appeals court, however, rejected the board's decision. The lower court held that the union's request for information should have been resolved through the grievance and arbitration machinery provided in the contract. This is the decision the High Court will review.

The Consultants Case

The Supreme Court, in refusing to review the case involving the labor-relations consultant, thus left standing a lower-court decision defining the scope of the 1959 Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act.

The act was designed to expose to public scrutiny the undercover activities of any unethical consultants to either management or labor. But some consultants have asserted that the Labor Department has administered the law to obtain from them data normally held confidential by the recognized private relationship between lawyers and their clients.

The law requires consultants to report, among other things, agreements with employers and fees received for supplying an employer with information about a union or for talking to employe assemblies about union representation, bargaining or strike matters. Each such agreement must be reported with 30 days and any consultant who files such a report also must file an annual summary report. The law gives the Labor Department authority to prescribe the form of the annual report.

R. D. Douglas, Jr., a North Carolina attorney who represents many employers on labor matters, in 1960 and 1961 filed three "initial" reports when on three occasions he addressed employes on behalf of managements involved in labor disputes. The Labor Department demanded that Mr. Douglas include in his annual reports for those two years not only the three speeches but also the names of all his other clients in each year and the fees received from each.

Mr. Douglas refused and brought a test case questioning the Labor Department's authority to prescribe a form of annual report requiring a listing of all clients and fees. He asserted that Congress had specifically exempted from the 30-day initial reporting requirement consultants' agreements made in the normal course of business to give advice to employers, to represent employers before agencies or courts, or to bargain on behalf of employers.

The Labor Department argued that it could require a complete listing of such clients from any consultant who was required to file an annual report by reason of his reported agreements during a year to address employes on an employer's behalf or to supply information about a union.

A Federal district court, finding "ambiguity" in the law, upheld Mr. Douglas' refusal to disclose all clients. But an appeals court reversed the district court's decision. It was the appeals-court ruling in favor of the Labor Department that the Supreme Court left standing.

Review of Antitrust Suit Against National Steel Set

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed to review a lower-court dismissal of a Government antitrust suit challenging National Steel Corp.'s 1959 acquisition of Metallic Building Co.

National acquired the stock of Metallic Building through National's subsidiary, Stran-Steel Corp. Both Stran-Steel and Metallic are producers of prefabricated metal buildings.

The Justice Department filed an antitrust suit, charging that the acquisition tended to lessen competition in the prefabricated-building industry in violation of the Clayton Act. But a lower court dismissed the Government's complaint, finding that the Justice Department had failed to prove its case. Now the Justice Department will have another chance.

Five Days Did It: EV - Labor Law

Taste of Jail Induces Employer to Bargain

Bridgeport, Conn.—A five-day confinement in the Fairfield jail here brought a promise from a laundry official that he will bargain in good faith.

Stephen Vazzano, treasurer of the Savoy Laundry, Inc., in suburban Stratford, Conn., was arrested at the plant Dec. 17 and held in jail until 1 p.m. Dec. 21. The order for his commitment was made by a unanimous three-judge panel of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York City, which released him after his agreement to resume bargaining.

The National Labor Relations Board reported that Vazzano subsequently reached agreement on terms and that talks are continuing on backpay owed employes who were discriminated against.

The writ of attachment, believed the first of the kind in a refusal-to-bargain case, was issued on petition of the NLRB, which told the court that Vazzano had refused to bargain in good faith with Teamsters Local 145 or to give it wage data it asked.

The dispute began in 1961, the NLRB said, when Savoy discontinued its wholesale shirt service department without notifying the union. In 1962 the board ruled this an unfair practice and ordered Savoy to rehire the fired workers with backpay, reinstitute the department and bargain in good faith.

Savoy refused to comply and two years later was ordered by the 2d Circuit Court to reinstate the employes and pay lost wages, Bargaining was resumed, but later broken off again.

A year ago the court rejected Savoy's claim that it had no duty to bargain because the union no longer represented a majority of its employes.

Chief Judge J. Edward Lumbard, in an opinion concurred in by Judges Irving R. Kaufman and Leonard P. Moore, said he recognized that the court's order has in effect "compelled the employes to accept a bargaining representative not of their current choice."

But the union will remain as bargaining representative until the court order is finally complied with or until the Teamsters lose bargaining rights, the court said.

Company Must Give Union Facts On Grievance, High Court Rules

The Supreme Court, reversing the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago, ruled unanimously that an employer is obligated to supply the information a union needs to decide whether to carry a grievance to arbitration.

The case concerned the Acme Industrial Co. of Chicago, which in 1964 refused to give Local 310 of the Auto Workers information it said was necessary to determine whether or not the contract grievance procedure should be followed to arbitration.

The appeals court refused to enforce a National Labor Relations Board order that management should tell the union why and where it was shipping some machinery out of its plant. The judges held that the NLRB could not step in until arbitration had taken place. The Supreme Court disagreed, saying three cases cited by the appeals court as precedents did not fit the facts in the Acme-UAW dispute.

"There can be no question of the general obligation of an employer to provide information . . . needed by the bargaining representative for the proper performance of its duties," said the high court in an opinion written by Justice Potter Stewart.

The duty to bargain "unquestionably extends beyond the period of contract negotiations," the decision continued, "and applies to labor-management relations during the term of an agreement."

"Far from intruding upon the preserve of the arbitrator," the court added, "the board's action was in aid of the arbitral process. Arbitration can function properly only if the grievance procedures leading to it can sift out unmeritorious claims."

Nothing in federal labor law, the court concluded, compels a union to arbitrate without knowing if there is anything to arbitrate.

Transfer Rights

Local 310 had a contract with Acme providing that in the event any equipment was moved to another location, employes affected by the company's decision "may transfer to the new location with full rights and seniority." When management refused to answer questions the union filed 11 grievances which were still pending when the NLRB held hearings on Local 310's charges. Later the board found Acme guilty of refusal to bargain in good faith and ordered it provide the information sought by the union.

In another case, the Supreme Court ruled that the NLRB was justified in deciding that C & C Plywood Corp. should have bargained wth Carpenters Local 2405, Kalispell, Mont., before putting an incentive pay plan into effect.

The 9th Circuit Court declared in 1965 that the NLRB had no jurisdiction to interpret or enforce a contract. It told the board to vacate its order against C & C Plywood and dismiss the complaint "for lack of the board's present jurisdiction" over the dispute.

The high court, in an opinion also written by Justice Stewart, said that "if the board in a case like this had no jurisdiction to consider a collective agreement" prior to a court ruling, labor organizations would "face inordinate delays in obtaining vindication" of their rights.

Time Crucial

"In the labor field, as in few others," the court observed, "time is crucially important in obtaining relief."

In other actions, the Supreme Court agreed to review a 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision denying enforcement of an NLRB order against Great Dane Trailers, Inc., and the action of the 10th Circuit Court, Denver, in setting aside a damage award of $37,988 won by the Denver & Rio Grande Western Railroad Co. from the Railroad Trainmen.

The Great Dane case involved company refusal to give vacation pay to members of Boilermakers' Local 26 who struck in 1963 at the company's Savannah, Ga., plant. The NLRB ruled that the refusal tended to discourage union membership. The 5th Circuit Court, New Orleans, disagreed.

The high court refused to review a ruling by the 2d U.S. Circuit Court that Sheridan Creations, Inc., New York, N.Y., committed an unfair labor practice when it withdrew from a multi-employer bargaining unit in 1963 after negotiations had started. The refusal let stand an NLRB ruling that the firm could not withdraw without getting the union's consent.

Unions' Solidarity Wins Three-Month GE Strike

Schenectady, N.Y.—Four unions preserved a united front throughout a three-month strike at the big General Electric Co. plant here and won through to victory simultaneously.

Local 301 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers ratified a contract settlement Dec. 30 but none of its 11,000 members returned to work for 10 days pending settlement of three other contracts.

Four unions downed tools in October when GE management refused to settle disputes over local issues. All returned Jan. 9—the IUE, Plumbers, Technical Engineers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Local 301 said its new pact includes elimination of three planned transition paycuts; elimination of incentive language; job evaluations for 2,000 employes, with "red circle" rates for long-service employes; payment for union representatives for time spent in discussing job reviews with management, and an agreement to hold periodic meetings to discuss general plant problems.

For the Plumbers' local of 350 members, the major issues dealt with work jurisdiction guarantees and seniority protection. The strike was caused by GE management's insistence on weakening these protections, the union said.

All the AFL-CIO unions involved won the economic gains covered by national agreements between GE and an 11-union coalition set up last March. The coalition achieved settlements at all GE locations, but three locals of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers remain on strike over local issues at Westinghouse plants.

AFTE Pres. Russell M. Stephens said his union's Local 147 won a "very satisfactory settlement" at the GE Schenectady plant, where 800 members struck Oct. 17. He listed these features:

General wage increases of 4, 3 and 3 percent spread over a 38-month term, additional raises for skilled workers, elimination of merit steps, cost of living raises, more pension benefits and medical care improvements. Management agreed to retain layoff language of the old contract and withdrew its insistence on weakening seniority rights for those on layoff, Stephens said.

The AFTE also achieved a 38-month contract at the GE Pittsfield, Mass., plant. Local 140, with 400 members on strike, improved contract language in many areas which management refused to change until late in December, he reported.

U.S. Official Charges Massive Attack on NLRB Is Under Way

Chief Labor Law Administrator Claims the Theme of Campaign Is That Big Unions Have Too Much Power

BY HARRY BERNSTEIN
Times Labor Editor

A massive campaign has been launched to "emasculate the nation's labor laws and the National Labor Relations Board," it was charged here Monday by Arnold Ordman, general counsel of the NLRB.

Ordman, the chief labor law administrator in the U.S., said "the attack on the NLRB is the most intensive made since the basic federal labor laws were first enacted 33 years ago."

In New York, a senior officer of Hill and Knowlton, one of the nation's largest public relations firms, said his company has been hired "for an educational campaign about the imbalance of labor laws by 35 trade associations and about 100 large and small industrial companies."

Participants in the campaign being handled by Hill and Knowlton include the national Chamber of Commerce and the National Assn. of Manufacturers.

Some Proposals Already Made

Some of the associations have already made proposals for changing the NLRB and present labor laws, "but as a group, the recommendations will not be made until early next year," said Stanley Sauerhaft, senior vice president of Hill and Knowlton.

Ordman, here to take part in swearing-in ceremonies for Abraham Siegel as the new NLRB regional director, claimed the "theme of the campaign is that labor has too much power."

Also, he said, those behind the drive "are seeking to push the idea that legislation is needed to either wipe out the NLRB entirely, or weaken it significantly."

"The NLRB is an administrative agency of the government, and we are not geared to fight back against this kind of distorted campaign," he continued.

"We have never taken a position, pro or con, on legislative matters. We simply administer the law under Democratic and Republican administrations, but this campaign is getting out of hand."

Claims Distortion of Fact

Ordman, who has been with the NLRB for 20 years, said, "this campaign distorts or ignores the fact that each year the NLRB resolves about 30,000 potential labor disputes, and the arguments center around 1.3% of our cases which go to court where most of our decisions are upheld."

He centered some of his attack on Reader's Digest article, "Let's Enforce Our Labor Laws Fairly," but said the campaign is far more widespread than the one publication.

"We find some papers and magazines are just picking up this campaign literature and running it as if it were their own," Ordman contended.

Sauerhaft said Hill and Knowlton "was called by the Reader's Digest and we helped them get material for the article (which appeared last August).

"But I assume that the magazine called on many sources for their information. We have arranged meetings with magazine and newspaper editorial boards to discuss the educational program which has actually been going on for about a year," Sauerhaft said.

The campaign started from a study made by three lawyers: Gerard Reilly, former NLRB member; Guy Farmer, former NLRB chairman under President Eisenhower, and a New York attorney, Theodore Iserman.

Study of Laws Made

These three, Sauerhaft said, "did a study of current labor laws, and Hill and Knowlton is just an instrument working for that labor law committee to shed some light on the labor situation.

"Down the road, we expect the committee will recommend changes to rectify the imbalance of power, where the NLRB gives big unions too much power," he said.

"But so far we have had no mass mailings, no advertising campaign, and this effort has been built all out of proportion to its true size."

The agency official declined to say how much money is being spent on the campaign, but insisted "that to say this is the biggest campaign ever launched against any government agency is just way out in the stratosphere."

Ordman said it is "the biggest campaign of its kind I've ever heard of."

Ordman's remarks here were the most direct answer given by the top NLRB official criticisms of the agency. He likened it to the criticisms being made of th Supreme Court.

Some senators and congressmen have discussed criticism of NLRB including Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), and Rep. Frank Thompson Jr. (D-N.J.).

Thompson, in an address to the House Oct. 7, charged the attacks on the NLRB "expose the existence of a highly organized, subtly conceived and purposefully executed public relations campaign to mislead and incite the public."

He said that "it is on the basis of this campaign that its leaders apparently intend to make an unprecedented frontal assault on the labor laws in the next Congress."

Hearings on the NLRB's power were conducted by a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee last summer.

At that time, Ordman and others angrily denied charges that the NLRB has shown any "pro-union bias," but Sauerhaft said most witnesses showed there was bias on the part of the NLRB, and that "there are more complaints about the NLRB than about any other government agency."

Tax Hike Need Seen for Jobless Insurance

Exclusive to The Times from a Staff Writer

PALM SPRINGS—Congress must soon tackle the need for a bigger payroll tax to support unemployment insurance and employment services, J. Eldred Hill Jr., executive director, Unemployment Benefits Advisors Inc., predicted Tuesday at the 26th annual management conference of the Merchants and Manufacturers Assn.

When the issue is raised, the old cry for complete nationalization of the benefit system will be heard, Hill told 200 executives in the meeting at El Mirador Hotel.

"Even before there was an unemployment insurance system there were those who claimed it should be national in its administration and benefits," Hill reminded. "The four-tenths of 1% federal payroll tax paid by each employer on each employee's wages up to $3,000 has not been bringing in enough for the administrative costs it is supposed to cover when returned to individual states," Hill said. "It's just a matter of time before Congress must turn to the finance question."

Hill added that the shortage is from the federal tax, not from the state tax also paid by employers. Congress must either reduce the program or increase its revenues by raising the tax or increasing the $3,000 annual salary base, he said.

Hill recalled that two years ago Congress refused to put federal standards on benefits. Hill said he hoped federal standards would not be imposed, because, he said, "This is just a short jump to a completely national system."

Another speaker, Edwin Shields Hewitt of Hewitt Associates, Independent Consultants, criticized a management tendency to make discussion of pay scales a "forbidden subject."

He said too much weight is given to "mechanistic approaches" such as comparative wage scales and statistical surveys.

"I suggest a more subjective approach, using such surveys as tools or guides rather than magic formulas," Shields said.

Jobless Spacemen

Engineers, Scientists Lose Jobs as U.S. Try For Moon Nears Climax

The Designing of Equipment Is Largely Done; Many Men Can't Find New Positions

PhD's Wife Takes in Sewing

By PETER H. PRUGH
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

HUNTSVILLE, Ala.—Watching telecasts of the recent launching of the Apollo spacecraft for its 11-day orbit around the earth wasn't much fun for Bruce L. Porter, a 43-year-old engineer who helped design the rocket. "That was my job going up in smoke," he says.

In late September, Mr. Porter lost his $12,400-a-year post at Brown Engineering Co., a subsidiary of Teledyne Inc., because the task of designing equipment for the U.S. space program is largely over; what the U.S. has now could carry astronauts to Mars and back.

After a fruitless search for a job here, Mr. Porter took, at lower pay, a temporary post 800 miles west in Wichita, Kan., a job that probably will last only six months to a year. He had to leave his wife and children behind. "I'd like to stay with my family, because I'm needed," he says, "but so is the income."

What has happened to Mr. Porter, who came to Huntsville five years ago because of the challenge and relatively high pay in space work, is happening to many others in this volatile industry. Even as the U.S. prepares to put three men in orbit around the moon, perhaps next month, hundreds of scientists and engineers in Huntsville, headquarters of the Marshall Space Flight Center, and other space industry communities are losing their jobs or getting out while the getting is good.

The Handwriting on the Wall

Some, like Mr. Porter, lost their jobs because of project completions or slowdowns on certain phases of the space program; others, seeing the handwriting on the wall, just want to get out now. "They'll be making bicycles, toys, refrigerators and TV sets a hell of a long time after we get to the moon," remarks William Breen, operator of a Huntsville employment agency that has recently stepped up its contacts with companies outside the aerospace industry.

The space slowdown is hitting hardest here at Huntsville, a town that grew from 20,000 in the early 1950s to 150,000 now, because much of the rocket design and test work was done here. It is also being felt at Houston, where the flights are controlled, New Orleans, where a big test facility is located, and Cape Kennedy, the launch site.

Boeing Co., for example, is laying off several hundred space workers at New Orleans and Cape Kennedy. Its work force here is down to 3,000 from 4,600 in 1966, and more cuts may be coming, a spokesman says. While some workers will be absorbed in other jobs elsewhere, many will be out of work. Chrysler Corp.'s space division has cut employment at New Orleans to 1,500 from 3,300 in 1965, and most of its 900 employes at the Cape face layoffs or shifts to jobs in other cities.

The drops are reflected in spending by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, which has cut its outlays to less than $4 billion this fiscal year from $5.9 billion in fiscal 1966.

Will They Come Back?

The exodus is worrying space experts, who fret that a new emphasis on U.S. space efforts or new military needs would leave companies hard pressed to fill the rows of desks being vacated now. "If this industry ever booms again, it's going to be extremely difficult to woo, wine and dine people back," Mr. Breen says.

The engineers and scientists who staked their future in space and are now pounding the pavements are often finding it tough to land even mundane jobs, because of their specialized skills and relatively high pay.

"I've had a turndown from just about every manufacturer I can think of in the country," says Robert J. Schaffer, 42, who lost his $15,600 senior engineer's post at Brown Engineering here in early September. Particularly galling to him has been the fact that despite his high salary and broad experience in engine design, many of the 75 companies rejected his application by form letter, which he feels indicates the companies didn't even seriously look at his qualifications because of the glut of space scientists. One company, he says, even turned him down with the wrong letter—a form letter designed as a rejection for students seeking summer employment.

Mr. Schaffer, his wife and their three young children are living off savings and $44 a week in unemployment compensation. Their assets are rapidly vanishing.

The Chicken Farm Vanishes

He had made a speculative investment in an old chicken farm in California that stands in the path of new apartments, hoping to sell out later at a fancy profit. But then he lost his job, and now he has lost the property. He figures he had more than $20,000 invested in the land, counting taxes, equity and interest, but he couldn't sell it so he just stopped making payments and defaulted on his mortgage. Though he lost $20,000, he was able to cut his monthly expenditures to $600 from $1,100, and that was more important for now.

The family shops for bargains at a variety of supermarkets. To save money, Mr. Schaffer now buys coffee beans at 43 cents a pound and grinds them in a blender; a pound of ground coffee usually costs more than 80 cents. He figures he also saves at least $2.50 a month now by using a cream substitute, instead of real cream, in his coffee.

Mr. Schaffer says that, with his $2,000 in savings, he can go until January without work if necessary. "I'm being drained down to nothing," he says. He says he's willing to work at a lower salary, but no company has even proposed this.

Few persons are able to match their salaries in new jobs. "Salaries have spiraled without reference to true worth," says Marshall Johnson, operator of an engineering employment service in Houston. "Take a guy who has worked for five years with one kind of valve. He's a $14,000-a-year valve expert, but his experience probably doesn't apply in other industries. And his pay is too high for them even if it did."

The lack of demand for exotic experience shows up at Lockheed-Georgia Co., near Atlanta, where engineers are wanted—but for designing jet freighters, not spaceships.

Fred W. Geiger, a 51-year-old physicist, has spent two months in a fruitless search for work after being laid off from his $13,700-a-year research job at Brown Engineering. Companies claim they just don't need a man with his particular talents and experience, Mr. Geiger says. "People keep preaching about education," comments his wife, Lillian, "and here he is with a PhD in physics." He has spent time at home reviewing recent developments in thermodynamics and preparing his house for painting. Mrs. Geiger, who has started to take in some sewing to help meet bills, says: "I worry about him not having something to do."

Mrs. Geiger makes about $30 a week on the sewing work. She says they have stopped dining out and visiting friends. She doesn't go to department stores much anymore either, she says, to avoid being tempted to buy something.

"Out the Door I Went"

Kenneth C. Elkins, another Huntsville resident, has been working on making a four-poster bed for his home these days. In early August, he left his job at Chrysler Corp.'s space division after the company offered him a choice of taking a 10% cut in his $270 weekly pay, smaller insurance benefits and a lower job classification or losing his senior engineering post. "So out the door I went," he says.

Chrysler attempted to deny Mr. Elkins, 37, his unemployment compensation and his severence pay by contending he quit voluntarily. However, the Alabama Department of Industrial Relations has ruled that Mr. Elkins was "justified" in leaving and entitled to compensation because changes were made "in the terms of his employment" that were "substantially unfavorable to him."

Mr. Elkins' search for another job, including possible work outside the aerospace field, has been unsuccessful. The Elkins family, with four children ranging in age from 16 to two months, hopes to remain in Huntsville, but Mr. Elkins says he would move even though it would probably mean taking a $3,000 loss on his house because of the generally glutted condition of the Huntsville real estate market.

The Huntsville office of the Alabama State Employment Service says employment in the area has declined 3,500 in the past year, to 93,100, with most of the drop coming in aerospace and related fields. Unemployment compensation claims by professional people, mostly engineers, are the highest in memory, a spokesman says. Several hundred engineers, scientists and technicians are around Huntsville "just blissfully hoping" for aerospace job openings, says a spokesman for Engineers Unlimited, a local employment agency.

Bad Days in Huntsville

The trend away from aerospace work is having a particular impact on Huntsville, largely because it has been the center for research work on U.S. space and missile programs. The U.S. Army's Redstone Arsenal (headquarters for missile research), NASA's Marshall Center and various space contractors account for more than half of all the employment in the Huntsville area.

Although Huntsville, with an unemployment rate under 3.5%, can hardly be called an economic disaster area, there are soft spots. Partly because of a decline in the number of visitors on aerospace business, Jolly Inns Inc., a local motel chain, has defaulted on its mortgage and faces foreclosure this month.

Several new service stations stand vacant near outlying residential districts as the result of overbuilding during the aerospace boom. The Chamber of Commerce estimates there are some 700 vacant housing units in the area. Housing starts, which hit a 3,000 annual rate several years ago, probably won't reach 700 this year. One space-oriented employment agency expects its revenue this year to fall to $35,000 from $70,000 last year; another has cut its office space in half.

Civic leaders hope that an aggressive campaign to lure diversified industries will ease the space slowdown by creating jobs in unromantic tasks such as making telephones and tires. "You can't build a city on Federal contracts," says Clyde B. Hale, partner in a downtown furniture store.

Plants are currently being constructed here by Barber-Coleman Co.; Automatic Electric Co., a subsidiary of General Telephone & Electronics Corp.; Dunlop Tire & Rubber Corp., and PPG Industries Inc. They are expected to provide 4,600 new jobs, but mostly for rural residents of the area, not unemployed space scientists.

Labor Law - NLRB

Unions gird for labor-law fight

By Ed Townsend

Labor correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

New York

Organized labor is girding for a fight next year on Capitol Hill against what it predicts will be "conservative business efforts to weaken labor at the bargaining table."

AFL-CIO is warning its unions that "big business" has a million-dollar campaign under way for federal labor-law changes that would make life more difficult for workers.

A hard fight now appears inevitable in the next Congress. Although there has been no clearly defined shift to the conservative right on the Hill, it is almost certain that the National Labor Relations Board will come under its most concentrated attack since it was created in 1935, under the Wagner Act.

Massed labor forces will be on one side and unusually unified management forces on the other. Thirty-five or more major business groups are working closely together, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Retail Federation, and other powerful associations.

Campaign well established

They have the backing of some of the country's most important corporations, including American Telephone & Telegraph, General Motors, General Electric, Ford, Sears, Roebuck, General Dynamics, and Humble Oil.

The business forces have engaged Hill & Knowlton, a public-relations firm, to handle their campaign, and have collected in cash and pledges at least a million dollars—for a start.

The industry campaign isn't by any means a new one, an aftermath of the recent presidential election — although the business ranks include powerful backers of the Republicans' successful candidate, Richard M. Nixon, and liberal contributors to the GOP's political funds.

First plans for the industry legislative efforts were laid at least two years ago, quietly and on a small scale at first. They have been out in the open, and gathering support in all parts of the country, since last March, when first proposals were circulated.

Industry's timetable for action was set then for early 1969—regardless of whether a Democrat or a Republican was in the White House or of whether November congressional voting had changed the composition of the Senate and House.

Philosophy called outdated

The management position is that NLRB "has ignored the intent of Congress and time and again fashioned law according to the notion of board members." Industry contends that "equality in the labor-management equation . . . has been maladjusted through decisions weighed heavily on the side of labor."

It complains that the board's philosophy "seems to remain geared to conditions in the mid-'30's [when unions were weak and workers sparsely organized] while these are the late '60's."

"The great power achieved by organized labor makes most inappropriate the continuing practice of the agency to further enhance union power, all too often at the expense of individual employee freedom," says a statement being circulated by NAM.

A panel of the Senate Judiciary Committee—labeled the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers—held hearings earlier this year on NLRB, during which Sen. Sam J. Ervin Jr. (D) of North Carolina, Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R) of Michigan, and others took the board to task for "policymaking. . . . Not a function that can be performed properly by a small group of appointed officials, no matter how able or well-intentioned."

Senator Ervin has been one of the severest critics of NLRB and Senator Griffin was one of the authors of the Landrum-Griffin labor-reform law that, he complains, has been "frustrated and even nullified" by NLRB decisions.

What industry proposes as changes won't be made public until early next year, although it's certain that most proposals will seek reversals of NLRB decisions in free speech, management rights, and other controversial areas, and will try to define more clearly the equal rights that employers are entitled to under the law.

The management coalition also wants the present law revised to leave no loopholes in provisions for government neutrality in labor relations—including the elimination of the word "encourage" from a provision that now says that it is the policy of the government to "encourage the practice and procedure of collective bargaining."

Union action expected

Management takes the position that NLRB's broad interpretations of what is open to bargaining and the scale of negotiations must be narrowed in the public interest. This is particularly directed now against NLRB's apparent sanction of coalition bargaining—joint negotiations by unions that deal with a single employer or group of employers in an industry. But employers have long felt that NLRB has opened bargaining floodgates to matters that should have no place in contract negotiations.

Recent meetings of the industry steering group have reaffirmed the early 1969 timing of the formal campaign. Position papers have been prepared, along with supplementary "educational" material. Bids for broad public support will be started in January.

Meanwhile, AFL-CIO probably will announce mid-December its plans for a counteroffensive against business "union-smashing" legislative plans.

The federation's executive council has been called to meet in Washington next month, with this on its agenda. But AFL-CIO and its unions used the possible threat of antilabor legislation in 1969 as ammunition against the Republicans—and Independent George Wallace—in the recent election campaign, although AFL-CIO had decided to hold off its "controversial" attack on business-oriented legislative proposals until after the Nov. 5 voting.

A badly timed statement by an industry spokesman brought labor's first big barrage—and undoubtedly helped labor shore up its campaign for last-minute support for Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey and Democratic congressional candidates.

CITE FAILURES IN ON-THE-JOB TRAINING PLAN

BY ALDO BECKMAN

[Chicago Tribune Press Service]

Washington, Nov. 27—A number of Los Angeles firms, which accepted federal funds for on-the-job training programs, failed to enlist any additional trainees after they got the money, an investigative report revealed today.

A number of such contracts "served primarily to reimburse the private employers for OJT of the same type they apparently would have initiated and carried out without the government's financial assistance," said a report, released today by the general accounting office.

Bring in New People

The report called on the department of labor, which administers the program, to "place increased emphasis on developing OJT contracts which will induce new or additional training efforts by private employers and which will bring into the labor force persons who are otherwise likely to remain unemployed or underemployed."

Such a change, said the report, would help reach the greatest possible number of "disadvantaged, hard-core unemployed and underemployed persons."

The programs under investigation have provided private employers with 1.8 billion dollars for training activities since 1964, under the manpower development and training act.

The controler general's report to congress said the GAO selected the Los Angeles area for review since 8.9 million dollars in federal funds have been funneled there for training purposes in the three fiscal years ending on July 1, 1967.

The report said that sufficient standards and guidelines were not established by the department of labor, resulting in some variance of programs, even tho the training provided by each of several employers was for essentially the same skills or occupations.

It said that firms, awarded federal contracts, should be compelled to train additional persons, over and above what they would have trained on their own.

$500,000 to Widen Prison Job Classes

State Labor Commissioner Sam Caldwell said Monday that job training in Georgia's prison system will be expanded with an additional $500,000 grant from the federal government.

The funds, said Caldwell, will be used to instruct 300 to 400 prisoners in business and industrial skills. The program, scheduled to begin next month is being made available under provision of the Manpower Training and Development Act.

The training will be canducted for 24 to 52 weeks by the State Labor department and the Division of Vocational Education of the State Department of Education.

The training will be conducted progress at state prison facilities in Buford and Reidsville, and classes will begin in January under a previous allocation at the Lee County and Lowndes County prison branches.

Caldwell said the additional commitment for $500,000 may permit extension of training to other facilities.

The skill training program was launched in Georgia prisons in October 1967 with approximately $100,000. Ninety-four inmates at the Georgia Training and Development Center at Buford were enrolled in the initial program. The 58 trainees who have been released were given jobs as soon as they left prison, Caldwell said, and the other 36 are due for release soon with job commitments awaiting them.

The second federal grant—$300,000—was secured early this year to finance training of 214 inmates at the Reidsville, Lee County and Lowndes County branches.

The training program is planned, Caldwell explained, so graduation will coincide with the prisoner's release date.

Participants in the program receive $5 per week, with $2 going to the individuals and $3 placed in a savings account until their release.

Noting that Georgia's prison population is the fourth largest in the nation, Caldwell commented, "With 87 per cent of Georgia inmates classified as common laborers, the prison population is a vast untapped reservoir of manpower.

"There is no better time to administer skill training than when these men are immobile and thinking about building a better life when they are released."

A.M.A. WILL ADMIT NEGRO PHYSICIANS

Delegates to Rewrite Bylaws —May Act on Osteopaths

By RICHARD D. LYONS

Special to The New York Times

BAL HARBOUR, Fla., Nov. 30—Ending racial discrimination among physicians and the integrating of doctors of osteopathy with doctors of medicine will be the main business facing delegates to the American Medical Association's 22d annual clinical convention, which opens tomorrow.

The association's policy-making House of Delegates is committed to rewriting the association's bylaws so as to prohibit the denial of membership to Negro physicians. A system of enforcement will also to be set up.

In addition, the convention will consider opening A.M.A. membership to doctors of osteopathy, a group of medical professionals who are physicians and surgeons who rereceive their training in schools of osteopathy ratherr than schools of medicine.

Should both measurers be approved by the 242-member House of Delegates meeting here in the Americana Hotel, the effect would be to open the American health structure more widely to participation by about 20,000 osteopaths and Negro medical physicians.

The right to practice medicine in many hospitals and to take graduate courses is now denied to many of them.

At the A.M.A.'s national convention last June in San Francisco, the House of Delegates passed a resolution that not only called for the ending of association bylaws to forbid racial discrimination, but also put teeth in the change.

Many of the nation's 7,000 Negro doctors have been denied membership in local medical societies, mainly in Southern states. Without such membership almost all of these doctors are not allowed to practice medicine in local hospitals, unless they own or run the institutions.

Even though these Negro physicians may be licensed in their home states, they may not admit their patients to local hospitals, or treat them in the institutions since medical society membership is a prerequisite to what are termed "house privileges," that is the right of doctors to practice in a particular hospital.

The resolution on dscrimination, drafted by a House of Delegates committee, is to be acted upon next week. It states that "membership in the American Medical Association or in any of its constituent associations shall not be denied or abridged on account of color, creed, race, religion or ethnic origin."

Punishment Possible

But more importantly, a further change states that if an applicant is denied membership and if the A.M.A. feels that he has ben discriminated against that the association "shall admonish, censure or, in the event of repeated violations, recommend to the House of Delegates, that the state association involved be declared to be no longer a constituent member of the American Medical Association."

Members of several state delegations here appear to be dissatisfied with the wording of the changes and they may attempt to either toughen or soften the contents.

Regarding the osteopaths, the Maryland delegation here will introduce a resolution stating that "qaulified doctors of osteopathy may be admitted to full active membership in the A.M.A.," a proposal the association has been wrangling over for most of this decade.

A generation ago, doctors of medicine regarded osteopaths as semiprofessionals, but this attitude has been changing as schools of osteopathy have tightened admissions and teaching requirements.

M.D.'s and D.O.'s in Federal service are treated about equally.

The House of Delegates was authorized last year to negotiate the conversion of schools of osteopathy to schools of medicine. The integration of osteopaths into the A. M. A. would open to them graduate training programs such as internships and residencies in many more institutions than osteopathic hospitals.

Even if the House of Delegates approves the resolution, the integration of D.O.'s and M.D.'s would not occur overnight. The American Osteopathic Association which represents the nation's 16,000 D.O.'s has stated that it wants to retain osteopathy as a separate entity and thwart a takeover of the smaller organization by the 216,000-member A.M.A.

About 4,500 A.M.A. members are expected to attend this convention to hear scientific reports, take part in post-graduate courses and view medical exhibitions.

States, confirmed to a Los Angeles reporter a few days before the election that business planned a broad legislative campaign based on a study of labor laws by three attorneys, Gerard Reilly and Guy Farmer, both former NLRB members, and Theodore Iserman. He said that the campaign would seek changes "to rectify the imbalance of power" that now exists.

George Meany, AFL-CIO's president, hurriedly bought radio-network time nationally to call attention to the Pestillo statement as an admission that "a big business plot [exists] to destroy the labor movement in the next session of Congress," through unified efforts "to destroy the National Labor Relations Act as we know it."

During the weekend before the nation voted, Mr. Meany and other labor leaders used every means open to them to warn that industry was seeking to limit bargaining, place curbs on strikes, picketing, boycotts, and other traditional labor devices, and strengthen management's position in resisting union organizing.

Arnold Ordman, general counsel of NLRB, also has described the current attack on the board as "the most intensive since federal labor laws were first enacted 33 years ago."

Frank W. McCulloch, chairman of NLRB, also has called attacks on NLRB "exaggerated, misleading, or based on carefully selected lists of cases and misinterpretations of board and court decisions."

LABOR

Do mergers need a union label?

NLRB is trying to decide if a labor contract negotiated before a merger is binding afterward. Conglomerates, confronting many unions, find problem particularly complex

When a company changes hands, is the new owner bound by the union contract its predecessor signed? The question has become an acute one because of the onrushing boom in corporate mergers: Now a major showdown is under way before the National Labor Relations Board.

As mergers multiply (current estimated rate: 4,000 a year), they are sending reverberations through labor-management relations. First, they helped foster labor's controversial strategy of coalition bargaining. Then, merger deals were followed by an increasing number of flash-point confrontations between successor employers and incumbent unions, battling over contracts negotiated in premerger days.

Usually the unions want to maintain the existing agreement—perhaps in order to hold on to captured terrain. But for a conglomerate, the labor agreement of a newly acquired company can complicate life seriously. As in the case of Ling-Temco-Vought, Inc. (chart), each merger or acquisition may add to the list of unions a conglomerate's affiliates must deal with, and to the kind of contracts in effect throughout a merger empire.

All sorts of policy interactions must be appraised. Even where the newly acquired company has bargaining autonomy, the issue keeps its cutting edge: The policies and profits of the entire conglomerate are inevitably affected by whatever happens in each operating unit.

Impact. The five-member board fully realizes that powerful precedents are about to be set. It recently examined the successorship question at oral hearings—a technique it employs only for its most important problems—and a raft of witnesses on both sides clearly indicated the impact the NLRB's decision would have on the corporate merger movement.

Four test cases are before the board, all involving the new ownership of a unionized company or plant. The cases differ in many ways, but through them all runs a battle over whether the NLRB has the authority to order a new employer and a union to abide by the existing contract—or whether a change in ownership means the contract term can be abrogated.

Collision. At the hearings, opposing lineups of witnesses came mostly from labor and management. But key testimony also was given by Bernard Cushman, representing the NLRB general counsel—an officer independent of the board.

Cushman urged the NLRB to adopt a policy requiring the new owner to take over the existing labor agreement intact. "In our view," he said, "a successor stands in the shoes of the predecessor and is bound by the same contract."

He noted that contracts have long been considered a means of avoiding industrial strife, and he pointed to federal policies to "promote stabilization." The same principles apply to the present situation, he said. This is why a successor must be bound by the existing contract "if industrial peace is to be fostered." He also cited the Supreme Court's ruling in the so-called Wiley case: It held a successor employer was bound by an existing union contract that provided for arbitration of grievances.

But the Chamber of Commerce disputed the contention that the board had the authority to require the parties to be bound by the existing agreement.

"For the board to go so far as to hold an employer bound in any degree by a contract to which he had not consented would not only be unprecedented but would be in flat contravention of statutory restraints on the board's powers," the Chamber said.

To a decision. Attorneys for the AFL-CIO echoed Cushman's position. "The magnitude of the merger movement and its potential impact on stable labor relations," said one federation witness, "make it plain that the time is ripe for the board to follow the lead of the Supreme Court's opinion in Wiley."

And a United Auto Workers brief said labor contracts should "run with the business." This, said the UAW, would mean that anyone purchasing a new business will "automatically concern himself with the pre-existing negotiations leading up to the purchase and thereby will, by purchasing the concern, 'consent' to the labor agreement."

The board indicated it would look at a variety of alternatives before reaching its decision. For instance, it sought opinions from the parties on whether all or part of the existing contract should remain in force between the union and the new owner. Particularly, it asked whether the parties should be required to adhere to such contract provisions as a union-security clause, a no-strike clause, a pension plan agreement, or a dues check-off.

Parent union sets up a virtual administratorship to curb what appears to be political manipulations within the region

Internal politics continues to roil the United Steelworkers, once one of the country's most tightly administered, disciplined unions. As a result of District 15's bitterly fought election of a director for the Monongahela Valley and Johnstown area, the union's executive board took the rare step—for USW—of establishing a virtual administratorship over the 65,000-member district near Pittsburgh.

The ferment isn't unique in the steel union: It's true in other unions—including the United Auto Workers—whose leaders have long been considered invulnerable. It reflects today's general restlessness and the guaranteed right of dissent given in labor laws.

In USW, it also reflects increased intra-union politics since I. W. Abel, president, just reelected, first won power in 1965. The successful revolt against David J. McDonald has spurred other challenges to established leadership.

Now the Abel forces are tightening their grip, less to end dissent—although that is a factor—than to end what appear to be glaring political manipulations within District 15 and to show that USW can police its own ranks.

District 15 has for years had a reputation for "unsavory politics," as one union source puts it. There have been frequent charges of election irregularities and "improper" voting practices. For top officers, the last straw was a strong charge that 1,000 ballots were switched during tabulation of votes for international and district officers in February.

Last month, USW's election officials declared Joseph Odorcich, a District 15 staffman, the official winner over incumbent director Paul M. Hilbert by 522 votes. Two weeks ago, however, USW's executive board overruled the tellers in a surprise move. It invalidated votes cast at McKeesport Local 1408 for "irregularities," thus awarding the election to Hilbert by 72 votes.

Hilbert, first elected in 1957 as a dues protester, immediately resigned, and the board appointed Lester H. Thornton as "temporary director."

Odorcich, incensed at the sudden change in his fortunes, threatened to file suit against USW. The board's action, he charged, was "undemocratic." In return, the union said it might have to take action against him. Dozens of District 15 local officers and rank-and-filers, angered by the action, demonstrated at USW's Pittsburgh offices. Thornton may have a tough time restoring order. End

Unions Win 16 of 22 Supreme Court Cases

Atlantic City—Labor won 75 percent of its cases before the Supreme Court during the last two years for a "highly successful" legal record, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The council report dealt with 22 labor cases which reached the Supreme Court since the last convention—a period covering the final two court terms under Chief Justice Earl Warren. In 16 of these cases, labor's arguments prevailed.

Many of the cases dealt with constitutional issues and the council report discussed five of them, including three that it termed "major."

In Food Employees Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Pennsylvania courts ruled that peaceful picketing on shopping center sidewalks could be barred as an illegal trespass on private property, and the union appealed. The Supreme Court reversed the decision in a 6-3 vote.

Justice Marshall wrote an opinion concluding that state laws on the places at which picketing may be carried on are subject to the same constitutional freedom of speech standards historically applied to handbilling cases. Five other justices agreed, in a decision which the council said was "plainly of the greatest practical importance" for unions faced with the usual "formidable difficulties" in carrying on organizing campaigns.

In United Mine Workers v. Illinois Bar Association, the organized bar complained that the UMW engaged in the unauthorized practice of law by hiring a licensed attorney, on a salaried basis, to represent any member who wanted his advice in workmen's compensation claims. The Illinois courts rejected the union's claim that the plan was protected by the 1st Amendment. The Supreme Court reversed, with Justice Harlan dissenting. The council said:

"The court made it absolutely plain that unions have the right to set up and finance group legal service plans . . . as to any work-related matter, as long as the plan is administered in such a way as to insure that the individual member retains control of the case" involving him.

A landmark ruling was put on the lawbooks when Maryland and 27 other states brought a suit, called Maryland v. Wirtz, alleging that it was beyond the power of Congress to regulate the minimum wages and maximum hours of employes in state-operated hospitals and schools. The states' argument was "completely rejected" by a seven-man majority of the court, the council noted.

The opinion, written by Justice Harlan, upheld the power of Congress to regulate public enterprises affecting commerce.

The report said "There can be little doubt that this case represents a major interpretation of the commerce clause which will have reverberations far into the future if Congress moves to meet the serious labor relations problems which are surfacing on the state and local levels of government."

The council cited two cases of "lesser magnitude":

In Nash v. Florida Industrial Commission, the commission had refused to pay unemployment insurance to a union member because she had authorized her union to file unfair labor practice charges against her employer on her behalf. This refusal was upheld by the Florida courts but unanimously reversed by the Supreme Court.

The court, for the fourth time in 55 years, rejected the claim of a railroad — this time the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific—that Arkansas's state "full crew" laws violate the Constitution or the 14th Amendment. The court ruled that the evidence strongly supported the claim of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, now part of the United Transportation Union, that the laws play an important safety function.

National Labor Relations Board cases did not "occupy center stage" during the last two Warren terms, the council reported, but nevertheless did figure in decisions of importance.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., a unanimous court ruled that an employer's duty to bargain with a union can be established without a representation election.

It said that authorization cards obtained by the union from a majority of employes, without misrepresentation or coercion, are reliable enough generally to prove a valid alternate route to majority status. It found that an order to bargain is justified when an employer "rejects a card majority while . . . committing unfair labor practices that tend to undermine the union's majority and make a fair election an unlikely possibility."

Supreme Court, Despite NLRB Objections, To Rule on Firms' Rights Against Picketing

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed, over the objections of the National Labor Relations Board, to decide a question of employers' rights to take court action to stop illegal picketing.

The issue, brought to the High Court by Sears, Roebuck & Co., is whether a company can appeal a Federal district court's denial of a temporary injunction to halt such picketing, where the NLRB originally sought the injunction but refuses to appeal.

In other actions, the Supreme Court:

—Declined to disturb an NLRB decision requiring an employer to give an incumbent union the names and home addresses of workers who are in the bargaining unit represented by the union but aren't union members. The case involves Prudential Insurance Co. and the Insurance Workers International Union.

—Refused to review a Federal Trade Commission finding that Tri Valley Growers, a California cooperative that processes fruits and vegetables for its members, violated the Robinson-Patman Act.

—And left standing a lower-court decision holding invalid Baker Oil Tools Inc.'s patents on retrievable bridge plugs, which are used to plug oil wells.

The Sears Picketing Case

The Sears case involved a local labor dispute that led to picketing of some Sears stores in Denver, but the giant retailer felt the legal principle important enough to take the issue all the way to the Supreme Court.

The original dispute, according to Sears, was between Denver Local 419 of the Carpet Layers Union and Joe & Eddie's Carpet Service, a concern that installed floor coverings sold by Sears' Denver stores, when Local 419 members began to picket the Sears stores, Sears filed charges with the NLRB calling an illegal secondary boycott.

The NLRB regional director concluded there was reason to believe the picketing was illegal. He then sought a temporary injunction from a Federal district court to halt the picketing, pending a final NLRB ruling.

The district court denied the injunction on the ground that there was "little probability" the NLRB would uphold the company's charge. The board refused to appeal the denial, and instead continued its own proceedings on the charges. Sears, faced with continued picketing, filed its own appeal, but the Federal appeals court in Denver ruled that the company didn't have legal standing to appeal the denial of an injunction sought by the NLRB.

A month later the board held that the union had engaged in illegal picketing. The picketing then ceased.

Sears nonetheless petitioned the Supreme Court to review the appeals court's decision, insisting that the legal question is important to business and labor generally. Various groups, including the American Retail Federation, filed friend-of-the-court briefs supporting Sears' motion. The NLRB told the High Court it shouldn't review the case inasmuch as the picketing had stopped with the board's decision on the case.

The Supreme Court, without commenting on the board's position, granted Sears' petition. It will hear argument and decide the case sometime in early 1970.

The Prudential Case

The Prudential case, in which an NLRB decision favoring the union was upheld by a lower court, raised a question of employer and union rights in situations where large numbers of employes have declined to join or pay dues to an incumbent union.

The Insurance Workers union since 1959 has represented Prudential agents in 34 states and a few cities outside those states. A total of about 16,800 agents are employed in those locations, which constitute a bargaining unit.

The union contract doesn't require all agents to pay dues, nor does it contain any other union-security provisions. It does contain a dues-checkoff provision, under which members may authorize Prudential to deduct their union dues from their pay. About 9,700 of the 16,800 agents have signed the authorizations.

The union has the home mailing addresses of the 9,700 and from time to time has asked Prudential to supply the names and addresses of the other agents who haven't signed the authorizations and aren't union members.

Prudential repeatedly refused, and in 1967 the union filed charges with the NLRB claiming that the refusal constituted an unfair labor practice. The board agreed, and ordered Prudential to supply the names and addresses on the ground that the list "was necessary and relevant to collective bargaining."

An appeals court sustained the board, and Prudential sought Supreme Court review. The High Court didn't comment in denying review.

The Tri Valley Case

The FTC case was brought under the Robinson-Patman Act, often called the price-discrimination law. It bars companies from giving discounts and allowances to favored customers unless the same terms are made available to all competing retailers or wholesalers.

The FTC ruled that Tri Valley sold canned fruits and vegetables directly to large chain stores at lower prices than were available to other buyers, including various grocery wholesalers. The commission rejected the concern's defense that its lower prices for chains were adopted in good faith to meet the prices of other processors competing with Tri Valley.

An appeals court, after first remanding the case to the FTC for further hearings, upheld the commission. Tri Valley sought Supreme Court review of the appeals court's decision.

The Patent Case

The patent case grew out of an action filed by Kiva Corp. for a court judgment holding that Los Angeles-based Baker Oil Tools Inc.'s patents on retrievable bridge plugs were invalid and weren't infringed.

A Federal district court ruled for Kiva, and the decision was affirmed by an appeals court. Baker unsuccessfully sought Supreme Court review.

who bought a 15,000-lb. frozen concentrate contract for $900 margin, this represented a gain of $1,500, or 167%.

Higher still? Even before the freeze, prices of orange juice futures were edging up. At first, this year's crop was expected to be especially good; November estimates of the Florida crop placed it at 149-million boxes of oranges. But in mid-December a new report said heavy droppage had reduced that to 140-million; so futures prices started climbing.

Commodity brokers and analysts said that when the freeze hit, the market actually showed good sense. Instead of wildly bidding up prices on damage rumors, says Donald Conlon of Reynolds & Co., "The market behaved very orderly. My guess is that it will tend to crawl higher."

Data: Commodity Research Bureau, Inc.

In comparison, when a freeze hit last year, the market went wild. Prices went up to the limit for five days straight. Some brokers, such as Clayton Jones of Bache & Co., say that last year's overreaction tempered this year's speculators. Prices last year for the July contract shot up to 65¢. But by May they were down to 53¢, says Jones, when it became clear that even the government's estimate of crop damage was exaggerated.

So far, there is no telling whether or not retail prices for the 6-oz. cans of frozen juice will move up. Processors usually get together in mid-January to assess the crop. But now it looks as if they will hold off until after Feb. 10 following the Agriculture Dept.'s special damage report and its monthly crop estimate. Last year, following a freeze, the wholesale price of a dozen 6-oz. cans jumped from $1.55 to $2.25 but settled down to $1.75 by August. ■

UNIONS

Nixon's brand of labor law

President Nixon will ask Congress next month to take a long, hard step toward compulsory arbitration of national emergency disputes that are not settled through existing Taft-Hartley procedures. Odds are that Congress will not comply this year unless there is a serious dispute that involves the national interest. But the fight is intended to go on in 1971 if it fails in this Congressional election year.

The President and Labor Secretary George P. Shultz have a number of revisions of major labor laws in mind. Some would gut the 35-year-old Railway Labor Act of provisions for coping with major railroad and airline labor disputes: These would be handled under the Taft-Hartley Act on the same basis as other industrial disputes. Other changes would strengthen the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and perhaps give the National Labor Relations Board more power. But the major revision to be proposed, probably about Feb. 19, would create new machinery for settling "emergency" disputes that outlast 80-day injunctions against a strike or lockout.

Rearrangement. Basically, the Administration wants to take major railroad and airline bargaining out of the antiquated Railway Labor Act and put it under Taft-Hartley. This would consolidate all labor-management relations in a revised and broadened National Labor Relations Act (since 1947 revisions, more commonly called the Taft-Hartley Act) and would leave the RLA as no more than a minor law covering specific transportation problems.

Under the plan to be advanced next month, most of the functions of the National Mediation Board (now handling railroads and airlines) would be transferred to the FMCS and NLRB, which handle similar cases under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Changes in the two laws, however, will be overshadowed by something new and potentially far more controversial. The Administration plans to propose adding an extra step to Taft-Hartley emergency strike provisions, to apply to any industry under the act.

At present, any dispute that threatens the nation's health, welfare, or security can be barred for up to 80 days, a "cooling off" period during which a settlement is sought by factfinding, mediation, and further bargaining. After 80 days, a strike or lockout becomes legal again and the President's only recourse is to go to Congress for ad hoc measures.

Compulsion? The new suggestion is to require parties to submit their dispute to an impartial panel and ultimately accept the terms it recommends. The parties would be barred from "self-help," meaning a strike or lockout. Nobody wants to call this step compulsory arbitration, but most agree that at most there is a very fine line between the proposed "mediation to finality" (a term used by former Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz for a similar plan in 1967) and compulsory arbitration.

The proposal would write into Taft-Hartley the strategy used in 1967 when Wirtz told shopcraft unions and railroads that they could either negotiate a settlement on their own, helped by mediators, or have terms imposed by a special arbitration panel. The two sides opted for more bargaining and the presumption in the new proposal is that most future disputants would, too.

Other powers. Exact details of the plan are secret, but some of those who have been consulted say that the President might have other options to head off a shutdown after the 80-day period.

The Administration is not expected to alter the present Taft-Hartley definition of what constitutes a national emergency; it feels that the vague language of the act gives the President and his Labor Secretary leeway to enter or stay out of national disputes. Shultz feels that past Administrations interpreted the definition too loosely and intervened too often. Only recently, Shultz issued a Labor Dept. study that he interprets to show that the Johnson Administration should not have invoked the T-H emergency strike procedures in dock strikes in 1962, 1965, and 1968. The Nixon Administration policy is to use T-H as a last resort. This is now being adhered to in the 13-week General Electric strike.

Nixon will invoke Taft-Hartley as a last resort

The decision to ditch the Railway Labor Act was not unexpected. It can be laid to a sober recognition that under RLA's procedures no real bargaining occurs until after the government goes through slow-moving and ineffective procedures. Under T-H, hard bargaining must take place before the government moves in.

Although the Administration will not push for emergency strike changes immediately, pressures could develop quickly if present shopcraft union negotiations with major railroads bog down and there is a serious strike threat or if trucking industry bargaining take on a critical look later in the year. ■

AEROSPACE

Weaker thrust in 1970

After living through their poorest business year in a decade, U. S. aerospace companies face what could be an instant, bone-crunching replay. Outwardly industry executives display calm optimism, but the prospects confronting them look ominous.

President Nixon has committed himself to a $5-billion reduction in defense spending for the 12 months beginning July 1, following a $4-billion cut during the current fiscal year. The latest cut will pull Defense Dept. expenditures down from the current level of $77-billion a year to $72-billion.

Companies anxiously await new cuts in the 1971 budget

At the National Aeronautics & Space Administration, another big source of aerospace contracts, an additional $150-million cut for fiscal year 1971 was reported this week, reducing its budget to about $3.35-billion. NASA's budget for the current fiscal year is $3.7-billion, down $200-million from the previous year.

Confronted with such cutbacks, aerospace companies still hope their own programs will be spared or suffer no more than aggravating stretchouts. But they all admit their faith rests on the unknown factor of where actual cuts will hit when the fiscal 1971 budget is released.

"We certainly expect government stretchouts and cutbacks to reduce product sales," says a spokesman for United Aircraft Corp. The company makes the engines for the troubled F-111 project and was to have developed a solid-fuel rocket booster for the Air Force's Manned Orbiting Laboratory, which has been cancelled.

Already hurting. Whatever comes in fiscal 1971, the industry cannot wish away the continuing impact of cutbacks already made in the last six months of 1969, when defense contracting started a marked downward drift. From July through September, the latest quarter for which statistics are available, contracts fell to $8.6-billion from $10.9-billion for the same period a year earlier. At the same time, aircraft contracts dropped to $1.6-billion from $2.1-billion a year earlier.

In 1969, the aerospace industry experienced its first reduction in sales in 10 years, and another slip is forecast for this year. The Aerospace Industries Assn. reports that sales declined 4.1% to $28.3-billion from the record high of $29.5-billion in 1968. AIA is forecasting an additional drop of 2.1% to $27.7-billion for 1970.

The brave front put up by the aerospace companies cannot hide what is happening in their manufacturing operations, either. Projects sending shockwaves from the big contractors to their subcontractors include:

- Cutbacks on the number of C-5A jet transports to be produced for the Air Force. Lockheed-Georgia has orders for only 81 of the 115 aircraft originally proposed. This could represent a possible loss of $100-million for Lockheed and its suppliers.
- Continued shaving of planned orders for General Dynamics' trouble-plagued F-111. The latest figures show only 493 to be built; this would mean a cut of 161 planes worth $2-billion.
- Stretchout of the Apollo program. Lunar shots originally scheduled at three-month intervals will now be set six months apart. And one flight has been canceled so that its Saturn V rocket can be used for a space-station launch, something NASA had hoped that Congress would fund separately as a large post-Apollo project.
- Continued military disengagement in Vietnam. War expenditures (including about 40% for equipment) are now running about $23-billion a year and are expected to dip to about $18-billion in fiscal 1971.

The outward calmness projected by aerospace companies is, in part, the result of long experience in dealing with severe business contractions and ex-

Justices Reject NLRB Authority On Dues Checkoff

Court Also Refuses Review Of Ruling That GE Policy In 1960 Strike Was Illegal

UMW Order Left Standing

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court ruled that the National Labor Relations Board hasn't any authority to order an employer to agree to a union's demand for a union dues checkoff provision in a collective-bargaining agreement.

The Court, in an unusually strong opinion by Justice Black, took the occasion also to emphasize that Congress intended the NLRB to be only an umpire of labor-management relations and the board "is without power to compel a company or a union to agree to any substantive contractual provision of a collective bargaining agreement."

In two other important labor cases, the Supreme Court:

—Refused to disturb an NLRB decision that held illegal General Electric Co.'s collective bargaining policy known as "Boulwarism." The board's decision may be of limited practical importance, because the ruling grew out of the 1960 strike against GE. In the recent 14-week strike, the company departed, somewhat at least, from Boulwarism, under which GE decided how much to offer the union and took the attitude its offer was nonnegotiable.

—Left standing a lower-court decision that assessed against the United Mine Workers about $1.5 million of antitrust damages to be paid to Tennessee Consolidated Coal Co. The High Court's action appeared to circumscribe somewhat the general antitrust immunity enjoyed by labor unions.

The NLRB Case

Justice Black's opinion in the case concerning the NLRB's power over substantive labor contract provisions succeeded in chastizing the employer involved, H. K. Porter Co., and then striking down the board's order against the company.

The case grew out of a dispute that began in 1961 between Porter and the United Steelworkers Union. The Steelworkers became the bargaining agent in 1961 for employes at Porter's Danville, Va., plant. Since then, according to the Black opinion, the union and company have been battling, mainly over the union's demand that the company agree to check off, or deduct, union dues from employes' paychecks.

"This delay of over eight years isn't because the case is complex," Justice Black wrote, "but appears to have occurred chiefly because of the skill of the company's negotiators in taking advantage of every opportunity for delay."

The NLRB initially ruled that Porter's refusal to bargain on the checkoff wasn't made in good faith but was done to frustrate any agreement with the Steelworkers. The ruling was based on the finding that Porter deducted insurance, taxes and other items and refused the dues checkoff, because, in the company's words, it "wasn't going to aid and comfort the union." The board at that point simply ordered Porter to bargain.

An appeals court upheld the NLRB order. There were further proceedings before the appeals court concerning the meaning of its opinion. Then the case was remanded to the board. The board, in 1968 ordered Porter to "grant to the union a contract clause providing for the check-off." A Federal appeals court affirmed that order.

The appeals court said it recognized that "the National Labor Relations Act is grounded on the premise of freedom of contract." But it held that Porter had refused to bargain on the checkoff in order to frustrate any agreement. It concluded that, where an employer repeatedly refused to bargain, an order requiring agreement on the checkoff "may be the only means of assuring that the employer no longer harbors an illegal intent."

The Supreme Court reversed the appeals court by a four-to-two vote. Justices White and Marshall didn't participate, and Justices Douglas and Stewart dissented.

Justice Black, in the majority opinion, reviewed the history of the Labor Relations Act and declared that its object "wasn't to allow Governmental regulation of the terms and conditions of employment, but to ensure that employers and employes could work together to establish mutually satisfactory conditions."

In also declaring the NLRB powerless to compel agreement on "any" substantive contractual provision, Justice Black apparently was more concerned about what the board might do in the future than what it has done.

The Porter case, according to the Black opinion, was the first time in the 35-year history of the Labor Relations Act that the NLRB ordered an employer or union to agree to a substantive provision. Justice Black suggested that the board is being faced with labor problems more complex than in the past. He said that if its "remedial powers are insufficient," Congress rather than the court should amend the Labor Relations Act.

Justices Douglas and Stewart said they were dissenting, because, even though the act "doesn't encompass compulsory arbitration," the NLRB in the Porter case had to issue the order as there wasn't any other way for it to remedy Porter's refusal to bargain.

The GE Case

The General Electric case revolved around the policy named after its former vice president, Lemuel R. Boulware.

The policy was based essentially on an application to labor matters of GE's product marketing techniques. Under the policy, GE has had a continuing program of research into employe needs, competitive factors and general economic conditions, and, when union contracts expire, it bases its new contract offers on the results of the research. Additionally, GE under the policy uses plant newspapers and other media to maintain communication with employes and to inform them of its bargaining offers. The company makes available to nonunion workers all benefits won by union employes.

The NLRB held, on the basis of a complaint filed by the International Union of Electrical Workers following the 1960 strike, that under its policy GE had bargained in bad faith in violation of the National Labor Relations Act. The board held that the "totality" of GE's actions amounted to a "take-it-or-leave-it" attitude concerning its offer to the IUE and that the company's unwillingness to bargain was "hardened . . . by a publicity campaign emphasizing (the) nonnegotiability" of its offer.

Specifically, the board said GE and the IUE opened contract talks in June 1960 and the union then presented various demands. But, the NLRB asserted, GE didn't present its offer

Burger Opinions in Two Picketing Cases Lean Toward Greater Power for States

By LOUIS M. KOHLMEIER
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — Chief Justice Burger utilized a rather obscure labor case to suggest that the Supreme Court has gone too far in curbing the power of the states to halt union picketing.

And in a second labor case, the Chief Justice joined two other members of the Court in recommending that an important 1959 decision circumscribing states' picketing-injunction authority "should be reconsidered."

"It's too early even to generalize" about where the new Chief Justice might try to lead the Court in the controversial matter of legal versus illegal picketing, one Government labor official commented. But he added: "We may begin to see a shift that would give more deference to state authority."

Mr. Burger has been Chief Justice only since October and the Court's actions on the pair of cases afforded the first opportunity for him to comment on the picketing-injunction issue.

Future Course

However, it wouldn't be surprising if Mr. Burger did try in future, more clear-cut picketing cases to bring a majority of the Justices around to his view that the Court under his predecessor, Earl Warren, went too far in curbing the states. Mr. Burger was picked for the job by President Nixon because both thought the Warren Court in various areas of the law had been too liberal in conferring power on the Federal Government at the expense of the states.

Congress in general preempted the states from the labor-relations field in 1935 when it passed the National Labor Relations Act and created the National Labor Relations Board to administer the law. The law insured workers the right to organize and barred courts from enjoining peaceful picketing, provided the picketing wasn't in furtherance of an illegal objective such as a secondary boycott.

Controversy has continued, however, over states' rights and definitions of illegal activity, and the Supreme Court has held that state courts can enjoin picketing under certain circumstances. It upheld, for example, a state court injunction against a secondary boycott in 1942 and another in 1966 where picketing was being carried on in the context of what the High Court termed a "malicious libel."

Key 1959 Decision

But the broad, general rule circumscribing state action was laid down in the key 1959 decision in which the Court said that states can't interfere with picketing that even "arguably" comes within the Federal statute and the NLRB's jurisdiction.

In one of the new cases, Alabama courts had enjoined a union from marching on a narrow sidewalk owned by the grocery store they were picketing. The state courts halted the picketing on the ground that the union was trespassing on private property.

The Supreme Court in an unsigned opinion dismissed the appeal as "improvidently granted," because the grocery-store owner had sold out and the facts of the picketing weren't entirely clear.

Most such dismissals by the High Court are perfunctory, but this one inspired a highly unusual concurring opinion by the Chief Justice and a "separate memorandum" from Justice Harlan.

Mr. Burger agreed that the case was too "obscure and atrophied" for decision, but then offered his "view" that "any contention" that Alabama courts were powerless to enjoin the picketing was "without merit." Continuing, he said: "The protection of private property, whether a home, factory or store, through trespass laws is historically a concern of state law. Congress has never undertaken to alter this allocation of power and has provided no remedy to an employer within the National Labor Relations Act to prevent an illegal trespass on his premises."

The Chief Justice cited in support of his position the High Court's 1966 decision upholding a state injunction against picketing connected with what the Court termed libel.

Justice Harlan retorted that, under the High Court rule fixed in the 1959 decision, the Alabama picketing was a matter for NLRB rather than state court consideration. Further, he asserted that the 1966 case was "far removed from the present case."

In the second case yesterday, the Supreme Court decided that Florida courts acted improperly in enjoining the International Longshoremen's Association from picketing foreign-flag cruise ships docked at Miami.

The ILA picketed the ships to protest allegedly substandard wages paid to nonunion longshoremen and the Florida courts enjoined the picketing on finding that the state wasn't preempted by the NLRB from entering the dispute. The state courts rested their finding on a series of earlier Supreme Court decisions that the NLRB didn't have authority over picketing by U.S. unions aimed at organizing foreign crew members of foreign-flag ships docked in American ports.

The New Case

In the new case, the Court held that since the ILA was picketing to protest wages paid American longshoremen, the earlier decisions didn't apply; the dispute was "arguably" within the NLRB's jurisdiction and the Florida courts were wrong in granting an injunction.

Justice Brennan wrote the opinion for the Court, resting the decision on the key 1959 case. There weren't any dissenters, but Chief Justice Burger and Justices White and Stewart joined in a separate opinion in which they concurred with Justice Brennan apparently only to the extent of agreeing that the Florida courts shouldn't have ruled that the NLRB was without jurisdiction.

They said they believed that state courts should be barred from enjoining only that picketing that "actually" and not "arguably" comes within Federal jurisdiction. "To this extent," they declared, the 1959 decision "should be reconsidered."

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court placed a new restraint on unions that exert pressure on a neutral employer or other third party to win concessions from an employer who's being struck.

The National Labor Relations Act bars such secondary pressures or boycotts where the striking union is attempting to force the neutral company to "cease doing business" with the struck company. But the Supreme Court held that union pressure can violate the law even if it falls short of forcing a complete cessation of business between the neutral concern and the struck employer.

In other actions the High Court:

—Upheld book publishers on a key procedural issue in the multiple antitrust damage suits brought against them by many public schools and libraries. The Court affirmed a lower-court ruling that lawyers for the schools and libraries may not have access to certain materials stemming from an earlier Federal grand jury investigation of the publishers' pricing practices.

—And ruled that New York State has the Constitutional right to cut off welfare payments to mothers who refuse to allow caseworkers to enter their homes. Home visitation is a "reasonable tool" the state may use in administering its Aid to Families With Dependent Children program, the Court ruled.

The Labor Case

The labor case was the latest in a long line of legal disputes over union rights in "primary" and "secondary" pressures on employers. The National Labor Relations Act ensures a union the right to engage in a "strike or picketing" against an employer who's the primary target of that union, even though other neutral concerns may be seriously affected. But the law bars a union from exerting pressure to force a neutral to "cease doing business" with a struck employer.

The new case involved a work stoppage in 1965 at the site of a nuclear power plant that was being built at Oyster Creek, N.J., for Jersey Central Power & Light Co.

The general contractor, Burns & Roe Inc., subcontracted all the construction work to three companies—White Construction Co., Chicago Bridge & Iron Co. and Poirier & McClane Corp. The three employed members of the Operating Engineers Union, but White had no contract with that union so the company assigned to members of the Ironworkers Union the job of pushing buttons that operated a welding machine. The operating engineers claimed the button-pushing work and after threatening White with a strike, demanded that Burns & Roe sign a contract that would be binding on all three subcontractors. White and Burns & Roe refused and the engineers engaged in a series of work stoppages.

The National Labor Relations Board ruled that the engineers violated the National Labor Relations Act by striking neutrals Chicago Bridge and Poirier and by coercing another neutral, Burns & Roe, to force White to assign the button-pushing to the operating engineers.

The U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia rejected the NLRB decision, holding that the act isn't violated unless a union causes a complete termination of business relations between a neutral and a primary employer.

The Supreme Court handed down a seven-to-two decision reversing the appeals court. Justice Marshall, writing the majority opinion, said that the operating engineers engaged in "a sort of pressure that was unmistakably and flagrantly secondary," and that the appeals court had given the act "too narrow" a reading. Secondary pressure in some instances might be so slight as not to be illegal, but the operating engineers' goal "wasn't limited nor were the consequences of its secondary pressure slight," Justice Marshall wrote.

Justices Douglas and Stewart dissented, saying the dispute involved solely a jurisdictional dispute between unions, and the NLRB should have regarded it as such.

The Book Case

The Justices split four-to-four on the book antitrust case, thus automatically affirming the lower court's decision. Justice Douglas didn't participate.

The antitrust suits were filed against more than a dozen publishers of children's books by eight states, the cities of Chicago and Nashville and various other schools and school districts. The suits alleged that the publishers had conspired with their wholesalers to inflate the prices of library editions of children's books.

Lawyers who filed the suits, after spending longer than a year taking depositions of more than 100 witnesses, sought from a Federal district court in Chicago permission to take harrative statements from employes and former employes of the publishers relating to their earlier testimony before the grand jury. The publishers argued that such statements would violate confidential attorney-client relationships. But the district court judge held that the lawyers representing the schools and libraries could see the statements of some 30 present or former employes of the publishers.

An appeals court, however, held that the school and library attorneys couldn't have access to 17 of the statements.

These lawyers sought Supreme Court review of the appeals court's decision. The Supreme Court announced its four-to-four split in a one-line opinion.

The Welfare Case

In the welfare case, the Court upheld New York State's home-visitation requirement in a majority opinion that was the first written by Justice Blackmun, a Nixon appointee who joined the Supreme Court last year.

Under the state's Aid to Families With Dependent Children program, recipients, to qualify for continued welfare payments, must agree to allow caseworkers to enter their homes. The purpose of the visits, according to New York law, is to assure that welfare is given only "in such amount and as long as necessary" and to restore beneficiaries to self-support. Under the law, caseworkers can't forcibly enter a home or snoop on a beneficiary.

The state law was challenged by a beneficiary who charged that the home visits constituted a search and thus violated her Constitutional rights unless conducted under authority of a court-approved warrant. A three-judge Federal court in New York held the visits unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court reversed the lower court in a six-to-three decision. Justice Blackmun's majority opinion held that the home visits are "a reasonable administrative tool" for the state to use in making or withholding welfare payments and that the visits don't violate a beneficiary's Constitutional rights. At the same time, Justice Blackmun suggested that home visits wouldn't be legal if they took the form of police raids or otherwise intimidated welfare beneficiaries.

Justices Douglas, Marshall and Brennan dissented. Justice Douglas asserted that the home visits constitute an unconstitutional invasion of a beneficiary's right to privacy, saying that "the bureaucracy of modern government is . . . omnipresent. It pries more and more into private affairs, breaking down the barriers that individuals erect to give them some insulation from the harassments of modern life."

Western Nuclear Union Accord

DENVER—Western Nuclear Inc., a minerals developer, said it signed a new three-year agreement covering 200 uranium mill and mine employes at its Jeffrey City, Wyo., operations.

The contract, with District 50 of the International Union of Allied and Technical Workers, calls for wage increases averaging 50 cents an hour over three years, an increase in work turn premiums, and improvements in hospital, surgical and major medical insurance, according to the company.

Washington Shift

The NLRB, With GOP Majority Again, Is Seen Becoming More Pro-Business

By ELLIOT CARLSON
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—Union men are finding it tougher sledding once again at the National Labor Relations Board.

Accused of a pro-labor bias during its 10 years of Democratic domination, the board has begun to shift ground now that it has a Republican majority. It's hewing closer to lines generally favored by employers, putting more obstacles in the path of union negotiators and organizers—though it hasn't yet upset any landmark decisions favoring labor.

"We may be moving back to a period where employers could get away with anything," contends Stephen Schlossberg, general counsel of the United Auto Workers. "They'll be able to make all kinds of threats against workers trying to organize and scare the pants off them." Union people generally claim the board had a pro-employer bias during Eisenhower days.

The board's Republican chairman, Edward B. Miller, has been in office for 10 months, though the five-man board has had a Republican majority only since January. It already is getting high marks from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. For the most part, the board's recent decisions "represent a favorable turn," says Anthony J. Obadal, the chamber's director of labor relations. But Mr. Miller and his majority get failing marks from unions. "Miller doesn't appear to be very sympathetic toward workers," says Mr. Schlossberg. He cites as one example the chairman's deciding vote last year against a severe new remedy sought by the UAW against an employer that had long refused to negotiate.

Mr. Miller

Two Terms Expire Soon

Labor's disaffection is expected to deepen this summer, when the terms of two Democratic officials expire. The first, in June, is that of Arnold Ordman, who, as general counsel but not a board member, decides whether to issue unfair labor practice complaints to be heard by NLRB examiners. The second, in August, is that of board member Gerald Brown, long an object of employer wrath. The replacements are expected to be more conservative.

But the changes aren't enough to placate all the board's conservative critics in Congress. Republican Rep. John Ashbrook of Ohio, still professing grave doubts that the board decides cases fairly, recently proposed that it be replaced by an independent labor court.

There's dissatisfaction, too, among liberal Democrats. On Thursday a House Labor subcommittee led by New Jersey Rep. Frank Thompson begins hearings that will, among other things, review the board's performance and consider legislation aimed at strengthening remedies available to aggrieved workers.

Clues to the NLRB's future course under Mr. Miller may be provided in a number of pending cases. One issue is whether the NLRB should decide disputes where contractual arbitration provisions haven't been exhausted. Another deals with the extent to which employers may refuse to recognize union authorization cards and demand an election. Finally, in a widely publicized case involving a Texas farm cooperative, the NLRB is grappling with whether racial bias in hiring and promotion constitutes an unfair labor practice.

Debate About the Mission

Critics say that if the NLRB decides to defer to arbitration provisions this would indicate a board less likely to intervene in tough union-employer disputes. What's more, "there are signs the Miller board will be much less innovative in extending employe rights" against employers, says Theodore J. St. Antoine, a professor at the University of Michigan law school.

A case in point, he says, was Mr. Miller's vote last year against a UAW demand that Ex-Cell-O Corp., a Detroit machine-tool maker, reimburse employes for wage boosts allegedly lost by its refusal to bargain. The board unanimously agreed the company's refusal was illegal, but it ruled 3-to-2 that the NLRB lacked authority to order such an unusual remedy. (An appeals court later disagreed; the NLRB is seeking Supreme Court review of the case.)

Denying any pro-management bias, the 49-year-old Mr. Miller contends he simply interprets the job differently from Frank McCulloch, his Democratic predecessor. "Frank felt the board had a social mission over and above just interpreting the law," explains Mr. Miller, a soft-spoken, reflective man who before his appointment was a lawyer for managements in Chicago. "My view is that the NLRB should be as much as possible like a court, without any social or economic objectives."

To show his impartiality, Mr. Miller says that under his chairmanship the board has continued some controversial McCulloch-board trends, such as extending NLRB jurisdiction to new sectors of the economy. To professional baseball, nonprofit colleges and nursing homes and private hospitals, the Miller board has added orphanages and homes for unwed mothers and now is considering extending coverage to employes of law firms.

Moreover, employers harbor reservations about some Miller-board decisions, such as a unanimous ruling ordering General Electric Co., in certain circumstances, to turn over to three Electrical Workers Union locals wage information confidentially gathered for bargaining purposes.

Less Venturesome

Nonetheless, the Miller board generally is expected to be less venturesome than its Democratic predecessor. The old board had ruled that employers had to assume the labor contracts of predecessor firms, for instance, but the Miller board recently held that under some circumstances, an employer isn't bound by a predecessor's labor contract.

Yet even its severest critics don't expect the Miller board completely to overturn landmark rulings. For one thing, the courts have affirmed so many past decisions that the most rambunctious board couldn't upset existing precedents. For another, such activism would be out of character for the new chairman.

Rather than fashion radical new remedies, the chairman believes the board simply should intervene less in local labor disputes. This view has shown up regularly in his opinions. Basically, Mr. Miller would allow both employers and unions in representation elections "a wider latitude of speech," would intervene less frequently in cases where there are accusations of failing to bargain in "good faith" and would demand more convincing proof to support charges of unfair labor practices.

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court rejected a Labor Department argument for broader authority to police union elections.

The high court held in a seven-to-two decision that, under the Landrum-Griffin Act, the department can bring suit only against those union practices that a union member protests to his union before bringing his case to the department. The department's rejected argument was that if, in the course of investigating a member's complaint, it confirmed violations the member hadn't cited to the union, the department could sue to halt them.

In a second decision, the high court ruled that state courts don't have jurisdiction to decide whether a union improperly ousted a member for alleged nonpayment of dues and caused him to be fired by his employer. The five-to-four decision reaffirmed an earlier Supreme Court ruling that held that such matters are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.

Contested Election

The first case grew out of a contested election for the presidency of a United Steelworkers local in California. The unsuccessful candidate, Nicholas Hantzis, protested the election to the union, alleging that the incumbent president, who was reelected, had used union facilities to prepare campaign materials. After Mr. Hantzis failed to get satisfaction from the union, he filed a complaint with the Labor Department.

The complaint cited the incumbent president's alleged use of union facilities and, for the first time, contested a union rule that restricted candidacy to members who had attended at least half of all local meetings in the prior three years. After investigating, the Labor Department concluded that both charges were valid and that the incumbent's activity and the rule violated the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The department then brought suit against the union to set the election aside. A federal district court held that the incumbent had illegally used union facilities but decided the meeting attendance rule wasn't illegal. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco agreed on the incumbent's activities but held that Mr. Hantzis' failure to challenge the meeting requirement through internal union procedures precluded the Labor Department challenge.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Thurgood Marshall, affirmed the Ninth Circuit's ruling. Justice Marshall said Congress intended the Act to encourage unions to take action themselves to make their internal election procedures more democratic and wanted the government involved only as a last resort.

If the Labor Department could file suit against union practices that the union itself hadn't been given the opportunity to correct, union "self-government . . . would be needlessly" weakened, Justice Marshall said.

Justices William Brennan and Byron White dissented, saying they believed Congress didn't intend to so restrict the Labor Department.

In the second decision, the Supreme Court upheld a basic position of organized labor that practically all labor disputes are within the sole jurisdiction of the NLRB, rather than state courts.

The case originated in an Idaho court where Wilson P. Lockridge, who had been a bus driver for Greyhound Corp., brought suit against the Amalgamated Association of Street, Electric Railway and Motor Coach Employes. The union had suspended Mr. Lockridge from membership for alleged failure to pay his dues on time, and because he lost his membership Greyhound discharged him. His suit charged that the union had wrongfully deprived him of employment and that his suspension from membership had violated the union constitution.

State Court's Ruling

The Idaho Supreme Court decided that Mr. Lockridge's charges didn't constitute an unfair labor practice charge within the exclusive jurisdiction of the NLRB. It held that the union constitution was a contract between the union and its members and that the suit thus charged a breach of contract under state law. On that basis, the state court awarded Mr. Lockridge damages for lost wages and ordered the union to reinstate his membership.

The Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice John M. Harlan, reversed the state court. The Harlan opinion citing earlier high court opinions on the jurisdictional issue, said that cases involving practices that are or probably are barred by the National Labor Relations Act are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the NLRB, notwithstanding the contractual nature of the union constitution. Justice Harlan said Congress's purpose in creating the NLRB was to foster a comprehensive national labor policy and avoid varying approaches to labor problems.

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice White joined in a dissenting opinion. Justices William O. Douglas and Harry Blackmun dissented separately. The Burger-White opinion said "state courts should not be foreclosed from extending relief for union deprivation of members' state law rights." Justice Douglas said he would allow Mr. Lockridge to file his case in his home state "and not require him to resort to an elusive remedy in Washington." Justice Blackmun said simply that he agreed with both dissenting opinions.

Boyle to Appeal Conviction on Fund Use; But Foes in UMW May Try to Oust Him

4/3/72 Labor-Pol

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—United Mine Workers President W. A. (Tony) Boyle plans to seek a new trial, after being convicted of making illegal political contributions from union funds.

Indications were, however, that longtime opponents of Mr. Boyle might challenge his hold on the 180,000-member union while his appeals are pending.

Mr. Boyle was allowed to remain free while awaiting sentencing, for which a date hasn't been set. He faces up to 32 years in prison, $120,000 in fines and loss of the union post he has held since 1963.

The 67-year-old union leader was found guilty by a federal jury here on all 13 counts of an indictment charging him with:

—One count of conspiring to convert money unlawfully from the union's general fund to the use of others.

—Eleven counts of specific contributions to political campaigns in violation of the Corrupt Practices Act.

—One count of illegal conversion of union funds to political campaigns in violation of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Two union officials charged along with Mr. Boyle were acquitted on all counts against them. John Owens, the union's secretary-treasurer, was found innocent of participating in one of the alleged contributions and in the alleged conspiracy. And John Kmetz, its chief lobbyist, was found innocent of participating in the alleged conspiracy and with aiding Mr. Boyle in two of the alleged contributions and in the conversion of the union money.

Challenge to Union Office

If Mr. Boyle's conviction stands, he could be prevented from holding union office for five years. However, a government spokesman said Mr. Boyle probably could retain his current office until he has exhausted the appeal process, which could take as long as a year. His current term expires in 1975.

But some of Mr. Boyle's opponents inside the United Mine Workers mightn't wait till the appeals are exhausted before seeking to oust him. "We're considering a number of legal possibilities," said Joseph Rauh Jr., a Washington lawyer who represents Miners for Democracy, an insurgent group. He said the group's course probably would depend on the outcome of other legal actions involving Mr. Boyle.

For example, another federal court here is considering a Labor Department suit to overturn the 1969 election in which Mr. Boyle defeated insurgent Joseph A. "Jock" Yablonski. Mr. Yablonski, his wife and daughter were murdered less than a month after the election, which was marked by charges of irregularities. A decision in the Labor Department case is expected this month.

And last year, a federal court ordered Mr. Boyle to step down as a trustee of the UMW's welfare and retirement fund. The order was part of a decision in which the union and the fund were found liable in a breach-of-trust civil suit brought by miners and widows.

Move for New Trial

Mr. Boyle's move for a new trial in the criminal case is expected later this month. A spokesman said he didn't know what grounds would be used in the effort to win a new trial, and Mr. Boyle wasn't available for comment. Most UMW officials declined to discuss the case, but Emmett Thomas, a member of the union's executive board, said, "Mr. Boyle acted solely in the interests of the men who dig coal. Not a single penny of union money was diverted to his own personal use or interest."

During the two-week trial, the government charged that under Mr. Boyle's direction $49,250 in union funds was contributed between 1967 and 1969 to congressional candidates of both the Democratic and Republican parties and to the 1968 Democratic presidential candidate, Hubert Humphrey. According to the indictment, Sen. Humphrey, then Vice President, received the largest donation, $30,000.

Other contributions listed in the indictment were to help Rep. Wayne Hays (D., Ohio), Rep. John Saylor (R., Pa.), former Sen. Wayne Morse (D., Ore.) and former Rep. Arnold Olsen (D., Mont.).

The government charged these contributions were illegal under provisions that bar the use of union funds for political causes unless the money is voluntarily donated by members to a group set up specifically for such a purpose. In the UMW case, the government alleged, most of the contributions were made through the union's legislative arm, Labor's Nonpartisan League. The government argued that the league's prime source of funds for these donations was the UMW's general fund, supported by members' dues.

'Best Offer' Arbitration's Critics

By BYRON E. CALAME

WASHINGTON — President Nixon calls it the "Crippling Strikes Prevention Act," and on paper it looks seductively simple.

The idea is to avert disruptive strikes against railroads and other transportation industries, and the heart of the Nixon proposal is the "final offer selection" procedure. In theory, it would work something like this:

Suppose union-management negotiations have deadlocked, with the union demanding a 12% raise and management offering 8%. A strike looms. Instead, the President orders each side to submit its "last best offer" to an impartial panel. The union comes down to 11% and management comes up to 9%. The panel then picks one offer or the other—it doesn't have the authority to split the difference—and imposes it. That's all there's to it: The bargaining is over, the strike averted.

Backers of the administration plan, now bogged down on Capitol Hill, see it as a real advance over existing procedures. They contend it would force bargainers for both sides to narrow their differences; each would be trying to persuade the panel that its position was the more reasonable one. Supporters argue that this is a big improvement over compulsory arbitration, which offers greater latitudes to the arbitrators and tends to encourage negotiators to stake out extreme positions in the expectation that arbitrators will split the difference. Indeed, some high administration officials insist that if Congress would only pass their bill, nationally crippling transportation strikes would be a thing of the past.

Questions of Workability

But critics of the administration's proposal are raising serious questions about its workability, questions that Senate opponents of the plan are citing in fighting the measure. And most of the labor relations arbitrators, mediators and professors who have publicly expressed their views of the new procedure say it wouldn't avert all emergency transportation strikes.

Are the arbitrators and mediators against the plan because it would cut them out of their jobs? This is the argument of administration officials. Yet it would seem that while their roles might be diminished in time by the new procedure, experienced arbitrators would always be required to help man the selection panels the procedure would require—and, of course, to handle the great bulk of labor disputes that don't create any "national emergency."

Essentially, the critics doubt the Nixon plan would be flexible enough to allow the trade-offs and compromises that are so much a part of the bargaining process. They fear that the impartial panels would often find themselves choosing the "least unreasonable" of two rival offers. Further, the winner-take-all nature of the process could make it hard for union leaders to keep their rank-and-filers in line in cases where the employer's offer is selected, they say.

Top administration officials who developed the idea insist they're not dissuaded by this litany of infirmities. Their reasoning: In the overall perspective, the proposal's unpalatableness may well be its key strength. The prime argument for the measure, one of its "I would suggest, of the cases with which I have been intimately familiar, that (in) only a fraction—substantially less than half—would this have been feasible," he told a Senate subcommittee recently. Even some administration labor relations experts concede they respect Mr. Simkin's views.

The Nixon proposal "assumes that on all issues in bargaining there is a middle ground," frets Theodore Kheel, veteran New York arbitrator and mediator. "Perhaps the wage issue can be put in this category. But not the most difficult (issue) of labor relations in recent years: the elimination of jobs as the result of technological change. . . . This issue is never a simple clash of two opposing views which can be decided on an either-or basis."

Manning and work rule issues "require delicate neutral adjustment between valid but conflicting positions," writes Charles Rehmus, co-director of the Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations run by the University of Michigan and Wayne State University. "Final-offer arbitration does not permit this process to operate where it is most needed," he asserts, citing three public-sector disputes where the procedure was tried.

Mr. Rehmus reports that the procedure failed in disputes in Massachusetts and Michigan where the labor issues involved work rules. "The parties remained poles apart, and the neutrals refused to select any of the offers because all were deemed unreasonable," he explains. (The Nixon plan would force the panel to make a choice.) In a New York dispute where the sole issue was pay, however, the final-offer approach proved effective because "dollar differences are almost infinitely divisible," he observes.

Since the panel can't modify the offers, it might have to accept certain inequities in making a choice, some labor relations experts fear. Mediator David Cole, "a highly regarded old pro" in the words of Labor Secretary James Hodgson, recently outlined how such a dilemma might develop where the final-offer procedure is used:

Mr. Cole suggested union bargainers might decide "we will make a more modest (wage) request than we have been holding out for, but we will put in all these work rules and things we like. The board . . . will like our money offer—they will think we are modest about that. So they will accept ours, and, boy, we will have a contract that will really do the job for us.

"Or, vice-versa, the employer may make something that looks like a generous wage offer, (but) put in a lot of working conditions the union cannot live with. But the board cannot separate them out—they have got to give the union the whole works."

The win-lose atmosphere of the final offer scheme troubles some labor-relations men. "The package selected . . . will be an imposed settlement that will represent a victory for one side and a defeat for the other," cautions W. Glen Harlan, Eastern Airlines' senior vice president for legal affairs, in a recent American Bar Association Journal article. Merton Bernstein, Ohio State University law professor, takes the problem a step further: "Anyone with labor-relations experience knows that whenever a winner and a loser use might involve special difficulties."

The Labor Department recently issued a press release summarizing the opinions of several professors who have filed statements favoring the bill. But the professors and the parties on the firing line don't always agree. Eaton Conant, director of the University of Oregon's Institute of Industrial and Labor Relations, reported "limited experience" with a final-offer option plan in the city of Eugene, Ore., "indicates it can work."

A city official interviewed concedes that Eugene's first use of the procedure did force a settlement in a March dispute with firemen, but he notes that there are growing signs that the terms of the imposed pact won't be fully honored by the disgruntled union members. A union leader agrees that some "harassment" by resentful firemen is already occurring. Thus, the city official concludes flatly: "It's not working." Both union and city officials confess they were surprised when the three-member panel picked the lower of the city's two alternative final offers by a two-to-one vote; the city's offers were 6% and 6.5%, the union's final demands were 7.5% and 8.8%, according to the municipal official.

Several professors agree with Donald Cullen of Cornell's School of Industrial and Labor Relations, who has testified that he would like to see the "challenging new idea" tried. Harvard economics professor Carl Stevens concedes that "some of the answers to questions about its workability can only be had by actual trial." Mr. Cullen figures that "if by some quirk a truly disastrous contract did result in some case, Congress could presumably undo the damage by passing a law that would set aside that particular award."

All Imperfect, So . . .

Almost everyone who has analyzed the Nixon administration proposal can probably agree with Mr. Meltzer that "all procedures for dealing with critical transportation strikes are likely to be imperfect." So it might be worthwhile sticking with the often untidy mediation procedures that now exist for a while longer—and for several reasons.

There are some indications that selective strikes—or lockouts—could be used more to create the pressure needed to produce voluntary settlements. The most recent major labor dispute on the railroads was voluntarily settled last August after an 18-day selective strike against 10 carriers by the United Transportation Union. And major maritime unions have recently pledged to work with management to try to voluntarily set up machinery that would lead to the binding arbitration of disputes.

Moreover, it appears that many of the transportation walkouts that were labeled "national emergencies" weren't really that damaging. Despite some White House efforts to downgrade its conclusions, no one has ever really refuted a study prepared in 1969 at the direction of then Labor Secretary Shultz. It determined that three Atlantic and Gulf Coast Longshoremen's strikes between 1962 and 1969 had a "minimal" impact on the national economy. Earlier this year, the Pay Board's staff concluded that the strike by West Coast dockers didn't create a national crisis either.

None of this adds up to what the adminis-

tion strikes.

Are the arbitrators and mediators against the plan because it would cut them out of their jobs? This is the argument of administration officials. Yet it would seem that while their roles might be diminished in time by the new procedure, experienced arbitrators would always be required to help man the selection panels the procedure would require—and, of course, to handle the great bulk of labor disputes that don't create any "national emergency."

Essentially, the critics doubt the Nixon plan would be flexible enough to allow the trade-offs and compromises that are so much a part of the bargaining process. They fear that the impartial panels would often find themselves choosing the "least unreasonable" of two rival offers. Further, the winner-take-all nature of the process could make it hard for union leaders to keep their rank-and-filers in line in cases where the employer's offer is selected, they say.

Top administration officials who developed the idea insist they're not dissuaded by this litany of infirmities. Their reasoning: In the overall perspective, the proposal's unpalatableness may well be its key strength. The prime argument for the measure, one of its principal architects suggests, is that the parties, in effect, would be so fearful of resorting to the final offer option that they would reach agreement voluntarily. The fact that the procedure could prove unfair to one side "constitutes a strong disincentive to use it," asserts Undersecretary of Labor Laurence Silberman.

Organized labor opposes the Nixon plan as being nothing more than sugar-coated compulsory arbitration, and President Nixon himself acknowledged as much during his recent visit to John Connally's ranch in Texas. Whatever else that one can say about compulsory arbitration, it hasn't proved itself to be a panacea for averting strikes.

A study of Australia's compulsory arbitration system published in a recent issue of the Labor Department's Monthly Labor Review makes this point. Under the system, working days lost as a result of strikes spurted to 3.1 million last year from 2.4 million in 1970 and only 1.1 million in 1968, according to the analysis, which was written by Kingsley Laffer, associate professor of industrial relations at the University of Sidney.

With the administration hoping for a Senate vote this year on the measure, the White House appears to be gearing up to take its case to the public again just as it did during the recent West Coast dock tieup. One reason: Public sentiment stirred up by the administration during the West Coast walkout spurred a test vote in the Senate on the legislation—and the measure lost by a surprisingly close 42 to 39 margin.

Shortly after asking Congress last February to pass stopgap legislation to resolve the dock strike, Mr. Nixon contended in a special message to Congress that the walkout could have been averted by the enactment of his permanent reform. The message was intended "to emphasize again to the Congress and to the American people" that Mr. Nixon's broad reform would have made it "unnecessary to come up (to Congress) with this request for ad hoc legislation," a high administration official explained at a White House briefing.

An 'Arsenal' of Weapons

Mr. Nixon's proposal would supposedly give him an "arsenal" of three weapons for settling emergency disputes in the rail, trucking, airline, longshore and maritime industries. In addition to invoking the final-offer procedure, he could require partial operation of the affected industry (anathema to management) or order an extension of no-strike periods provided for in existing laws. The theory: If the parties aren't sure which weapon the President will fire at them first in a strike, the uncertainty will spur them to reach a voluntary agreement.

Nevertheless, the final offer option is the "guts" of the bill and the alternative the President would use most of the time, almost everyone agrees. Specifically, it would require each side to submit either one or two "final offers" for consideration by a neutral three-member panel: Each offer would have to "constitute a complete bargaining agreement and resolve all the issues involved in the dispute."

The question, of course, is whether the procedure will work. That question obviously can't be answered with certainty. The procedure has not been tested so the sharply-differing opinions about it are based largely on conjecture. But several veteran arbitrators and mediators have seriously questioned the workability of the procedure in testimony and statements being gathered by congressional committees.

The final offer approach "isn't a panacea," asserts William Simkin, former head of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. such a dilemma might develop where the final-offer procedure is used:

Mr. Cole suggested union bargainers might decide "we will make a more modest (wage) request than we have been holding out for, but we will put in all these work rules and things we like. The board . . . will like our money offer—they will think we are modest about that. So they will accept ours, and, boy, we will have a contract that will really do the job for us.

"Or, vice-versa, the employer may make something that looks like a generous wage offer, (but) put in a lot of working conditions the union cannot live with. But the board cannot separate them out—they have got to give the union the whole works."

The win-lose atmosphere of the final offer scheme troubles some labor-relations men. "The package selected . . . will be an imposed settlement that will represent a victory for one side and a defeat for the other," cautions W. Glen Harlan, Eastern Airlines' senior vice president for legal affairs, in a recent American Bar Association Journal article. Merton Bernstein, Ohio State University law professor, takes the problem a step further: "Anyone with labor-relations experience knows that whenever a winner and a loser may be identified, the leadership of the loser is likely, if only to regain face, to cause trouble."

While Messrs. Simkin, Cole and Kheel, all practicing arbitrators, have showed up to publicly question the final offer process during recent Senate hearings on the Nixon bill, only one specialist testified in favor of the measure. Other specialists have filed statements backing and opposing the bill. Almost every specialist stating an opinion, however, concedes the final offer procedure won't prevent all emergency transportation strikes.

Bernard Meltzer, a well-known arbitrator and law professor at the University of Chicago, maintains that the final-offer option would "stimulate both parties to engage in reasonable and responsible negotiations." While rating the process an improvement over the present mediation procedures, he admits "there are naturally some circumstances in which its availability might not produce the expected results in bargaining or in which its worthwhile sticking with the often untidy mediation procedures that now exist for a while longer—and for several reasons.

There are some indications that selective strikes—or lockouts—could be used more to create the pressure needed to produce voluntary settlements. The most recent major labor dispute on the railroads was voluntarily settled last August after an 18-day selective strike against 10 carriers by the United Transportation Union. And major maritime unions have recently pledged to work with management to try to voluntarily set up machinery that would lead to the binding arbitration of disputes.

Moreover, it appears that many of the transportation walkouts that were labeled "national emergencies" weren't really that damaging. Despite some White House efforts to downgrade its conclusions, no one has ever really refuted a study prepared in 1969 at the direction of then Labor Secretary Shultz. It determined that three Atlantic and Gulf Coast Longshoremen's strikes between 1962 and 1969 had a "minimal" impact on the national economy. Earlier this year, the Pay Board's staff concluded that the strike by West Coast dockers didn't create a national crisis either.

None of this adds up to what the administration is claiming for its plan: a sweeping, guaranteed solution to the problem of emergency strikes in the transportation industry. Other efforts to improve the present collective bargaining system are cautious and sometimes painful steps forward, not the kind of fundamental breakthroughs the administration is promising.

But the evidence indicates that the administration may well be overselling its solution. The arbitrators, mediators and academic experts closest to the problem generally agree that, at best, the administration proposal would not solve all crippling transportation labor disputes. At worst, it could often prove unworkable. Over the long haul, the continuing search for a better way to resolve emergency disputes may be hindered if the White House raises false hopes now.

Meany Cites 25-Year Experience:

Taft-Hartley Act Restrictions Proved Barrier to Organizing

The following is excerpted from an article by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in the June 18, 1972, New York Times on the 25th anniversary of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

IT IS THE OPINION of every union official and organizer, and it is certainly my opinion, that the changes Taft-Hartley made in the Wagner Act have been major obstacles to organizing.

Some major segments of the economy, such as the southern textile industry, are today still substantially nonunion and low wage, and Taft-Hartley has surely played a major role in perpetuating those conditions.

Among the Taft-Hartley provisions that have had an anti-union impact are:

● The so-called employer free speech provision, which was specifically intended to sanction employer harangues to captive audiences of employes required to attend on company time. This sort of compelled listening is demeaning to the employes and is inherently coercive in its parading of the employer's power and authority over his workers. Two-thirds of the employers use captive audience speeches during organizing campaigns.

● Taft-Hartley required the NLRB to conduct a hearing before every election. This bogged down the board's election machinery and gave employers abundant time to pressure and brainwash employes.

● Taft-Hartley broadly prohibited secondary boycotts, thereby preventing unions from helping each other, although employers are under no such disability.

● The Taft-Hartley Act invites the states to legislate the compulsory open shop, while forbidding them to permit the closed shop. The 19 so-called "right-to-work" states are exactly one-half as organized as the rest of the country: union membership averages 16 percent of the nonfarm workforce, as against 32 percent in the rest of the country.

The main impact of the Taft-Hartley Act has been its adverse effect upon new organizing, and it has had relatively little effect where unions were already strongly established by 1947.

The act is largely concerned with regulating the conduct of employes and unions during organizing campaigns, and as Frank W. McCulloch, former chairman of the NLRB, has noted, "the bulk of [the NLRB's] unfair labor pratice caseload arises out of organizing and election situations."

Once a union has been recognized and accepted by the employer, the Labor Act is of only peripheral significance.

In consequence, the wage gap has widened during the years since 1947 between industries that were solidly organized then and industries that were then unorganized, or where the percentage of organization was too small for unions to bargain effectively, and where Taft-Hartley has blocked subsequent unionization.

The question remains as to what sort of revision of the Taft-Hartley Act the AFL-CIO would support.

In general, we would like to see two things done. First, the act should be strengthened to make real once more its purported guarantees of the rights to organize and bargain collectively. Second, the act should be revised so as to make it fair as between unions and workers on the one hand and employers on the other.

These problems are interrelated. For example, the act mandates prompt and drastic remedies against various types of union activities that are forbidden by the act and that have major impact upon employers. Among these union practices are secondary boycotts, jurisdictional disputes, hot-cargo clauses and organizational and recognition picketing.

Once a charge is filed that a union has engaged in a practice of this sort, the general counsel of the Labor Board undertakes, as a matter of priority, a preliminary investigation, and, if the investigation discloses "reasonable cause to believe that such charge is true," he is required by the act to petition the District Court for injunctive relief pending board hearing and adjudication of the matter.

THE VERY FAST and effective enforcement mechanism safeguards employers against all of these forbidden union practices, which are apt to be most harmful to employers.

In marked contrast, there is no provision for mandatory injunctions against employers, no matter how crass their violations of the act and no matter how injurious they may be to unions and workers. The commonest violation of the act, after nearly 30 years, is still the discharge of workers for joining a union. Ordinarily no remedy whatever is forthcoming in these cases for three or four years, during which the discharged employes may be thrown on relief and the organizing efforts will certainly be permanently thwarted. Is this even-handed justice?

Again, the Taft-Hartley Act provides for private damage suits by employers against unions for any violation of the secondary boycott and jurisdictional dispute provisions, but it affords no right of action to unions or workers against employers for any conduct, however unlawful or however harmful to employes or unions.

As long as the Taft-Hartley Act fails to protect the basic rights of workers and unions, and is heavily and unfairly slanted in favor of employers, unions must and will refuse to accept it and will and must seek to change it. It is not a matter of doctrinal dogmatism but of simple justice.

APPRENTICESHIP TRAINING gets a lift from Federal funds.

Uncle Sam plays a growing role as third partner in joint union-management apprentice training programs. Labor Department grants will help train 15,000 to 20,000 persons in "apprentice-entry" programs this year, up from 11,000 in 1965. Such programs, lasting a few weeks to a year, count toward fulfilling total apprenticeships of two or more years.

More than a dozen new bricklayers' programs sprout with Federal aid this year; in North Carolina, the bricklayers union enrolls 500 new apprentices. Similar programs start for pressmen, bakers, roofers, ironworkers. Besides opening jobs for youths and providing needed skills, the Federal efforts are intended to speed entry of Negroes into traditionally white apprenticeship programs.

Some unions, however, shun Federal aid, fearing "interference" in their apprentice se lection and standards.

Persecution of Mine-Mill Union Ends

The Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers Union finally is free of government harassment on charges of communist infiltration.

Two significant events in June cleared the union of major charges which had been hanging over it for more than a decade.

• On June 13, the U.S. Department of Justice joined with union lawyers in asking the Subversive Activities Control Board to wipe out an old order stating that the union was communist infiltrated. The Board agreed to do so and thereby wiped out a case brought against the union in 1955.

• On June 20, the United States Supreme Court, by a remarkable 9-0 vote, reversed lower court convictions of six past and present officials and employes of the union on a charge that they had conspired to defraud the government by filing false non-communist affidavits.

The conspiracy case dates back to 1956 and is almost incredible in its content. The history, briefly, is this:

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, as originally passed, officers of unions securing the services of the National Labor Relations Board were required to file affidavits stating that they were not communists. In 1956 fourteen officers and members of the union were charged by the government with "conspiring" to file false affidavits. Actually, only a part of this number were officers and filed affidavits of any sort — the others were merely charged with "conspiring" with those officers who did file affidavits.

Vindicated

Sec.-Treas. Irving Dichter, left, and Pres. A. C. Skinner, right, of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers were among the six officers and employes of the union whose convictions on a charge of "conspiring to defraud the government by filing false anti-communist affidavits" were reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court. Their vindication came after a ten year fight through the courts.

Later the section of Taft-Hartley requiring the affidavits was repealed, but still the government persisted in pressing the case. At various points during the following decade, eight of the 14 original defendants were removed from the case by acquittal, death and other causes, leaving six under charge.

The six were convicted in two different trials in U.S. District Court in Denver. On the first occasion, the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the convictions. After this reversal, many people and organizations urged the Justice Department to drop the case. These included OCAW, with its then president, O. A. Knight, writing a letter to Robert Kennedy, at that time attorney general, urging him to drop prosecution. But the government persisted in re-trying the case, again there was conviction in District Court, with three year prison sentences and fines of $2,000 assessed against each of the six. And this time the Circuit Court upheld the conviction. Thereafter the case was appealed to the Supreme Court.

was 11 years old. In 1955, the Justice Department, petitioned the Board to rule that the union was communist-infiltrated. Seven years later, in 1962, the Board did so. But last November the Federal Court of Appeals returned the case to the Board on the grounds that the evidence was "stale."

In joining with the union to ask that the case be dropped (and this happened in advance of the Supreme Court ruling on the other case), the Justice Department as much as admitted that it had no evidence that would stand up in court.

The bulk of the evidence had to do with events in the 1940s with some even going back to the 1930s. Among the union activities branded in the case as "communistic" and as "evidence" that the union was "communist-infiltrated" were support for civil rights for Negroes and Mexican-Americans.

(Technically, the prosecution against the six on the conspiracy charge is still alive, since the Supreme Court only reversed the conviction and ordered retrial in District Court; however, there is virtually no doubt that the Justice Department now will move to drop the matter, in view of the strong position taken by the Supreme Court.)

Joining with and supporting the Mine-Mill people in presenting arguments to the Supreme Court were United Auto Workers, United Packinghouse Workers, Amalgamated Clothing Workers, Amalgamated Meat Cutters, American Federation of Teachers, International Typographical Union, Transport Workers Union, National Farmers Union and the American Civil Liberties Union.

All nine justices voted to reverse the conviction on the grounds that defense lawyers had not been allowed to examine grand jury minutes.

Justice Hugo Black, joined by Justice William O. Douglas, went further and sharply criticized the government and the trial court for refusing to allow the union men to question the constitutionality of the anti-communist section of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Justice Black remarked, "I must say with considerable regret that future historians reporting this case may justifiably draw an inference that it is the petitioners (the union men) and not the Government who have been defrauded."

The six men involved are A. C. Skinner, now president of Mine-Mill; Irving Dichter, now secretary-treasurer; Raymond Dennis, executive board member; Charles Wilson, international representative; Harold Sanderson, administrative assistant; and M. E. Travis former secretary-treasurer, who has not been with the union for many years. Four of the six — Dennis, Dichter, Travis and Wilson — were officers at the time and signed affidavits. Skinner and Sanderson were not officers at the time and did not sign affidavits.

THE IMPACT OF LABOR LEGISLATION ON THE LOCAL UNION

We examined the functions of a local union, which are: 1) to organize and educate (a continuing activity); 2) to administer the contract and the affairs of the local union; and 3) to bargain collectively, both for the contract and on a day-to-day basis in the grievance procedure. Other activities of a local, such as community services, recreation, public relations and political action are related to the three primary functions.

We then discussed the impact of labor law on these three primary functions of the local, concentrating on the effects of the Taft-Hartley law:

1. Impact of TH on organizing:

- Section 7: rights of employees.
- Section 8: unfair labor practices by employers and unions, "free speech" for employers.
- Section 9: representation proceedings, matters subject to exclusive representation, provision for individual bargaining, determination of bargaining unit, election proceedings, 12 month limitation, exclusion of economic strikers from protection of Act, decertification of union as bargaining agent.
- Section 10: prevention of unfair labor practices, hearings, cease and desist orders, affirmative orders to reinstate, problem of discharge "for cause", provisions for use of injunctions.

The impact of state laws and local ordinances on organizing was also discussed with particular emphasis on the South.

2. Impact of TH on local union administration:

- Problems relating to Board (National Labor Relations Board, NLRB) action in unfair labor practices cases and representation proceedings, court actions as result of NLRB actions, the individual bargaining proviso, filing requirements, suits by employers or unions for damages in federal courts, restrictions on check-off, limitations on health and welfare programs, limitations on political contributions in federal elections.

The effects of State laws, including the Peace Act, the Catlin Act and Health and Welfare Registration, were also discussed.

3. Impact of TH on collective bargaining:

- Section 8d: definition of collective bargaining, notice requirements for termination or modification, subjects of bargaining, the continuing duty to bargain, effect on individuals who strike during 60 day "cooling off" period.
- Section 14B: "State's Rights" section dealing with limitations on union security: the "Right to Work".

We also discussed the impact of TH on certain types of strikes and the effects of certain state laws and local ordinances.

Among other laws discussed in relation to their application to the local union and its members were:

1. Social Security - as it affects pensions, protecting the wage scale and maintaining purchasing power among the retired, dependent and disabled.

2. Fair Labor Standards Act (Wage and Hour Law) - as it affects purchasing power in low wage areas and occupations, as a foundation on which collective bargaining can build.

3. Walsh-Healy Act (Public Contracts) - as it affects the establishment of labor standards on government contracts.

4. Unemployment compensation - as it affects SUB bargaining, purchasing power of laid off workers, maintaining the wage scale in face of unemployment, maintaining a skilled work force in the community.

5. Workmen's Compensation - and its affects on purchasing power, protection of the wage scale.

6. Wisconsin Peace Act - as it affects union security agreements, enforcement of duty to arbitrate, strikes.

7. "Right to Work" laws - as they affect union security bargaining, labor-management relations generally, collective bargaining, union administration.

8. Other types of legislation: tariffs (as they affect sales), river valley authorities (as they affect industrial development and purchasing power), highways (as they affect purchase of equipment, employment of workers), taxation (as it affects purchasing power), farm price supports (as they affect the farmer as the purchaser of factory made products).

In conclusion, it was suggested that labor and other laws have a great impact on the local union and its members and that interest and participation in the legislative process are not only important to the union: they are essential.

Background of the case: ... As a result of a short strike in 1804, the Society of Cordwainers (shoemakers) of Philadelphia gained a piecework rate of $2.75 per pair of boots. But after Christmas of that same year the masters reduced the price to $2.50. The Society took a vote and the majority voted for a turnout (strike). The strike was lost. During it George Pullis and seven other journeymen were arrested. They were charged with the crime of conspiring to raise wages and prevent non-members from working at the shoemaker trade.

The prosecution stated:

1. The object of the Society of Cordwainers was to procure high prices for their work and to compel the employers to accede to their terms. The Society sought to accomplish this objective by punishing those who opposed them, workers or employers. This was a crime against those whom they injured and against the welfare of the state.
2. A combination of workmen to raise their wages was a crime under English common law, and therefore also was a crime under the common law of Pennsylvania which was based on English common law.
3. A combination of workmen interfered with the natural laws of supply and demand and would disturb the growth of manufacturing.

On behalf of the eight men on trial, the defense stated:

1. Workers in the state of Pennsylvania were free to associate themselves for the betterment of their conditions. This was an exercise of the freedom guaranteed to Americans.
2. English common law does not apply to the U.S.
3. It was not a crime for a man to refuse to work with another man.
4. The price of labor would be bargained between masters and employees.

What do you think was the verdict of the jury and on what grounds do you think it relied? (Use reverse side of paper for notes)

Commonwealth (Massachusetts) versus Hunt

Background of the case:

Jeremiah Horne, a member of the Boston Journeymen Bootmakers' Society broke one of the Society's rules and was required to pay a fine. When Horne refused, the Society demanded his discharge and in accordance with the prevailing practice, Waite, his employer, discharged him.

Samuel Parker, the district attorney of Boston, secured an indictment against Hunt and six other leaders of the Bootmakers' Society charging them with criminal conspiracy.

The district attorney contended:

1. The common law of England concerning conspiracy applied to this case.

2. Under the English laws a combination of workmen to raise their wages was an unlawful conspiracy. He cited previous cases which supported the conspiracy doctrine.

3. Workers' organizations which compelled members to pay dues and compelled employers to employ or not to employ particular workers, were tyrannical, illegal and were conspiracies that should be suppressed.

4. The Boston Society was a criminal conspiracy to oppress and impoverish both employers and nonconformist workers.

Rantoul, the attorney for the defendants argued the case on the following grounds:

1. The state did not adopt all of England's common or statutory laws.

2. The English laws were based on property rights which sacrificed the right of laboreres to the ruling classes.

3. While a combination may become a criminal conspiracy if it is for the purpose of doing an unlawful or criminal act, the purpose of these defendants was not to be either unlawful or criminal, and therefore their combination could not be a criminal conspiracy.

The jury brought back a decision of guilty. The case was appealed and was heard before Justice Shaw of the Massachusetts Appellate Court.

Do you think Justice Shaw upheld the lower court's decision and on what grounds did he base his decision?

United States versus Debs

Background of the case:

The town of Pullman, outside of Chicago, Illinois, was a so-called "model company town." In 1893, a panic and depression hit the country and adversely affected the Pullman company. The company promptly cut wages of the workers by more than 30% but did not cut the shareholders dividends nor did it lower the rent of the workers' homes which it owned.

When a grievance committee was sent to present the workers' requests, they found Mr. Pullman noncommittal. However, the following day three members of the grievance committee were fired. The workers decided to strike.

After a few weeks the Pullman strikers appealed for a sympathy strike to Eugene Debs and the American Railway Union. Debs announced a boycott on Pullman Palace cars. The Pullman Company was able to arrange that cars carrying the U.S. mails be attached to the Pullman cars, so that when a switchman cut out a Pullman car, the car carrying the mail was also automatically cut.

The General Managers' Association, made up of railroad executives, knew that J.P. Altgeld, then governor of Illinois, would not use the state militia to crush the strike. They enlisted the aid of Richard Olney, Attorney General of the United States, who issued an injunction. Olney was able to get President Cleveland to send in federal troops.

Debs and three other leaders were arrested on the charge of contempt of court for violating the injunction. The case came before the Supreme Court.

The Attorney General based his case on the grounds that:

1. The union was a criminal conspiracy to obstruct the U.S. mail.
2. The union was a monopoly which by its strike interrupted interstate commerce and violated the Sherman Anti-trust Act.

The arguments presented by the defense were:

1. The activities of the American Railroad Union could not be considered an unlawful conspiracy because they were directed merely toward bringing about an adjustment of differences between the Pullman Company and its employees.
2. If the workers' refusal to work to the railroad company did interfere with interstate commerce, it was still not a crime.
3. The government's injunction should have been dismissed because the complaint was aimed at preventing interference, not with government property, but with private property.
4. If the defendants were guilty of a crime, the interference with U.S. mails, they should have been tried in a criminal court.
5. The Sherman Act did not apply in this instance.

What decision do you think the Supreme Court rendered and why?

Background of the case: The Loewe hat factory in Danbury, Connecticut was unorganized and the leaders of the United Hatters of North America decided to organize it. Loewe refused to have a union in his shop and a year passed before the union again requested him to negotiate a contract. This time the union leaders called a strike. A group of anti-union manufacturers financially supported Loewe in his fight against the union. The strike was lost and after several months Loewe reopened the plant with non-union labor.

At the request of the United Hatters, the AFL placed the Loewe firm on its "we don't patronize" list. The company filed actions against the union for violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, claiming damages of $240,000 and attached the homes and bank accounts of 248 individual members of the union.

The case was argued before the U.S. Supreme Court. The counsel for the plantiff claimed:

1. The Sherman Anti-Trust Act applied to unions.

2. The United Hatters of America, dominated by the AFL, violated the Sherman Antitrust Act.

3. It was a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce.

4. And if plaintiff's charge was upheld, that individual hatters and the union both would be liable for triple damages under the Sherman Act of about $250,000.

The attorney for the defendants contended:

1. Since the defendants admittedly were not in interstate commerce, had not aimed to restrain it and had used no means which directly did so, the Sherman Act was not applicable.

2. The Sherman Anti-Trust Act did not apply because there had been no lessening of the general flow of interstate just a diversion from one manufacturer to another.

3. If such indirect influence as interference with production came under the Sherman Act, then all strikes would be contrary to law, since every strike might necessarily diminish the amount of production in interstate commerce.

4. The activities of the defendants were lawful since the sole purpose of their activities was merely the improvement of working conditions by means of organization.

5. And even if the Union's contentions were not upheld, that membership in the union did not make them liable as members of a conspiracy.

What decisions do you think the Supreme Court rendered and why?

Truax versus Corrigan

Background of the case:

The Arizona legislature recognized the workers' right to combine to protect and raise their living standards. It passed a law prohibiting the courts from issuing injunctions in labor disputes "concerning terms and conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable damage to property or to property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law ...".

Against this setting, a case arose involving the use of injunctions, property and picketing rights.

Truax owned a restaurant which employed 10 people. He told his employees that he intended to cut their wages, whereupon the workers, members of the Cooks and Waiters Union of Bisbee, Arizona called a strike. There was no violence and the picketing was peaceful. Truax's business dropped. The state courts upheld the union's right to strike and picket on the grounds that the Arizona law granted the right to organize and mainain working conditions by peaceful means.

Subsequently Truax went to court again and raised the new issue that a state law restricting the use of injunctions in labor disputes was unconstitutional and violated the 14th amendment of the United States Constitution which provides for "due process."

Truax's counsel argued:

1. The Arizona law forbidding injunctions in labor disputes was unconstitutional.
2. The law was "class legislation." It denied the plaintiffs equal protection of the law since the interpretation of the statute by the Arizona courts discriminated against the plaintiffs and their property as a class.
3. The mere fact of picketing was in itself coercive.
4. The union's acts constituted an unlawful secondary boycott.

The counsel for the defendants contended:

1. The sole issue in this case was whether peaceful picketing permitted under the Arizona law was unlawful and deprived Truax of property right.
2. Picketing by the union was a means of communicating information to the public concerning the labor dispute.
3. The Arizona statute was not class legislation because it applied to a whole class of persons - employees, employers, and persons seeking employment and deprived no one of the equal protection of the laws.
4. The Arizona law was not unconstitutional since it resembled the Clayton Act which forbade federal courts to issue injunctions in labor disputes and which was not regarded by the court as depriving anyone of a property right.

What decision do you think the Supreme Court of the United States rendered and on what grounds did it rely? Was picketing declared unconstitutional and why?

National Labor Relations Board Versus Jones Laughlin Steel Corporation
1936 - 1937

Background of the case:

The Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation had a company dominated union. However, the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers chartered the Beaver Valley Lodge No. 200 of Pennsylvania for the purpose of organizing the plant.

The company union and the corporation resisted the unionization effort of Lodge 200. After hostile acts on the part of the company, the union filed charges with the National Labor Relations Act in its unfair labor practices in which the company had discharged thirteen employees for union activity, refused to reinstate them in their jobs, and discriminated against a union member by demoting him.

The board ordered Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation to cease and desist from interfering with self organization of its employees and from discouraging union membership by discrimination.

The company refused to comply with the cease and disist order on several grounds including the contention that the Wagner Act was unconstitutional and also that Jones & Laughlin were not engaged in inter-state commerce. The board then petitioned the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals for the enforcement of the order. The Circuit Court stated that the board had no jurisdiction in this case.

The board then petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court. The heart of the case argued before the Supreme Court was the question as to whether Congress had power to enact the National Labor Relations Act regulating industrial relations between employer and employee.

The government's position was:

1. This act, which might appear to be a law for the regulation of industrial relations, was in reality a law designed for the protection of interstate commerce, and therefore, within the constitutional powers of Congress.

The attorneys for the company contended:

1. The law was beyond the power of Congress and that it was in violation of various provisions of the Constitution guaranteeing "due process," "freedom of contract," and the "right to a jury trial."

The attorneys for the company contended:

1. The law was beyond the power of Congress and that it was in violation of various provisions of the Constitution guaranteeing "due process," "freedom of contract," and the "right to a jury trial."

2. They charged that in enacting this law Congress used its jurisdiction over interstate commerce as a pretext for legislation which in reality was nothing more than regulation of labor relations, which was exclusively within the state, and not federal power.

What decision did the Supreme Court render and on what grounds did it base its decision? _____

Background of the case: The International Association of Machinists and the Carpenters' Union, both having contracts with the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Company, disagreed as to who would do the work on an expansion of company facilities. The company assigned the work to the members of the machinists. Seventy-eight carpenters employed by Anheuser Busch left their jobs and picketed the plant. Other carpenters held sympathy strikes in other firms. In addition to the union published in its official publication, The Carpenter, an appeal to laboring men and the friends of organized labor not to patronize Anheuser-Busch beer.

Thurman Arnold, assistant attorney general of the United States, secured an indictment against William L. Hutcheson, president, and three other officers of the Carpenters' union. They were charged with criminal conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce. The Federal District Court found the defendants not guilty and the case was dismissed.

Arnold brought the case before the Supreme Court.

The government contended:

1. This was not a local dispute between employer and employee but a jurisdictional struggle between national unions, resulting in various strikes in many different places, imposing a direct and unreasonable burden upon interstate trade.

2. The defendants interferred with competition in every direction therefore coming within the prohibitions of the Sherman Act.

3. The action of the defendants could not be justified under the rule of reason since jurisdictional strikes directed against an employer were essentially unreasonable because the employer was powerless and had no control or means of settling such issues.

4. The Norris-LaGuardia Act was not applicable to this indictment since that act merely limited the equity powers of the federal courts in the issuance of injunctions but it did not change the rules of civil or criminal law.

The attorneys for the defendants argued:

1. The Norris-LaGuardia Act did not differentiate between strikes conducted for jurisdictional reasons and other strikes.

2. A jurisdictional labor dispute could not be termed a "crime" under the Sherman Act.

3. The Norris-LaGuardia Act was a declaration of policy concerning the right of labor to strike, which right must be held to be a normal and legitimate act of labor unions.

What decision did the Supreme Court render and why?

1939 - 1940

Background of the Case: The workers of the Brown Wood Preserving Company, Inc. of Alabama organized themselves into a union and went on strike. The union maintained a 24-hour a day picket line at the plant's entrance. The company decided to reopen its plant. Byron Thornhill, a member of the picket line, approached a nonunion worker and asked him not to return to work. Thornhill was arrested and charged with violation of the anti-picketing law of Alabama. The case moved through the state courts which found Thornhill guilty.

At this point the AFL took up the fight and the case was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The union attorney contended:

1. The Alabama code was unconstitutional because it violated the rights of the individual to free speech guaranteed by the Constitution of the U.S.

The attorneys for the State of Alabama argued:

1. Freedom of speech and assembly were not absolute rights and that the state, as a matter of public policy, had the power to place restrictions.
2. The pickets were stationed to injure the company, not to advance their own interest.
3. Thronhill was a member of a large picket line which was not peaceful.
4. The statute was not unconstitutional because it did not bar him from striking or presenting his case, but from committing acts inherently wrong.

What decision did the Supreme Court render and why?

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE USE OF THIS FORM

WHO MUST FILE.—Every labor organization that wishes to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board must file this Form NLRB–1085, Distribution of Financial Report Certificate, to certify that it has furnished to all its members copies of the financial report accepted by the Secretary of Labor in satisfaction of Sec. 9 (f) and (g) of the act.

WHERE TO FILE.—NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this Form NLRB–1085 with the Affidavit Compliance Branch, National Labor Relations Board, Washington 25, D. C.

LOCAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this Form NLRB–1085 with the Regional Office of the National Labor Relations Board with which they usually file cases.

WHEN TO FILE.—This Form NLRB–1085 must be refiled each time your organization's financial report has been accepted by the Secretary of Labor. Do not file this Form until after your financial report has been accepted by the Secretary of Labor and you have furnished copies of that accepted report to your members. If you have received an extension of 90 days within which to file and distribute your financial report, remember that this Form NLRB–1085 must be filed together with the Department of Labor post card. A newly formed union which has not completed its first fiscal year must file this Form and the Department of Labor post card showing when its first fiscal year will end.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS FORM.

a. ITEM 1. Fill in the complete date of the end of the fiscal year which the report covered. If you are a new union, fill in the complete date on which your first fiscal year will end.

b. ITEM 2. Copies furnished members must be copies of the report finally accepted by the Secretary of Labor.

1. National or international labor organizations may use ways "A," "B," "C," or "E," or any combination of them, but must not use way "D." If way "B" is used, the instructions sent with the copies to the local union must cover "(a)," "(b)," and "(c)." No less than all three are acceptable.
2. Local unions may use any of the five ways or a combination of them.
3. If you check "E," you must remember, in describing the way you used, that—
   - (a) The method described must be very much like "A," "B," "C," or "D," or a combination of them.
   - (b) Neither posting the report nor reading it at a union meeting is alone enough.
   - (c) You must arrange to give copies of the report to all members or to make copies available to all members.
   - (d) If you distribute the report in a way like "B" or "D," you may use any effective method, such as giving a copy to each member personally, or placing enough copies on a table in the meeting hall and inviting members to take one if they want it.
   - (e) If you make the report available at a regular meeting of the union, you need not search out members not at the meeting to deliver copies of the report to them.
   - (f) If you hand out the report at the plant gate, shop, bunkhouse, etc., you must also announce at a regular meeting of the union that copies are there for all members, and you must post a copy at the meeting hall, in order to take care of members who were absent from work or otherwise missed outside the meeting hall.

c. CERTIFICATION:

1. Give the full name of your labor organization, including the local number, if any.
2. Fill in the business address of your organization, including number, street, city, and State.
3. Give the full name of the national or international union with which you are affiliated. If none, check the box.
4. Enter the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which you directly, or your national or international, are affiliated. If none, check the box.

e. Whenever there is a change in affiliation or name.

If your officers are not installed immediately upon election, you should advise the appropriate office of the National Labor Relations Board, as indicated under WHERE TO FILE, when they will be installed. Under such circumstances the old officers will be considered as holding over until the new officers are installed, provided that no affidavit of the old officers will expire prior to the installation date.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS FORM.—Completely fill out the reverse side of this form as follows:

a. TITLE OF OFFICE:

Write in this column the exact title of each office listed in your constitution and bylaws whether the office is vacant or not.

b. NAME OF OFFICER:

In this column show the name of the person occupying each of the offices listed in the first column. If any office is not filled, write the word "VACANT." If one person holds two or more of the offices, show his or her name opposite each office.

c. EXPIRATION DATE OF PRESENT TERM:

Write in this column the date the officer's term of office will expire. Be sure to give the month, day, and year.

d. CERTIFICATION:

1. Give the full name of your labor organization, including the local number if any.
2. Fill in the business address of your organization, including number, street, city, and State.
3. Give the full name of the national or international union with which you are affiliated. If none, check the box.
4. Enter the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which you directly, or your national or international, are affiliated. If none, check the box.

International Ladies Garment Workers Union ..... If none, check ☐
(Full name of national or international union of which this filing Union is an affiliate or constituent unit)

AFL-CIO ..... If none, check ☐
(Name of national federation of which this filing Union, or its national or international, is an affiliate or constituent unit)

5. DATE AND SIGNATURE:

One of your officers must sign this certificate. Fill in date of signature and his title of office.

NOTE.—If you are submitting this form for the first time, you must also submit an "Affidavit of Noncommunist Union Officer" for each officer listed on the reverse side of this form. The "Affidavit of Noncommunist Union Officer" is known as Form NLRB–1081. If you are refiling this form it is not necessary that a new "Affidavit of Noncommunist Union Officer" be submitted for reelected officers if earlier affidavits on file with the National Labor Relations Board are less than one year old.

WARNING.—The attention of persons filing this form with the Board is directed to U. S. Code, Title 18, Sec. 1001 (formerly Sec. 80), which provides that any person willfully making or causing to be made any false or fraudulent statements or representations in any matter within the jurisdiction of the Board shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE USE OF THIS FORM

WHO MUST FILE.—This affidavit must be filed by each officer of a labor organization that wishes to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board. An affidavit must be on file for each officer listed in your constitution and bylaws. Where an officer holds more than one office, a separate affidavit for each office must be filed by him.

WHERE TO FILE.—NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this affidavit with the Affidavit Compliance Branch, National Labor Relations Board, Washington 25, D. C.

LOCAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this affidavit with the Regional Office of the National Labor Relations Board with which they usually file cases.

WHEN TO FILE.—This affidavit is good for only one year from the time it is signed and must be renewed each year. Each time a new officer assumes office, whether elected or appointed, he must file this affidavit. If an officer is reelected or reappointed, it is not necessary to file a new affidavit unless or until the affidavit on file with the National Labor Relations Board is one year old.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS AFFIDAVIT:

a. Read carefully items 1, 2, and 3 of this affidavit.

b. Fill in the full name of your labor organization, including the local number if any.

c. Give the full name of the national or international union with which your organization is affiliated. If none, check the box.

d. Enter the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which your organization directly, or its national or international, is affiliated. If none, check the box.

CERTIFICATE OF INTENT

I, an officer of the Union named below, certify that within 90 days after the fiscal year ending .....,
(Month) (Day) (Year)
this Union intends to:

1. Refile the required financial report for such fiscal year with the Department of Labor;

2. Furnish copies of the report to its members;

3. Furnish the National Labor Relations Board with a copy of the notice received from the Department of Labor signifying that this Union has refiled the required financial report;

4. File Form NLRB–1085 (Distribution of Financial Report Certificate) with the National Labor Relations Board.

It is therefore requested that the National Labor Relations Board continue to process, during this 90-day period, cases in which this Union is an interested party. It is understood that any action taken in behalf of this Union during this 90-day period is subject to withdrawal, and all matters being processed by the Board in behalf of this Union may be subject to immediate dismissal, if compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) has not been renewed by the end of the 90-day period.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE USE OF THIS FORM

GENERAL.—This form, if filed within 30 days prior to the end of your fiscal year, may be used to notify the proper office of the National Labor Relations Board of your intent to remain in compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. It will not, however, extend the filing requirements under Section 9 (h), (affidavit of noncommunist union officer).

WHO MUST FILE.—Every labor organization that wishes to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board during that period (not to exceed 90 days) between the end of the organization's fiscal year and the time it is able to file the required financial report with the Department of Labor and distribute the report to its membership, must file this form, or other written request containing the same information, signed by one of its officers.

WHERE TO FILE.—NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this form with the Affidavit Compliance Branch, National Labor Relations Board, Washington 25, D. C.

LOCAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this form with the Regional Office of the National Labor Relations Board with which they usually file cases.

WHEN TO FILE.—To receive the 90-day extension, this form or other written request must be filed with the appropriate office of the National Labor Relations Board before your fiscal year ends. Do not file it more than 30 days before that date. All matters being processed by the Board in your behalf may be subject to immediate dismissal if this form or other written request is not filed on time.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS FORM.—

a. Read carefully the entire statement contained on the face of this form.

b. Fill in the month, day and year on which your fiscal year will end.

c. Completely fill in the remainder of the form as follows:

1. Give the full name of your organization, including local number if any.

2. Fill in the business address of your organization, including number, street, city, and State.

3. Give the full name of the national or international union with which your organization is affiliated. If none, check the box.

4. Fill in the name of the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which you directly, or your national or international, are affiliated. If none, check the box.

OUTLINE OF LEADING NLRB RULINGS ON CONTRACT BAR DOCTRINE

A. NATURE OF AGREEMENT

1. Oral agreement is not a bar.
2. Members only agreement is not a bar. (Moreover, a members only contract which detracts from the Board certification not only is not a bar, but it will also result in revocation of the certification as well.)
3. Recognition agreement is not a bar. (For a contract to be a bar it must contain substantial terms and conditions of employment which are deemed sufficient to stabilize the bargaining relationship. It will not be a bar if it is limited to wages only.)
4. Contract which covers an inappropriate unit under Board policy or substantially departs from Board certification is not a bar. (Exceptions: inclusion of supervisors or guards in contract unit of production and maintenance workers does not remove contract as a bar.)
5. Where the contract commits the union, during term of contract, to refrain from organizing or representing employees not covered in the agreement, that contract bars a further petition by such union during its term.

B. DURATION OF AGREEMENT

1. A valid contract having a fixed term of duration constitutes a bar for as much of its term as does not exceed two years.
2. Contract with no fixed term is not a bar for any period.
3. Contract which is terminable at will is not a bar for any period.

C. TIMELINESS OF RIVAL PETITION

1. Rival petition is timely 150 to 60 days before the end of the contract term. (Extension of contract which is executed prior to the last 60 days of this period will be considered a premature extension which is not a bar. Extensions executed during or after this 60-day period will not be so considered.)

2. Petition filed during the 60-day insulated period will be dismissed as untimely regardless of conduct of contracting parties during this period.

3. Where the contract is one of "unreasonable duration" (more than two years), the insulated period will be the last 60 days of the reasonable period.

4. Contract executed on same day as filing of petition is a bar if it is effective immediately or retroactively and the employer has not been informed at time of execution that petition has been filed. (Contract is not a bar if the petition is filed prior to execution of the contract, regardless of employer knowledge. Cut off time is midnight, notwithstanding continuous bargaining.)

D. UNION SECURITY PROVISIONS

1. Contract is not a bar if its union security clause (note model on accompanying sheet) on its face fails to conform to the requirements of the Act or has been found unlawful in an unfair labor practice proceeding.

2. Contract is not a bar if the union security clause:

   (a) does not expressly grant old, non-union employees 30 days' grace;

   (b) is accompanied by a provision deferring the effectiveness of invalid clauses or attempting to rescind or amend them; or

   (c) may be interpreted as either lawful or unlawful because of ambiguity or generality of language used.

3. Contract containing union security provisions is not a bar if, within the year before the execution of the contract, a majority of the employees in the unit have voted to rescind the authority of the union to make such agreement.

4. Contract containing union security provisions is not a bar if the contracting union or its affiliated parent is not in compliance with the filing requirements of the Act. For the purpose of this rule, a union is deemed to be in compliance with the filing requirements if it meets any of the following requirements:

   (a) It was in compliance at the time of the execution or renewal of the contract; or

   (b) It received a notice of compliance within the 12-month period preceding the execution or renewal of the contract; or

   (c) It received a notice of compliance before the filing of the petition if initial steps to achieve such compliance were taken before the execution or renewal of the contract; or

(d) It achieved compliance after the filing of the petition if initial steps to achieve compliance were taken before the execution of the contract was achieved within a reasonable period of time.

(Evidence will not be received in representation proceedings for the purpose of determining the validity of union security clauses for contract bar purposes.)

E. SIGNATURE AND RATIFICATION OF AGREEMENT

1. Contract, to be a bar, must be signed by all parties before petition is filed. This is so even if the parties conclude negotiations and put into effect some or all of the provisions.

2. Only where the contract itself makes ratification a condition of its effectiveness shall the contract be no bar until ratified.

F. SCHISM IN CONTRACTING UNION

1. Contract is not a bar where the Board finds the existence of a schism warranting an election. The Board will find such schism if the following conditions are met:

(a) Local disaffiliation action must have occurred "in the context of a basic intra-union conflict * * * over policy at the highest level of an international union * * * or within a federation, which results in a disruption of existing intra-union relationships." (Local action unrelated to such a conflict is insufficient.)

(b) Disaffiliation action will be recognized where taken "at an open meeting called, without regard to any constitutional restrictions but with due

notice to the member in the unit, for the purpose of taking disaffiliation action for reasons relating to the basic intra-union conflict."

(c) Disaffiliation action must be taken "within a reasonable period" following occurrence of the conflict, and such conflict must result "in confusion unstabilizing the bargaining relationship;" that is, the employer must be "confronted with two organizations each claiming with some show of right to be the organization previously chosen by the employees * * * ."

G. UNIT EXPANSION (Numbers, classifications)

1. Contract is no bar if executed before any employees have been hired.

2. Contract, which is executed prior to substantial increase in personnel, is a bar if:

(a) 30% of the employees on the payroll at the time of the hearing were employed when the contract was executed; and

(b) 50% of the job classifications in existence at the time of the hearing were in existence when the contract was executed.

H. CHANGE IN OWNERSHIP OF BUSINESS

1. Assumption of the operations by a purchaser who in good faith has not bound himself to assume the contract of the prior owner of the establishment removes the contract as a bar.

2. Where the new owner executes a new agreement with the incumbent union, the only change being in the termination date of the agreement, all other terms remaining the same, the Board does not view this as a premature extension.

NLRB'S "MODEL" UNION SECURITY CLAUSE

For the guidance of negotiators, the NLRB has drafted a "model" union security clause providing the maximum security permitted by the Act. The text of the clause follows:

> It shall be a condition of employment that all employees of the employer covered by this agreement who are members of the union in good standing on the effective date of this agreement shall remain members in good standing and those who are not members on the effective date of this agreement shall, on the thirtieth day or such longer period as the parties may specify following the effective date of this agreement, become and remain members in good standing in the union. It shall also be a condition of employment that all employees covered by this agreement and hired on or after its effective date shall, on the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment or such longer period as the parties may specify become and remain members in good standing in the union.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

BEFORE THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

COMPLIANCE STATUS OF INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILERMAKERS, IRON SHIP BUILDERS, BLACKSMITHS, FORGERS, AND HELPERS, AFL-CIO, and LOCAL 609, INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILERMAKERS, IRON SHIP BUILDERS, BLACKSMITHS, FORGERS, AND HELPERS, AFL-CIO

ADMINISTRATIVE DETERMINATION OF COMPLIANCE STATUS

On April 14, 1958, Plant City Welding and Tank Company, an Employer in interest in certain proceedings pending before the Board, filed a petition with the Board for an administrative determination of the compliance status of International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, hereinafter referred to as the International, and Local 609, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, hereinafter referred to as the Local. An administrative investigation was thereafter conducted on behalf of the Board. Since the facts are not in substantial dispute, it would serve no useful purpose to order a hearing in this matter. The Board has considered the entire administrative record herein and hereby makes the following determination:

The International's compliance status

The Employer alleges that the International has failed to meet the requirements of Section 9 (f), (g), and (h) of the Act in five respects.

(1) The Company maintains that in violation of Section 9 (f) (B) (2) the International furnished financial statements to its members for the fiscal years 1947 through 1957 which did not contain all the information required by the Act and which were not copies of the statements filed with the Secretary of Labor.

The International admits that the published financial statements were not the complete reports filed with the Secretary of Labor but contends that this allegation should be rejected because (a) each of the Journals in which the annual "Summary of Funds" was published also contains a letter from the International President and International Secretary-Treasurer which states: "All members are hereby notified that every Financial Secretary is in possession of a detailed financial report prepared and certified to by Certified Public Accountants. Any member desiring to examine these reports is at liberty to do so by requesting the Financial Secretary of your Local Union to provide a copy of same"; (b) the fund headings, according to the International, adequately show in themselves the sources of income and purposes of disbursements, and there is no statement of assets and liabilities, as such, because all assets shown consist of cash and investments, it has no liabilities except transitory insurance premiums payable and a few benefit claims receivable; and (c) in addition to the detailed financial report it has furnished to the Secretary of Labor each year a printed copy of the Journal showing the "Summary of Funds" distributed.

Under these circumstances, and particularly the fact that the exhibits accompanying the Employer's Motion clearly establish that the above letter did appear with each summary, we are satisfied that the International made available to its membership the financial data required by Section 9 (f) (B).[1/]

(2) The Company also contends that the International has failed to meet the requirements of the Act in that the copies of the financial statements were furnished to fewer than its total membership.

We are satisfied that the International has taken reasonable steps to reach as many members as possible, and therefore conclude that it has met the statutory requirement in this regard.[2/] We do not believe that a union can be expected to search out each and every member in order to deliver a copy of its financial report before it may qualify under Section 9 (f) and (g). To impose so strict a requirement would undoubtedly have the effect of nullifying the rights of unions to file petitions and charges under the Act and would prevent employees from having the opportunity to select a union to represent them, inasmuch as it is doubtful whether this standard could ever be met. We do not believe that Congress intended such a result.

(3) The Employer also takes the position that there was a lapse in the International's compliance in that its financial statement for the fiscal year 1957 was distributed several days after the expiration of the 90-day grace period granted when it filed a certificate of intent, and therefore, under the

2/ Ibid.

Board's decision in Monsanto Chemical Company, 115 NLRB 702, all pending proceedings should have been dismissed, and that,

(4) the International's forms NLRB-1085 for the fiscal years 1953 through 1957 were executed and filed at times when the financial statement had not yet been distributed; therefore, they contained false statements and the Board should find, on the authority of Compliance Status of Plaster Tenders, Construction, General and Shipyard Laborers' Local Union #802, International Hod Carriers, Building and Common Laborers' Union of America, AFL, 111 NLRB 742, that the International is not in compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g).[3/]

Near the end of each of the fiscal years in question, the International filed a certificate of intent to renew compliance under Section 9 (f) and (g) and was granted a 90-day extension of time in which to do so. Since the fiscal year ends on June 30, the 90-day grace period expired September 28 each year. Sometime in September of each of the years under consideration, the International filed its form NLRB-1085 certifying that it had published its financial statement in its Journal which was distributed to its members. However, the actual publication was in the October issue of the Journal, which was not distributed until October 1 or shortly thereafter. It thus appears that the facts alleged by the Employer are accurate. Nevertheless, we do not believe that the findings advocated by the Employer are warranted under the circumstances here present.

During the investigation the International advised the Regional Office that it had delivered the financial reports to the printer for printing and mailing prior to the execution and filing of the form NLRB-1085 and before the expiration of the 90-day period. Moreover, we note that the International's past history clearly manifests an intent to achieve full compliance.[4/]

3/ Allegations 3 and 4 are discussed together, since they relate to the same facts.

4/ This situation is, therefore, unlike that in either Monsanto Chemical or Plaster Tenders. In the former case, there was a delay of 3 weeks during which the financial statement was in the hands of the union, but distribution was delayed until its next regular meeting, whereas in the instant situation the distribution was within the control of the printer and the delay amounted to only a few days. In the Plaster Tenders case, the union stated in its form NLRB-1085 that it had posted copies of its financial report at its headquarters and had announced at a regular meeting that copies thereof were ready for distribution but in fact it had done neither of these things at any time, whereas here the statements in the form NLRB-1085 were substantially accurate.

Accordingly, we reject these contentions of the Employer.

(5) The Company maintains that a number of individuals, although not designated in the International's constitution as officers, are nevertheless officers who should be required to file Section 9 (h) non-communist affidavits.

The International's constitution provides as follows, in Article III, headed "International Officers":

> Section 1. The International officers shall consist of an International President, International Secretary-Treasurer, Editor and Manager of the official Journal, and sixteen (16) International Vice Presidents . . .

The Employer contends that, in addition, the incumbents of the positions of President Emeritus, Trustee, International Representative, District Representative, Business Manager, Member of the Executive Council, "Delegate to A. F. of L.", and Delegate to the Trade and Labor Congress of Canada are officers. However, it is clear that these positions are not designated as offices by the constitution. Therefore, none of the incumbents is an officer of the International within the Board's "constitutional" test, which the United States Supreme Court has approved as a "reasonable, if indeed not a compelling construction of the statute."[5/]

Moreover, even if we were to apply the interpretation of the constitutional test adopted by some U. S. Courts of Appeals [6/] (i. e., "identification" in the constitution by virtue of description of duties, manner of selection, etc., associated with a person holding office), we would be compelled to reach the same conclusion. Thus, the President Emeritus and Business Manager are clearly not within that interpretation, since they are not even mentioned in the constitution, and there is complete silence as to their powers and duties as well as to those of Trustees, International Representatives, District Representatives, and Delegates. In an analogous situation the U. S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has held[7/] that the incumbent of such a position is not an "officer". Furthermore, even if Executive Council

Members were held to be officers under this interpretation, such Members also hold other international offices[8/] and have filed affidavits as the incumbents of such positions, thus satisfying the requirements of Section 9 (h).

The Local's compliance status

The allegations relating to the Local's compliance approximately parallel those set forth above but are different as to detail.

(1) The Company contends that the Local has failed to comply with Section 9 (f) and (g) in that the financial reports distributed by it for the fiscal years 1955, 1956, and 1957 were not sufficiently comprehensive because they did not contain all the necessary information and were not copies of the reports filed with the Secretary of Labor; they were not posted as set forth in the forms NLRB-1085 filed with the Board; and they were distributed to fewer than its total membership.

The Local's fiscal year ends December 31. Each year the Local has certified to the Board that copies of its financial report were distributed by "/posting/ a copy in a conspicuous place at the headquarters and meeting hall of the Local Union and /announcing/ at a regular meeting that copies were ready for distribution to all members."

With respect to the Local's compliance at the close of its fiscal year 1955, the Local admitted during this investigation that because of the peculiar circumstances at that time copies of the report were, in fact, not distributed, although the details thereof were discussed at a meeting, the report was posted during the course of the meeting, and the members approved the report. It is apparent that the steps taken with respect to this 1955 financial statement were insufficient to meet the requirements of the Act. Section 9 (f) (B) (2) provides for distribution and leaves the Board no discretion to accept anything less. Accordingly, we must conclude that the Local's compliance at the end of fiscal 1955 was insufficient and its compliance had lapsed during the calendar year 1956.

8/ The constitution provides that the Executive Council is to be composed of the International President and the 16 International Vice Presidents.

This is not true, however, with respect to the Local's conduct at the end of its fiscal years 1956 and 1957. The Local, at those times, announced at a regular meeting that copies of its financial statement would be available to the membership at the next meeting, made such copies available at that meeting to all members who wished them, and posted a copy thereof during the course of the meeting but removed the posted copy at the end of the meeting because the meeting hall is used by 16 other unions and the Local has no headquarters of its own. Under these circumstances, we are satisfied that the Local's compliance for the fiscal years 1956 and 1957 was sufficient to meet the requirements of the Act.

(2) The Company maintains that the Local was also out of compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) in that it did not distribute its financial statement for the fiscal year 1957 until March 10, 1958, although this was within the 90-day grace period granted by the Board after the Local had filed a certificate of intent to renew its compliance, since the Board's action in granting such an extension "is contrary and in derogation to Section 9 (f) and (g), improper and beyond the authority of the NLRB" or "assuming, arguendo, that such action is within the authority of the NLRB, the NLRB has failed to properly promulgate, establish or authorize this policy, rule, or regulation."

We reject this position as without merit. We have previously held that the procedure for securing an extension of time to renew compliance is applicable in circumstances such as these,[9/] and have also had occasion more recently to reject this same contention by the instant Employer[10/] as well as by another employer.[11/]

(3) The Company further maintains that the positions of Chief Steward, Representative Steward, Sick Steward, and Member of Negotiating Committee, although not listed in the Union's constitution as officers, are nevertheless officers who should be required to file Section 9 (h) non-communist affidavits.

What we have said above with respect to the Employer's allegation concerning additional International officers is equally applicable to the instant contention. The Subordinate Lodge Constitution, in Article II, contains the following provision:

10/ Plant City Welding and Tank Company, 118 NLRB 280, 283 (note 9).
11/ Technicolor New York Corporation, 118 NLRB 588, 589 (note 1).

> Section 1. The officers of each Subordinate Lodge shall consist of a President, Vice President, Treasurer, Inspector, Inside Guard, Outside Guard, Recording Secretary, Financial Secretary, Corresponding Secretary, a Board of Trustees . . ., and a Business Manager where one is considered necessary . . .

This section of the constitution further provides that "stewards" are to be appointed, and "sick stewards" and "committeemen" may be elected or appointed as each lodge shall determine but are not to be considered officers. However, no duties are described for any of these positions. Accordingly, the incumbents clearly are not "officers" under the Board's "constitutional" test or under the interpretation thereof adopted by some of the U. S. Courts of Appeals. 12/

IT IS THEREFORE ADMINISTRATIVELY DETERMINED that International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, is in compliance with Section 9 (f), (g), and (h) of the Act, and that Local 609, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, was not in compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2) and (g) of the Act during the calendar year 1956 but has been in compliance thereafter, and

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that any letters of compliance issued to Local 609, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, during the calendar year 1956 be, and they hereby are, declared null and void and without effect.

JOHN H. FANNING, MEMBER, concurring in part and dissenting in part:

I concur in the majority's conclusion that Local 609 was not in compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2) of the Act during calendar year 1956 and that letters of compliance issued to that organization for that year are null and void.

I must dissent, however, from the majority's conclusion that the International itself was in compliance with the Statute.

Section 9 (f) (B) (2) requires that the processes of the Board shall be available only to those unions which furnish their members with "copies of the financial report" they are otherwise required to file with the Secretary of Labor. Similarly, the Board's Rules and Regulations provide that a complying labor organization must execute a declaration stating that it has furnished "to all its members copies of the financial report filed with the Department of Labor . . ." (Section 102.13). In its "Guide for Labor Organizations to the Filing Requirements of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947" the Board states on page 6: "Section 9 (f) (B) (2) of the Act requires that you furnish to all the members of your organization copies of the financial report filed with the Department of Labor . . ." And, in further implementation of the Act, the Rules and Regulations, and the Guide, Form NLRB - 1085, "Distribution of Financial Report Certificate", among other things, contains the statement that the Secretary of Labor has accepted the financial report of the union and that "The union has furnished copies of that report to all its members . . ." The instructions on the reverse side of the Form, in pertinent part, require that "Copies furnished members must be copies of the report finally accepted by the Secretary of Labor." It appears abundantly clear that the Act and the Board's Rules and Regulations and outstanding instructions to unions preclude the Board from finding compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2) on the basis of the distribution of any financial statement other than the full report filed with and approved by the Secretary of Labor. No requirement of the Statute is more simply or clearly stated.

The facts set forth in the majority's opinion reveal that the International did not furnish its members with "copies" of the financial report submitted to the Department of Labor. Rather, it is admitted that the International merely published a "summary" of that report in its annual Journal, informing its members that they could secure a copy by requesting the Financial Secretary of the Local Union to provide one. This procedure was not, in my opinion, compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2). A copy is a copy. It is not an approximation, an abbreviation, or a summary. In concluding that the International made available to its membership the financial data required by Section 9 (f) (B) the majority relies particularly upon the letter which was published with the summary. This letter informed the members that a detailed financial report was in the possession of the financial secretaries and that "Any member desiring to examine these reports is at liberty to do so by requesting the Financial Secretary of your Local Union to provide a copy of same . . ." In effect the majority, while admitting that the complete report was not furnished the members, is, at the same time, stating that this procedure was tantamount to furnishing the membership the complete statement. It seems to me that this is precisely the kind of "furnishing" the Statute attempts to prevent. To furnish is to give--not to give upon request. Union members quite eager to examine a copy of their Union's financial report might be understandably reluctant to demand that the Financial Secretary provide them with one. Accordingly, I conclude that the International failed to comply with the filing requirements of the Act.

In reaching this conclusion, I am, of course, aware of the fact that for some years the practice has been prevalent among some unions to provide their members with a "summary" rather than a "copy" of their financial reports. Despite the specific language of the Statute and the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Board appears to have acquiesced in this practice in Cigar Makers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, cited above. I was not a member of the Board at the time that decision issued. I believe it was wrongly decided. Nevertheless, I recognize that this International and other labor organizations may have been misled into believing that the Board's rules did not require furnishing actual copies of their financial reports to members. Except as indicated herein, the International has followed the requirements for compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) of the Act. There is no evidence that it has been guilty of either neglect or an attempt to evade the requirements of the Act. If there is any blame to be assessed, it is not with this labor organization, but elsewhere, possibly with the Board's administration of the pertinent requirements of the Act.

The Board has in certain instances exercised its discretion in the application of the requirements of the pertinent section of the Act by granting certain periods of grace. (See, for example, Marshall and Bruce Company, 75 NLRB 90; Simplicity Pattern Company, 102 NLRB 1283, and Monsanto Chemical Company (John F. Queeny Plant), 115 NLRB 702.) I do not believe the Board should unstablize labor relations with the resultant disturbances and the future unwarranted expenditure of public funds in reprocessing these cases through the Board's procedures, by forthwith revoking certifications in a situation such as that presented here. Nor do I believe that, considering the equities involved and the effectuation of the purposes of the Act as a whole, we would be justified in revoking the Boilermakers' certification without permitting that organization an opportunity to comply with the Act. Accordingly, I would allow the International and other labor organizations similarly situated a reasonable grace period to take steps to comply with the literal requirement of Section 9 (f) (B) (2).

AGREEMENT FOR CONSENT ELECTION

Pursuant to a Petition duly filed under Section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act as amended, and subject to the approval of the Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board (herein called the Regional Director), the undersigned parties hereby waive a hearing and AGREE AS FOLLOWS:

1. ELECTION.—An election by secret ballot shall be held under the supervision of the said Regional Director, among the employees of the undersigned Employer in the unit defined below, at the indicated time and place, to determine whether or not such employees desire to be represented for the purpose of collective bargaining by (one of) the undersigned labor organization(s). Said election shall be held in accordance with the National Labor Relations Act, the Board's Rules and Regulations, and the customary procedures and policies of the Board, provided that the determination of the Regional Director shall be final and binding upon any question, including questions as to the eligibility of voters, raised by any party hereto relating in any manner to the election, and provided further that rulings or determinations by the Regional Director in respect of any amendment of any certification resulting therefrom shall also be final.

2. ELIGIBLE VOTERS.—The eligible voters shall be those employees included within the Unit described below, who were employed during the payroll period indicated below, including employees who did not work during said payroll period because they were ill or on vacation or temporarily laid off, and employees in the military services of the United States who appear in person at the polls, but excluding any employees who have since quit or been discharged for cause and have not been rehired or reinstated prior to the date of the election and any employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement. At a date fixed by the Regional Director, the Employer will furnish to the Regional Director an accurate list of all the eligible voters, together with a list of the employees, if any, specifically excluded from eligibility.

3. NOTICES OF ELECTION.—The Regional Director shall prepare a Notice of Election and supply copies to the parties describing the manner and conduct of the election to be held and incorporating therein a sample ballot. The Employer, upon the request of and at a time designated by the Regional Director, will post such Notice of Election at conspicuous and usual posting places easily accessible to the eligible voters.

4. OBSERVERS.—Each party hereto will be allowed to station an equal number of authorized observers, selected from among the nonsupervisory employees of the Employer, at the polling places during the election to assist in its conduct, to challenge the eligibility of voters, and to verify the tally.

5. TALLY OF BALLOTS.—As soon after the election as feasible, the votes shall be counted and tabulated by the Regional Director, or his agent or agents. Upon the conclusion of the counting, the Regional Director shall furnish a Tally of Ballots to each of the parties. When appropriate, the Regional Director shall issue to the parties a certification of representatives or certificate of results of election, as may be indicated.

6. OBJECTIONS, CHALLENGES, REPORTS THEREON.—Objections to the conduct of the election or conduct affecting the results of the election, or to a determination of representatives based on the results thereof, may be filed with the Regional Director within five days after issuance of the Tally of Ballots. Copies of such objections must be served upon the other parties at the time of filing with the Regional Director. The Regional Director shall investigate the matters contained in the objections and issue a report thereon. If objections are sustained, the Regional Director may in his report include an order voiding the results of the election and, in that event, shall be empowered to conduct a new election under the terms and provisions of this agreement at a date, time, and place to be determined by him. If the challenges are determinative of the results of the election, the Regional Director shall investigate the challenges and issue a report thereon. The method of investigation of objections and challenges, including the question whether a hearing should be held in connection therewith, shall be determined by the Regional Director, whose decision shall be final and binding.

7. RUN-OFF PROCEDURE.—In the event more than one labor organization is signatory to this agreement, and in the event that no choice on the ballot in the election receives a majority of the valid ballots cast, the Regional Director shall proceed in accordance with the Board's Rules and Regulations.

9. WORDING ON THE BALLOT.—Where only one labor organization is signatory to this agreement, the name of the organization shall appear on the ballot and the choice shall be "Yes" or "No." In the event more than one labor organization is signatory to this agreement, the choices on the ballot will appear in the wording indicated below and in the order enumerated below, reading from left to right on the ballot:

STIPULATION FOR CERTIFICATION UPON CONSENT ELECTION
(R Cases)

The undersigned labor organization(s) (herein called the union(s)) claim(s) to represent employees of the undersigned employer (herein called the employer), and the undersigned parties desire that the question concerning the representation of said employees which exists by virtue of said claim shall be resolved by an election by secret ballot. Therefore, the said parties, subject to the approval of the Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board (herein called the Regional Director), HEREBY AGREE AND STIPULATE AS FOLLOWS:

1. SECRET BALLOT -- An election by secret ballot shall be conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director, among the employees in the Unit defined below, at the indicated time and place, to determine whether or not the employees desire to be represented by (one of) the Union(s). Said election shall be held in accordance with the National Labor Relations Act, the Board's Rules and Regulations, and the customary procedures and policies of the Board.

2. ELIGIBLE VOTERS -- The eligible voters shall be those employees included within the Unit described below, who were employed during the payroll period indicated below, including employees who did not work during said payroll period because they were ill or on vacation or temporarily laid off, and employees in the military services of the United States who appear in person at the polls, but excluding any employees who have since quit or been discharged for cause and have not been rehired or reinstated prior to the date of the election and any employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement. Upon the conclusion of the counting, the Regional Director shall furnish a Tally of Ballots to each of the parties.

5. POST-ELECTION AND RUN-OFF PROCEDURE -- All procedure subsequent to the conclusion of counting ballots shall be in conformity with the Board's Rules and Regulations.

6. RECORD -- The record in this case shall be governed by the appropriate provisions of the Board's Rules and Regulations and shall include this stipulation. Hearing and notice thereof, Direction of Election, and the making of Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law by the Board prior to the election are hereby expressly waived.

7. COMMERCE -- The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2 (6) of the National Labor Relations Act, and a question affecting commerce has arisen concerning the representation of employees within the meaning of Section 9(c).

(Insert commerce facts)

A MESSAGE — To officers of small unions covered by the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959.

Experience has proved that nearly all the 80,000 officers of small unions that are responsible for filing union financial reports want to comply with the law to the best of their ability.

To simplify the task of small unions the Secretary of Labor has prescribed the short Form LM–3, Labor Organization Annual Report. This form may be used by small unions with annual receipts of less than $30,000.

You can make your job and our job easier by reading the instructions carefully, completing the form accurately and filing your report as soon as possible after your fiscal year ends rather than putting it off for the 90 days permitted by law.

We will be glad to give you help if you visit or write the nearest LMWP office at the address shown on the back of Copy 6 of the report form.

OFFICE OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT AND WELFARE-PENSION REPORTS

INSTRUCTIONS FOR LABOR ORGANIZATION ANNUAL REPORT, LM-3

I. GENERAL — Each labor organization subject to the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 must file annually with the Secretary of Labor:
(a) A financial report, and
(b) Any change in the information contained on the Labor Organization Information Report, Form LM-1.

II. HOW TO USE THE SIMPLIFIED REPORTING FORM — The simplified form has been put together so that the union officer who does not have specialized training and experience can fill it out easily by following the instructions step by step.

a. Read carefully the statement in Section III below to make sure that you are authorized to use this form. If you are not authorized you must report on the Labor Organization Annual Report Form LM–2. If your union is eligible to file this form, continue with these instructions.
b. Keep these instruction sheets handy for reference, item by item, as you fill out the report.
c. Fill out the form with typewriter or a ballpoint pen. If you use a pen, write firmly enough so that all the copies will be clear.
d. When your report form is properly filled out follow the instructions on the back of copy No. 2.

III. WHO MAY FILE THE ANNUAL REPORT FORM LM-3 — A labor organization is authorized to file the simplified combined report on Form LM-3 (Revised) only if it meets the following conditions:

a. The total of all receipts of the labor organization, including its components, regardless of source and without any exclusions or deductions of any kind, was less than $30,000 in the 12-month period covered by the report.
b. The organization was not in trusteeship at the end of the fiscal year.

The Secretary, however, may revoke the authority for any labor organization to file the simplified annual report Form LM-3 (Revised), if he determines that the purposes of the Act would be served by such a revocation.

IV. WHEN TO FILE — This annual report must be submitted to the Office of Labor-Management and Welfare-Pension Reports, Washington, D. C. 20210, within ninety (90) days after the end of the fiscal year of the labor organization. If, however, the labor organization went out of existence during its fiscal year, a terminal report must be filed within thirty (30) days after the date of termination, giving the information listed under the heading "VII — Terminal Report" below.

V. RESPONSIBILITY OF UNION OFFICERS AND PENALTY — Sec. 209(d) of the Act makes each individual required to sign this report personally responsible for filing it and for any statement contained therein which he knows to be false. Sec. 206 of the Act requires that records providing in sufficient detail the necessary basic information and data from which the reports and other documents filed may be verified, explained or clarified, and checked for accuracy and completeness, must be maintained and kept available for examination for at least five years after filing the report. These records include vouchers, worksheets, receipts, and applicable resolutions. The law provides criminal penalties for willful failure to file a required report, for making any false statement or representation of a material fact knowing it to be false, for knowingly failing to disclose a material fact in this report and for willfully making any false entry or concealing, withholding, or destroying any books, records, reports or statements required to be kept.

Dear Mr. Via:

While you were in the office recently, I recall that we tried to locate an independent papermill workers' union from Niagra, Wisconsin, in our Register of Reporting Organizations, and were unable to find it. I came across it recently while checking another matter in the Register, and find that it is listed on Page 226 of the Register under "Confederated Unions, Ind."

The listing shows their BLMR number to be 052309.

Apparently the three unions listed under "Confederated Unions, Ind." on Page 226 of the Register have some type of affiliation. This information is transmitted for whatever purposes you may have in your study. The main reason, however, is to let you know we did not miss them in our listing in the Register.

Very truly yours,

AN ACT

To provide for registration, reporting, and disclosure of employee welfare and pension benefit plans.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act".

Findings and Policy

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that the growth in size, scope, and numbers of employee welfare and pension benefit plans in recent years has been rapid and substantial; that the continued well-being and security of millions of employees and their dependents are directly affected by these plans; that they are affected with a national public interest; that they have become an important factor affecting the stability of employment and the successful development of industrial relations; that they have become an important factor in commerce because of the interstate character of their activities, and of the activities of their participants, and the employers, employee organizations, and other entities by which they are established or maintained; that owing to the lack of employee information concerning their operation, it is desirable in the interests of employees and their beneficiaries, and to provide for the general welfare and the free flow of commerce, that disclosure be made with respect to the operation and administration of such plans.

(b) It is hereby declared to be the policy of this Act to protect interstate commerce and the interests of participants in employee welfare and pension benefit plans and their beneficiaries, by requiring the disclosure and reporting to participants and beneficiaries of financial and other information with respect thereto.

SEC. 3.[2] When used in this Act—

(1) The term "employee welfare benefit plan" means any plan, fund, or program which is communicated[3] or its benefits described in writing to the employees, and which was heretofore or is hereafter established by an employer or by an employee organization, or by both, for the purpose of providing for its participants or their beneficiaries, through the purchase of insurance or otherwise, medical, surgical, or hos-

Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports

A MESSAGE To officers of unions covered by the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959.

It is the continuing desire of the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports to improve the Labor Organization Annual Report forms and to clarify their accompanying instructions.

In line with this aim, we have adopted this new Labor Organization Annual Report Form LM-2 (Revised). It replaces the former LM-2 and LM-1A and must be used (1) by labor organizations whose total annual receipts were $30,000 or more, and (2) by labor organizations which file an annual report for any labor organization under trusteeship. "Total annual receipts" include receipts of any special funds and of any "subsidaries" of the labor organization as defined in the instructions accompanying the Form LM-2 (Revised).

You can make your task, and ours, easier by reading the instructions carefully; by completing the form accurately; and by filing your report as soon as possible after your fiscal year ends, rather than waiting for the 90 day period permitted by law.

We will be glad to give you help if you visit or write the nearest area office of the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports at the address shown on inside back cover.

Sincerely yours,

John F Holcombe

AFL-CIO VIEWS ON LABOR REFORM LEGISLATION

The views of the AFL-CIO on labor reform legislation were spelled out in detail by President George Meany during his appearance before the House Education and Labor Committee on June 3, 1959.

In order to facilitate understanding of the AFL-CIO position, a synopsis of President Meany's testimony appears below.

WHAT THE AFL-CIO SUPPORTS

The AFL-CIO has been on record in support of legislation to correct abuses in the labor and management fields for some time. In 1958, the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged the House of Representatives to pass the then-pending Kennedy-Ives bill. This year, the AFL-CIO supported, with a few amendments, the Kennedy-Ervin bill, S. 1555, as it was reported by the Senate Labor Committee.

The AFL-CIO, however, opposes that bill as it was passed by the Senate.

In summary, the AFL-CIO supports legislation involving the following provisions:

1. Public reporting and disclosure by unions of all aspects of union finances (Sec. 201).

2. Public reporting and disclosure by union officers and employees of their personal financial transactions with employers or labor relations consultants which may indicate a "conflict of interest" with their position as union officers or employees (Sec. 202).

3. Public reporting and disclosure by employers of all funds expended by them for labor relations purposes (Sec. 203).

4. Public reporting and disclosure by labor relations consultants of any activities intended to influence employees (Sec. 203(c)).

5. Criminal penalties for willful failure to file a report, for false filing, for making a false entry in books or records, and for embezzling or otherwise stealing union funds (Sec. 208, 209(a)).

6. Public reporting and disclosure of information relating to the imposition of trusteeships over subordinate unions, together with criminal penalties for failure to file and false filing (Sec. 301).

7. Provision for the Secretary of Labor to act on complaints regarding the purpose and continuance of trusteeships (Sec. 304).

8. Requirements for international union elections by secret ballot among the members or by delegates elected by secret ballot, not less often than once every five years; for local union elections by secret ballot not less often than once every three years; and for selection of intermediate labor organizations, such as joint councils and other intermediate body elections by secret ballot among the members or by representatives chosen by secret ballot, not less often than once every four years (Sec. 401).

9. Provision for opportunity to nominate candidates and for adequate notice of elections, and a prohibition against the use of union or employer funds to promote the candidacy of any individual in a union election (Sec. 401).

10. Provision for the Secretary of Labor to act to void elections not conducted according to the Act and to order a new election (Sec. 402).

11. Encouragement of unions and employers to adopt and adhere to codes of ethical practices (Sec. 501).

12. Taft-Hartley amendments to apply Federal law to the "no man's land" jurisdiction which the NLRB has not exercised, to permit pre-hire agreements in the building and construction industry, and to exclude service assistants in the communications industry from the definition of "supervisor" under the Act (Sections 701,702, 704).

13. A Taft-Hartley amendment to permit pre-hearing representation elections, without the 45-day delay written in on the Senate floor (Sec. 705).

14. Elimination of the ban denying economic strikers the right to vote in representation elections (Sec. 703).

Many, but not all, of these provisions appeared in S. 1555 as it was reported by the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. However, on the Senate floor some 35 amendments were added to that bill which seriously change its character from a reform bill to an anti-labor bill.

In the following paragraphs, the AFL-CIO objections, first to S. 1555, as it passed the Senate, and then to bills introduced by Representatives Barden and Kearns, are outlined.

Title I of S. 1555, as passed by the Senate, is attractively titled "Bill of Rights of Members of Labor Organizations." As such, Title I has an obvious slogan appeal.

Nonetheless this bill of rights is too vague for practical application and is outrageously punitive.

The AFL-CIO strongly supports the principle that union members should have equal rights with other union members in the conduct of union business; that they should be free to voice their views within the organization; that they should have an opportunity to participate in fixing dues and assessments; that they should have resort to the courts if they cannot achieve satisfaction for wrongs through the union's normal procedures; and that they be disciplined only through a kind of union "due process." These rights are now guaranteed by most union constitutions and by-laws.

The Senate has proved, however, that it is extremely difficult to incorporate these rights into statutory language, enforceable by stringent criminal penalties.

Membership. Originally the McClellan "bill of rights" amendment contained a provision on membership in unions, together with a definition of "member" which was inserted in Title VI. Although the membership provision was eliminated in the revised "bill of rights", the definition remained (Sec. 601(n)). It defines "member" as " any person who has... tendered the lawful requirements for membership in such organization..." What are the "lawful" requirements for membership? The bill does not say. It is not clear whether or not unions would have to admit applicants who are Communists, company spies working for employers or employer middlemen, instigators of "Wildcat" strikes, or convicted racketeers. Clearly the union should be permitted to protect itself by denying membership to such persons.

(Denial of membership by the union does not deprive a rejected applicant of his job. Under a union shop contract, a union can secure discharge of a worker only because of non-payment of dues.)

Equal rights and privileges. S. 1555 declares that each member shall have equal rights and privileges respecting participation in the union's affairs, subject to reasonable rules and regulations. What constitutes a "reasonable" rule? Is it "reasonable" to provide that employees in one shop of an amalgamated local shall not vote on matters of concern only to members of another shop in the same local? This can be known only after litigation in the courts (Sec. 101(a)(1)).

Freedom of Speech and Assembly. Again, this is a desirable principle, but it is plain that the union must have some right to impose limitations on attacks against it, to promote wildcat strikes, such as attempts to destroy the union or to take it, for example, out of the AFL-CIO and into the Teamsters. S. 1555 includes a proviso permitting unions to adopt "reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to his refraining from conduct that would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligation." However, this proviso is vague as to precisely what constitutes a "reasonable" rule. What does "reasonable" mean? (Sec. 101(a)(2)).

Freedom from Arbitrary Financial Exactions. Here the bill is the oppositive of vague: it is too specific. It provides that dues and fees shall not be "changed" or assessments levied except (1) by vote of the members by secret ballot at a meeting, or (2) by vote of the members by secret ballot in a referendum conducted through the mails, or (3) in the case of an international union, by vote at a convention. Why cannot an international union conduct a mail referendum to raise or lower dues? Further, there is no good reason why a union cannot delegate to its executive board the power to raise or lower dues, or levy assessments, or at least to do so in limited amounts until the next convention. The effect of the present language may actually be to increase dues, so that a union may be confident of having a sizable treasury to avoid the necessity of assessments to meet critical emergencies (Sec. 101(a)(3)).

Protection of the Right to Sue. This subsection is again subject to the criticism of over-rigidity. It is arguable that, as written, the section would prevent a union from providing, in a collective bargaining agreement or by internal rule, that an employee must present his grievance (against the employer) under the grievance and arbitration procedure specified in the agreement, rather than in a law suit. The proviso in this section, permitting a union to require members to exhaust internal procedures before filing suit in the courts, is grossly inadequate because it puts a six-month time limit on exhaustion of such procedures. In a large industry, the grievance and arbitration machinery very often takes substantially in excess of six months (Sec. 101(a)(4)).

Safeguards Against Improper Disciplinary Action. This subsection requires that disciplinary action be taken against a member only after he has been (1) served with specific written charges, (2) given a reasonable time to prepare his defense, (3) afforded a full and fair hearing. How specific must charges be? While such a requirement may be entirely reasonable with respect to some infractions, it is clearly inappropriate in case it becomes necessary to expel a drunk from a union meeting. Further, what is "full and fair hearing"? Is the entire membership of a local union (which frequently acts as a trial body) sufficiently impartial to meet this test? Can an international union suspend a local officer charged with embezzlement as an emergency measure to protect the local union treasury? (Sec. 101(a)(5)).

In sum, each of the provisions of the so-called "bill of rights" in S. 1555 is either so vague and general that its only certain consequence is litigation, or where more precise language is employed, defective in that normal and proper union practices would be barred.

Criminal Penalties. Apart from these objections to the "bill of rights," the most serious objection results from the general criminal penalties incorporated in Sec. 607 of S. 1555. This section imposes a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, for "the use of force or violence, or threat of the use of force or violence, or by economic reprisal or threat thereof, to restrain, coerce, or intimidate, or attempt to restrain, coerce, or intimidate any member of a labor organization for the purpose of interfering with or preventing the exercising by such member of any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act." (Sec. 607(6))

It must be remembered that these criminal penalties hang over not only the international union officer, who may have a battery of attorneys to advise him. They also hang over the local union officer who may work full time at his trade, and who has no one, much less a battery of attorneys, to advise him.

Should this man be fined or imprisoned because he violates in some way the "bill of rights" in S. 1555? Instead, criminal penalties should be limited to sections which explicitly define the criminal act, rather than to sections which are so vague that the offending individual can not possibly know when he is about to commit a crime.

This title of S. 1555 deals with reporting requirements for unions, union officers and employees, employers, and labor relations consultants. This title embodies the following major deficiencies:

Exemption for Small Local Unions. S. 1555 permits the Secretary of Labor to exempt from the reporting requirements local unions with less than 200 members and having annual receipts of less than $20,000. We urge that this provision be changed to grant an automatic exemption to such unions, subject to cancellation by the Secretary for cause.

We believe there is a need for exempting these small unions because of the very real problem of little local unions operating legitimately with unpaid, volunteer officers. An exemption of small local unions under a law which permitted the Secretary of Labor to cancel the exemption on the belief that abuses exist would provide fully adequate protection against the corrupt "paper" locals created by racketeers for the purposes of exploitation and extortion. On the other hand, if the Secretary is merely given authority to exempt small unions, a weak Secretary might refuse to grant any exemption out of unwillingness to assume responsibility.(Sec. 201(d)).

Employer Reporting. While the reporting requirements for unions are extensive, reporting requirements for employers are relatively weak. While unions must report all receipts, including the sources thereof, and all disbursements, including the purposes thereof, employers are exempted from reporting the following kinds of reporting:

(1) Changes in wages, working conditions, or employee benefits. This exclusion permits an employer to hide favored treatment of certain employees as a pay-off for anti-union activity. The exclusion would be acceptable if it related to public disclosed changes, etc. (Sec. 203 (a) (1) (i)).

(2) Expenditures incurred in connection with the publication by such employer in his own name of a newspaper, newsletter, or similar house organ or other letter, communication, or advertisement. We see no reason why an employer's expenditures for anti-union propaganda should be exempt from reporting just because they are carried on in the employer's own name. The management of the General Electric Company, for example, innundates that company's employees with a steady stream of anti-union propaganda. Under this exemption the costs of this anti-union campaign would not have to be reported by the Company: but unions comprised of GE employees would have to report any expenditures made to counter this campaign. This is not equal justice. (Sec. 203 (a)(1)(ii)).

(3) Expenditures to obtain information for use solely in conjunction with a judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceeding. This exclusion could cover expenditures to a "consultant" to infiltrate a union and to advise the employer as to the identity of its leaders, how many members it has, etc. Conceivably, the employer wants this information "for use solely in conjunction with" an administrative proceeding, for example, a Labor Board election. It still constitutes labor espionage. The bill also applies this exclusion to reporting by labor relations consultants. (Sec. 203 (a) (1) (iii), Sec. 203 (c)(B)).

(4) Expenditures made to any regular officer, supervisor or employee of an employer as compensation for service as a regular officer, supervisor, or employee of such employer. The fact that an employees regular duties may be labor espionage on behalf of his employer is no reason for excluding payments to him from reporting. Indeed, this subsection makes the employer reporting requirements a complete nullity, since to evade them an employer would only have to carry on his activities through his own regular employees. (Sec. 203 (f)).

Costs of Defense. S. 1555 presently prohibits a union or employer from paying the fine or advancing the costs of defense of any officer or employee indicted for any violation of any provision of this Act. A prosecution under this Act will not necessarily involve heinous conduct, such as embezzlement, but may turn on a doubtful construction of disputed language. A union or corporation executive board may direct a union or corporation official to engage in certain conduct to test the constitutionality or interpretation of one of the Act's provisions. Certainly in such a situation the union or corporation should be permitted to pay the defense costs.

In general, public reporting of any union or corporation disbursement of the described sort would seem sufficient protection against abuse. We would not object to a ban on paying defense costs of officers charged with certain particular crimes, such as embezzlement. (Sec. 207 (b)).

Fiduciary Responsibilities. S. 1555 seems to establish a broad fiduciary concept, to be implemented by private suits to challenge disbursements of union funds for purposes of which the plaintiffs disapprove. Also, an officer open to civil suit is presumably equally open to criminal prosecution, entailing a $10,000 fine, or five years imprisonment, or both.

Those who advocate this concept, no matter how laudable their motives may be, simply do not understand the nature of a labor union. There is no proper analogy between a labor union and a corporation or bank. The principles underlying minority stockholders' suits can be broadly applied to the relationships between union members and their organizations only at the risk of doing enormous damage to the labor movement.

A union does not exist for the purpose of making money. It exists as a mechanism through which its members combine to promote their mutual improvement, both as employees and as members of society generally, and both materially and in other ways.

What then is the intention of those who would equate union officials to bank officials as "fiduciaries?" If a union decides to give money to the democratic unions of France or Italy or Germany to aid them in combatting their Communist rivals -- and this is not an imaginary case -- are its officials to be open to suit by any member who disagrees with the disbursement? If a union contributes to the Red Cross, are its officials to be subjected to suit by dissident members? (Sec. 209; Sec. 610).

We do not, on the other hand, object to sanctions against the misuse of union funds for personal gain.

This title refers to the imposition and administration of trusteeships.

Transfer of Funds on Revocation of Charter. The Senate-passed measure currently permits transfer of local union funds to international unions only upon dissolution of the local. This should be broadened to include transfer of funds upon suspension or revocation of the local union charter. For example, an international union may want to suspend or revoke the charter of a local union whose size has dwindled from 2000 to 5 to prevent the remaining five from dissipating the local treasury in parties, etc. The bill already protects union funds by providing criminal penalties for embezzlement.(Sec. 303(a)).

Bonding Requirements . The section requiring bonding of union officers and employees who handle funds applies to joint union-employer trust funds. We see no equal justice in requiring bonding of the union trustees but not of the employer trustees. (Sec. 308).

TITLE IV

Title IV deals with union elections, setting forth requirements on frequency, qualifications, notice, etc. Certain changes in language should be made, and federal remedies should be made exclusive.

Title V encourages unions and employer groups to adopt and enforce codes of ethical practices to eliminate improper practices.

TITLE VI

This title contains definitions and miscellaneous provisions.

General Criminal Penalties. This title contains a general criminal penalty imposing a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both for disciplining any member "for exercising any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act," or for "the use of force or violence, or threat of the use of force or violence, or by economic reprisal or threat thereof, to restrain, coerce, or intimidate, or attempt to restrain, coerce, or intimidate any member...for the purpose of interfering with or preventing the exercise by such member of any right to which he is entitled under the provisions of this Act."

Such broad criminal penalties are highly objectionable because the language is excessively general, and the penalty for violation is excessively harsh. Criminal statutes should not be so broad as to make even experienced attorneys doubtful as to what action constitutes a crime (Sec. 607).

Let us suppose, for example, that a local union president rules a speaker, advocating a wild-cat strike, out of order at a local union meeting, that the speaker nevertheless persists in holding the floor, and that the president threatens that unless he sits down he will have him ejected from the meeting. The president's threat, under this provision and the "bill of rights", may be criminal. The bill is loaded with such traps, and no officer could possibly know when he is about to commit a crime.

Criminal penalties should apply to specific acts, and the bill laready contains a number of such penalties. These are found, for example, in sections 208(a) (failure to comply with reporting requirements), 208(b) (false statements in reports), 208(c) (false entry in books and records), 209(a) (embezzlement), 301(b) (trusteeship reporting requirements), and 405(c) (employment of persons convicted of certain crimes).

Any additional criminal penalties, instead of applying broadly to the whole bill, should apply to specific language in specific sections.

TITLE VII

This title contains certain amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act.

No-Man's Land. The failure of the NLRB to assert its full jurisdiction has created a no-man's land in which the Board does not act and the states may not act. The provision in S. 1555 permits state agencies to assert jurisdiction in areas in which the Board declines its jurisdiction. The state agencies would have to apply federal law set forth in the Taft-Hartley Act as interpreted by the Board and the federal courts. Orders of the state agencies would be enforceable in federal district courts.

A better approach, to avoid confusion, would be to enforce the orders of state agencies through the Board. An even better solution would be to require the Board to assert jurisdiction over all cases arising under the Taft-Hartley Act (Sec. 701).

Economic Strikers. The economic striker provision of S. 1555 actually waters down the right of economic strikers to vote in representation elections by permitting the Board to limit their voting in ways which are not spelled out and cannot be assessed. It further casts doubt upon the right of workers striking in protest against an employer's unfair labor practice to vote.

It should be made clear that economic strikers shall have the right to vote in representation elections (Sec. 703).

"Hot-Cargo" Contracts. The bill makes illegal any contract between a union and a common carrier whereby the carrier is to cease and refrain from handling, using or transporting the products of any other employer. Such a provision is objectionable in principle because it forces union members to become strike-breakers by crossing picket lines. It thwarts the traditionally legitimate right of working people, on an individual basis, to provide one another with mutual aid and assistance (Sec. 707).

Organizational and Recognitional Picketing. S. 1555 seeks to hobble the right of workers to picket a shop either to organize it or to persuade the employer to recognize the union. Even the mere "threat" to picket in violation of this section would be made an unfair labor practice.

Under this provision an employer can in effect prevent picketing simply by recognizing and contracting with another union. Clearly, this would foster racketeering and corruption by encouraging and protecting collusive deals between corrupt employers and racketeers preying upon the labor movement. All an employer has to do to prevent picketing is to call in a racketeer and quickly sign a collusive contract.

Also, under this provision an election within the preceding nine months automatically bars any picketing by an uncertified minority union, regardless of whether the union was forced to a too-quick election, or regardless even of whether the union participated in the election. It is manifestly unfair under such circumstances to prevent a union from attempting through picketing to organize the employees (Sec. 708).

We vigorously oppose any effort to extend the restrictions on peaceful picketing or other legitimate means of organizing. (Picketing is already unlawful when it seeks to force an employer to bargain with one union after another union has been certified under the Taft-Hartley Act.)

The Kearns Bill, H.R. 7265

The Kearns bill has very little to do with labor-management corruption. Primarily, it contains drastic new restrictions on perfectly legitimate union activities and far-reaching intervention by the Government into the internal affairs of unions.

Discrimination against Employees. The Kearns bill would apparently forbid unions even to report habitual drunks, Communists and shoddy workmen to the employer. Good workmen should not be forbidden to protest at having to work along-side such misfits. (Sec. 106 (a).)

Organizational and Recognitional Picketing. The bill contains a ban on certain organizational and recognitional picketing. Objections to this are the same as similar provisions in S. 1555. (Sec. 106 (b).)

Secondary Boycotts. The bill makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to enter into any contract whereby an employer agrees to cease doing business with any other person.

The phrase "secondary boycott" is tinged with emotionalism, but it is a perfectly legitimate practice. Take a clothing manufacturer, for example. He is unionized. He pays good wages. But he gets his cloth from a non-union textile factory. The textile factory has fought and prevented unionization. It pays poor wages. Its conduct is a threat to union standards throughout the whole industry. So the union goes to the clothing manufacturer and in the mutual give-and-take of collective bargaining, the clothing manufacturer agrees not to buy cloth from the non-union factory. To get this agreement there is an equivalent concession by the union. That is all there is to the "secondary boycott."

Good laws cannot be written on the basis of such epithets. (Sec. 106(b).)

Economic Strikers. The bill would cut off the right of economic strikers to vote in a representation election after six months. Such an early and rigid cut-off date should be rejected. (Sec. 107(c).

Basic Rights and Privileges of Union Members. This section incorporates a number of the provisions in the McClellan "bill of rights," plus some others. These provisions are subject to the same general objections which apply to the "bill of rights" in S. 1555. (Sec. 109)

Reporting Requirements. This measure requires that reports (substantially similar to those required by S. 1555) verified by certified public accountants be supplied to the members of the reporting union. (Sec. 109)

The costs of hiring a certified public accountant would gut the treasuries of some small local unions with 50, 100, or 200 members.

No-man's land. The Kearns bill climaxes its display of utter disregard for any sound national labor relations policy by seizing upon one of the most radical and worst conceivable solutions for the problem of the "no-man's land." It would give state courts and agencies concurrent jurisdiction over labor disputes arising under the Taft-Hartley Act, unless there is a "direct and positive conflict" between federal and state law. Very simply, this would inevitably cause conflict in interpretations of the law and in the application of varying remedies. It would create an administrative nightmare. (Sec. 112)

THE BARDEN BILL, H.R. 4473

The Barden bill is entitled the "Labor Bill of Rights Act." It purports to deal with problems of corruption and unethical and undemocratic conduct in the labor-management field.

Licensing. Title I of the bill amounts to a licensing statute for labor unions. It requires unions to file a registration statement with the Secretary of Labor setting forth that its constitution and by-laws contain certain detailed provisions, on pain of loss of access to the NLRB and loss of Federal income tax exemption upon cancellation of the registration by the Secretary.

Under this bill, the Secretary of Labor would have vast and awesome powers greater than any enjoyed by any other Federal official in peacetime. A huge new bureaucracy would be necessary to assist the Secretary in carrying out his powers and functions under this bill. The most minute details of union business and operations would be subject to scrutiny. The very existence of many unions would wholly depend on the personal whims and predilections of the Secretary of Labor. (Title 1).

Fiduciary Responsibilities. The fiduciary responsibilities in Title II are subject to the same objections which are made to the similar provision in S. 1555. (Title II).

Trusteeships. Title III is virtually the same as the language on trusteeships which appeared in earlier versions of the Kennedy-Ervin bill. (Title III).

Public Law 86-257
86th Congress, S. 1555
September 14, 1959

AN ACT

73 Stat. 519.

To provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959".

DECLARATION OF FINDINGS, PURPOSES, AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that, in the public interest, it continues to be the responsibility of the Federal Government to protect employees' rights to organize, choose their own representatives, bargain collectively, and otherwise engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection; that the relations between employers and labor organizations and the millions of workers they represent have a substantial impact on the commerce of the Nation; and that in order to accomplish the objective of a free flow of commerce it is essential that labor organizations, employers, and their officials adhere to the highest standards of responsibility and ethical conduct in administering the affairs of their organizations, particularly as they affect labor-management relations.

(b) The Congress further finds, from recent investigations in the labor and management fields, that there have been a number of instances of breach of trust, corruption, disregard of the rights of individual employees, and other failures to observe high standards of responsibility and ethical conduct which require further and supplementary legislation that will afford necessary protection of the rights and interests of employees and the public generally as they relate to the activities of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives.

(c) The Congress, therefore, further finds and declares that the enactment of this Act is necessary to eliminate or prevent improper practices on the part of labor organizations, employers, labor relations consultants, and their officers and representatives which distort and defeat the policies of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, and the Railway Labor Act, as amended, and have the tendency or necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (1) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (2) occurring in the current of commerce; (3) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods into or from the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (4) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing into or from the channels of commerce.

Labor Law — Landrum-Griffin

Ill-Conceived Provisions:

10-Year Record Disproves Need for Landrum-Griffin

The following is excerpted from "Landrum-Griffin: The First Decade," by J. Albert Woll, general counsel of the AFL-CIO, which appears in the November 1970 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE DEPT. OF LABOR office charged with enforcement of the Landrum-Griffin Act has summarized the law's first 10 years, reporting on its impact on labor unions, their officers and employes.

In short, the report emphatically refutes the claims of those who argued for the enactment of the law by characterizing labor organizations as racket infested, corrupt and undemocratic. The report demonstrates that there was no need in 1959 for the broad reach of the Landrum-Griffin Act, as finally drawn, and there is no need today for the continuance of many of its ill-conceived provisions.

The law was sold to the American public in 1959 as a mild reform measure allegedly needed to purge the American trade union movement of corruption. Formally known as the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, it was spawned largely by the well-publicized investigation conducted by the Senate committee under the guidance of Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.).

The result of this clamor was an extremely complicated, confusing and detailed law which included a conglomeration of provisions dealing with many facets of union activity.

During the first 10 years of the act's existence, approximately 67,000 union organizational or information reports have been filed with the Secretary of Labor. In addition, over 500,000 annual financial reports have been filed by unions. These organizational and financial reports lay bare almost every phase of internal union activity and procedure.

A disclosure file for each reporting labor organization is maintained at the national headquarters of the Office of Labor-Management and Welfare-Pension Reports. Also, in each of its 24 area offices throughout the country, one can find duplicate disclosure files for all unions within the geographic jurisdiction of the particular area office.

If unions are as racket infested, corruption prone and undemocratically run as was charged at the McClellan hearings, it would follow that the Labor and Justice Departments must have been very busy during the 10 years, filing court suits to correct these evils.

But what is this 10-year record? According to the report by the Labor Department, approximately 52,000 labor organizations have filed Title II reports during each of the first 10 years of the Landrum-Griffin Act. Estimating that these labor organizations have an average of at least seven officers per union, approximately 365,000 union officials have been subject to the criminal provisions of the law each year.

Yet, in the 10 years, only 628 union representatives have been indicted—an average of less than 63 each year—for violations of the law's criminal provisions. Only 485—an average of less than 49 each year—have been convicted of such violations.

About 97 percent of the convictions secured involved Title II violations, such as filing false union reports, making false entries in union records, failing to keep union records, failing to file union reports, destruction of union records, and the closely-related crime of embezzlement proscribed in Title V.

OF THE 365,000 union representatives actively engaged in the daily business of running a labor union, seven have been convicted of depriving other union members of their rights through acts of force or violence, with seven others tried on similar charges and acquitted; four have been convicted of illegally holding union office; one was found guilty of destroying union records; three were indicted for failure to file union officer and employe reports, but none was convicted for after one of the three was acquitted, indictments against the other two were dismissed; three were charged with failure to secure union bonds, but again with none convicted.

The record, therefore, discloses that only 12 union representatives out of 365,000, or three one-thousandths of 1 percent (.003 percent) have been convicted during the first 10 years for Landrum-Griffin Act crimes other than embezzlement and those offenses dealing with union reporting under Title II of the act.

Of the approximately 52,000 local unions filing disclosure reports in each of the 10 years the Landrum-Griffin Act has been in existence, each must have had at least three elections since 1959 because under the act, local unions must hold an election at least once every three years. So the 52,000 local unions have held at least 156,000 elections during the first 10 years.

After 10 years under the law, the Secretary of Labor had sought court authority to set aside only 177 such elections; 155 of these law suits have been filed against local unions, 10 have been filed against intermediate bodies, such as district councils, and nine have been filed against national and international unions. Two suits named both a local union and a district council as defendants and one action was instituted against a national union and one of its districts.

Up to June 30, 1969, final disposition has been made of 123 of these civil court actions. Of those 123 cases, 79 of the defendant unions were required to hold new elections under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor as a result of adverse court decisions or stipulations filed with the courts; 21 cases were settled by the unions involved stipulating that their future elections would be conducted in compliance with federal law; 10 cases were dismissed by agreement or at the request of the secretary; in 13 cases the court upheld the validity of the elections and refused the secretary's request to set them aside.

health and safety conditions isn't possible unless government inspectors have the legal power and the administrative will to make surprise inspections. And there must be enough of these inspectors to make reasonably frequent inspections, just as there must be sufficient policemen to patrol the streets and highways.

Certain government spokesmen urging the passage of health and safety legislation justify it on economic grounds. The U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare's 1966 report, "Protecting the Health of 80 Million Americans," notes that these 80 million workers represent 40 percent of the nation's population and pay 60 percent of the taxes. If the health of these people could be improved so that they would be absent from work just one-fifth less, says the report, there would be a $10 billion increase in the Gross National Product.

Gamesmanship with numbers misses the point. The protection of the bodies of the 80 million men and women who work is a matter of right, not economics. It is a matter of order and justice and it should be a matter of law.

Substantial, even dramatic, progress could be made through union-management negotiations and cooperation if unions will apply themselves to the task and managers will share the responsibility with unions. Such progress will lessen the need for government interference. An ideal situation might be one in which government holds strong powers but seldom finds it necessary to use them because union-management efforts have minimized the need for them. In such case the government could carry on enforcement with far fewer than the 16,000 inspectors, supervisors and clerks some observers estimate as being the current need.

No contract can fully outline safe and healthful procedures for a given industrial plant because the number of potential hazards which may arise is infinite. No union committee can negotiate a health and safety agreement and then walk away presuming the subject covered. Maintenance of proper conditions requires daily surveillance and intermittent corrections.

Labor and management, if there is a willingness on both sides, can negotiate written agreements as to the general conditions which must prevail, the methods by which these general rules may be applied, and the procedures by which differences of opinion between labor and management may be resolved.

The challenge to management is to surrender some of its rigidly retained responsibility and control. The challenge to government is to seek out facts and truths about present-day occupational and health hazards and to make its police power available on a standby basis so it can enforce law and order in the workplaces if management and labor fail to do so. The challenge to unions is to fulfill their responsibility to working people by insisting that every man and woman has a safe and healthy place in which to work.

The Department of Labor office charged with enforcement of the Landrum-Griffin Act has summarized the law's first 10 years, reporting on its impact on labor unions, their officers and employes.

In short, the report emphatically refutes the claims of those who argued for the enactment of the law by characterizing labor organizations as racket infested, corrupt and undemocratic. The report demonstrates that there was no need in 1959 for the broad reach of the Landrum-Griffin Act, as finally drawn, and there is no need today for the continuance of many of its ill-conceived provisions.

The law was sold to the American public in 1959 as a mild reform measure allegedly needed to purge the American trade union movement of corruption. Formally known as the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, it was spawned largely by the well-publicized investigation conducted by the Senate committee under the guidance of Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.).

Many who sought the enactment of this law hailed it as the magna carta of the worker and as a sound piece of legislation well designed to limit the dictatorial powers of the so-called "labor bosses" who, it was said, had subverted the rights of individual union members, misused union funds and by fraud, deceit, coercive tactics and "rigged" elections, had perpetuated themselves in union office.

The U.S. trade union movement, on the other hand, saw no need for a law that dug so deeply into the internal affairs of unions. Pointing out that the corruption uncovered by the McClellan committee was confined to only a handful of unions and union leaders, it argued that a simple reporting and disclosure measure would be sufficient to deter union corruption and abuse. But the voice of organized labor was lost in the clamor for a tough, sweeping law that would make the federal government the policeman over the internal affairs of labor organizations and would further restrict and confine the organizing tactics of unions.

J. ALBERT WOLL is the general counsel of the AFL-CIO. This article is based on a report on the Landrum-Griffin Act which he made to the AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurers' Conference in New Orleans in mid-1970.

The result of this clamor was an extremely complicated, confusing and detailed law which included a conglomeration of provisions dealing with many facets of union activity. The sweeping nature of the Landrum-Griffin Act and its far-reaching effect on unions, both in the conduct of their internal affairs and in their collective bargaining activities, becomes readily apparent in the seven titles embodied in the law:

- Title I deals with what is labeled as the "bill of rights of members of labor organizations."
- Title II carries the heading "reporting by labor organizations, officers and employes of labor organizations and employers."
- Title III deals with "trusteeships."
- Title IV is identified by the single word "elections" with a sub-head reading "terms of office; election procedures."
- Title V is broadly headed "safeguards for labor organizations" and includes union bonding requirements; restrictions on union loans; proscriptions against the payment of union officers' fines; prohibitions on certain persons holding union office and restrictions on employer payments to union representatives.
- Title VI is a catch-all title and is appropriately labeled "miscellaneous provisions."
- Title VII embraces Taft-Hartley Act amendments and, among other things, tightens the bans on secondary boycotts and curbs organizational and recognition picketing.

Most of the law's provisions are enforced by the Secretary of Labor. His authority extends over the entire act with the exception of Titles I and VII. A great deal of this authority has been delegated by the secretary to the Office of Labor-Management and Welfare-Pension Reports under the general supervision of the Assistant Secretary for Labor-Management Relations. It is this office which issued the report dealing with compliance, enforcement and reporting under the Landrum-Griffin Act during the fiscal year 1969 along with a summary of the act's impact on labor unions and their officers and employes in the law's first 10 years.

Under Title II, each covered labor organization must disclose specific and detailed information with respect to its organizational structure and its procedures. This disclosure must be made in a report filed with the Secretary of Labor. In addition, each union must submit copies of its constitution and bylaws and must file with the secretary an annual report detailing the union's financial operations.

During the first 10 years of the act's existence, approximately 67,000 union organizational or information reports have been filed with the Secretary of Labor. In addition, over 500,000 annual financial reports have been filed by unions. These organizational and financial reports lay bare almost every phase of internal union activity and procedure. They are open to inspection by not only the secretary and his staff but by the public at large and union members with a legitimate interest in the reports. A disclosure file for each reporting labor organization is maintained at the national headquarters of the Office of Labor-Management and Welfare-Pension Reports. Also, in each of its 24 area offices throughout the country, one can find duplicate disclosure files for all unions within the geographic jurisdiction of the particular area office.

From 1959 to the end of fiscal 1969, over 560,000 reports had been filed by approximately 52,000 labor organizations. During the last five years over 12,000 persons have journeyed to Labor-Management Welfare-Pension offices to inspect disclosure files. Of these visitors, over 4,000 were workers; 3,500 would not identify themselves; approximately 2,200 were union or management attorneys; about 1,200 came from investigative agencies; slightly over 1,000 represented trade associations and around 300 were from the press. Beginning with the fiscal year 1964 the public has purchased over 320,000 pages of disclosure reports.

If unions are as racket infested, corruption prone and undemocratically run as was charged at the McClellan hearings, it would follow that the Labor and Justice Departments must have been very busy during the 10 years, filing court suits to correct these evils.

But what is this 10-year record? According to the report by the Labor Department, approximately 52,000 labor organizations have filed Title II reports during each of the first 10 years of the Landrum-Griffin Act. Estimating that these labor organizations have an average of at least seven officers per union, approximately 365,000 union officials have been subject to the criminal provisions of the law each year.

Yet, in the 10 years, only 628 union representatives have been indicted—an average of less than 63 each year—for violations of the law's criminal provisions. Only 485—an average of less than 49 each year—have been convicted of such violations. Thus, less than thirteen one-thousandths of one percent (.013 percent) of the 365,000 union representatives are convicted of Landrum-Griffin crimes each year.

About 97 percent of the convictions secured involved Title II violations, such as filing false union reports, making false entries in union records, failing to keep union records, failing to file union reports, destruction of union records, and the closely-related crime of embezzlement proscribed in Title V.

This 97 percent figure, of course, leaves very little room for convictions for other Landrum-Griffin violations. Including the crimes just mentioned, this law created about 21 new federal offenses calling for fines and imprisonment. They run the gamut of offenses, such as the failure to secure union bonds; the making of union loans to union officers or employes in excess of $2,000; the payment of any fine imposed on a union officer or employe convicted of violating the Landrum-Griffin law; extortionate picketing; depriving union members of their rights by force or violence; the improper transfer of the funds of a trusteed local to its parent body; the serving as a union representative by a person previously convicted of specified crimes.

Of the 365,000 union representatives actively engaged in the daily business of running a labor union, seven have been convicted of depriving other union members of their rights through acts of force or violence, with seven others tried on similar charges and acquitted; four have been convicted of illegally holding union office; one was found guilty of destroying union records; three were indicted for failure to file union officer and employe reports, but none was convicted for after one of the three was acquitted, indictments against the other two were dismissed; three were charged with failure to secure union bonds, but again with none convicted.

The record, therefore, discloses that only 12 union representatives out of 365,000, or three one-thousandths of 1 percent (.003 percent) have been convicted during the first 10 years for Landrum-Griffin Act crimes other than embezzlement and those offenses dealing with union reporting under Title II of the act.

During the hearings on Title III, which severely restricts national and international unions in correcting local union abuses, labor leaders challenged the need for any federal law dealing with the imposition of union trusteeships over subordinate bodies. Recognizing that a few national or international unions had in the past abused their authority to impose trusteeships, union leaders argued that such abuse was not symptomatic of the labor movement. Consequently, they urged that no legislation be enacted until it was established that the evil was sufficient to require it.

AFL-CIO President George Meany told a Senate subcommittee in March 1958 that he doubted "a case has been made for federal regulation of trusteeships."

"We think it would, however, be desirable to find out whether the trusteeship abuses about which Sen. (John F.) Kennedy is concerned are in fact sufficiently widespread to call for government regulation," he said.

"We suggest, therefore, that there be added to the present Labor Department reporting provisions a requirement that international unions report the following: (1) the name of each subordinate body in trusteeship; (2) the date on which the trusteeship was established; (3) the reason for establishing the trusteeship; (4) whether the votes of the body in trusteeship were cast in union elections. A willfully false statement in such a report would be subject to the same criminal penalities as are such statements in other reports, and the powers proposed to be given the Labor Department to investigate the truth or falsity of reports filed with it would likewise apply.

"It may be that the bare requirement that a report of this sort be filed would, together with the other remedies now available, suffice to prevent trusteeship abuses," Meany told the subcommittee. "If not, the reports would at least provide information as to the need for further legislation and the directions it should take."

Although Meany's advice went unheeded, the history of this title of the law has demonstrated the wisdom of his recommendation.

In the 10 years, 1,757 Initial Trusteeship Reports were filed. This number, while seemingly large, is actually relatively small since there are over 52,000 labor organizations in the United States and the average number of trusteeships imposed each year over the 10-year period is only 175. More important perhaps is that the Secretary of Labor, who is empowered to institute court action to set aside any trusteeship not established or maintained in good faith for a purpose permitted under Title III, has seen fit to challenge in court, as illegal, a grand total of only four trusteeships.

Title IV of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act makes the federal government the overseer of union elections. It concerns itself with the frequency of elections and establishes many requirements which must be met before an election will be regarded as validly conducted.

The enforcement of these provisions rests solely with the Secretary of Labor. Under one section of the law, a union member, after exhausting the internal union remedies available to him or after invoking them without receiving a final decision within three months, may file an election complaint with the Secretary of Labor charging union election violations.

When such a complaint is filed, the secretary is required to initiate an investigation. If the evidence warrants it, the secretary may then bring an action against the union in a federal district court. If the court finds an election has not been held within the time set by the act, or that the violation of the act may have affected the outcome of an election, it is required to declare the election, if any, to be void and order a new election under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor.

"The Department of Labor report . . . demonstrates that there was no need in 1959 for the broad reach of the Landrum-Griffin Act, as finally drawn, and there is no need today for a continuance of many of its ill-conceived provisions."

In his testimony before the Senate subcommittee in March 1958, Meany expressed grave doubt "that governmental regulations of union elections is feasible or warranted." Time has proven he was right.

Of the approximately 52,000 local unions filing disclosure reports in each of the 10 years the Landrum-Griffin Act has been in existence, each must have had at least three elections since 1959 because under the act, local unions must hold an election at least once every three years. So the 52,000 local unions have held at least 156,000 elections during the first 10 years. The Secretary of Labor might have been expected to have a litigation-filing field day, with scores of union elections invalidated each year. Quite the opposite is true.

After 10 years under the law, the Secretary of Labor had sought court authority to set aside only 177 such elections; 155 of these law suits have been filed against local unions, 10 have been filed against intermediate bodies, such as district councils, and nine have been filed against national and international unions. Two suits named both a local union and a district council as defendants and one action was instituted against a national union and one of its districts. Up to June 30, 1969, final disposition has been made of 123 of these civil court actions. Of those 123 cases, 79 of the defendant unions were required to hold new elections under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor as a result of adverse court decisions or stipulations filed with the courts; 21 cases were settled by the unions involved stipulating that their future elections would be conducted in compliance with federal law; 10 cases were dismissed by agreement or at the request of the secretary; in 13 cases the courts upheld the validity of the elections and refused the secretary's request to set them aside.

The setting aside by court order of only 79 union elections out of 156,000 seems ample proof that it was ridiculous in 1959 to claim that many labor organizations were run by hoodlums who perpetuate themselves in office through fraud and terror.

Because of this 10-year history, some may argue that organized labor should not be too upset with the election provisions since only a handful of unions have been required to re-run their elections.

The answer to that argument is quite simple: The evil impact of the law cannot be determined solely by the number of elections ordered to be re-run. Other harassing factors must be considered, such as time-consuming, union-disrupting, unwarranted investigations and needless and fruitless court proceedings that drain union resources in terms of money and manpower. Even in most situations where re-run elections are court ordered and thereafter supervised by the Secretary of Labor, the re-runs are ordered because of trivial and unintentional non-observance of technical provisions of the law. Then, when these re-run elections are completed at great expense to the union, the union members have affirmed, sometimes by a more resounding vote, their original choice of leaders.

Since the enactment of the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1959, the Secretary of Labor has investigated well over 1,000 union elections. Because of computing methods used prior to 1963, reliable election activity statistics are not available for the entire 10-year period. However, during the past seven years, approximately 60 percent of the investigations produced only harassment and disruption, with justifiable bitterness against unnecessary governmental intrusion into internal union affairs. Even the Secretary of Labor concluded that those investigations failed to uncover election violations warranting court action.

Even when the secretary does go to court and succeeds in getting an order setting aside a union election, the ultimate result of most re-run elections causes one to wonder what good, if any, has really been accomplished.

In that connection, the experience of one AFL-CIO union caught in the toils of the law is worthy of note.

From April 1 through May 31, 1966, the National Maritime Union conducted a mail ballot election for national offices and, upon its conclusion, a complaint charging election violations was filed with the Secretary of Labor. After an investigation, the secretary brought suit to set aside the election. In April 1968, two years after the original election, the United States District Court ruled that the outcome of the challenged election may have been affected by election violations and ordered a re-run election under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor. This ruling was affirmed by the U. S. Court of Appeals in New York in July 1968 and the re-run election was held.

In the almost three years that elapsed between the original election and the re-run election, the NMU was constantly in and out of court defending itself against the secretary's legal moves or instituting protective legal moves of its own.

Finally, after three years of legal skirmishes, the re-run election was held. It covered a two-month period and was conducted on a global basis with voting taking place at 32 separate ports in the United States and elsewhere in the world. When it was all over the same slate of officers was overwhelmingly elected, winning all eight national offices as well as the other 87 offices at stake, namely 14 port agents, 14 field patrolmen and 59 patrolmen.

"The setting aside by court order of only 79 union elections out of 156,000 seems ample proof that it was ridiculous in 1959 to claim that many labor organizations were run by hoodlums who perpetuate themselves in office through fraud and terror."

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court agreed to rule on the scope of the Labor Department's authority to police the internal affairs of labor unions.

The department, under the 1959 Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, can sue to change union voting practices and other matters if a union member, after failing to gain reform through internal union procedures, files a complaint with the department.

The issue the High Court will decide sometime next year is whether the department also can sue to change improper union practices that are uncovered by its own investigation.

In other actions the Supreme Court:

Rejected Lee National Corp.'s plea for review of a key procedural issue in a damage suit brought by Lee against Atlantic Richfield Co., Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. and Firestone Tire & Rubber Co.

Turned down the Justice Department's plea for review of the standards being applied by the U.S. Court of Claims in patent-infringement suits filed against the Government. The department asserted that the court of claims, by applying improper standards, is upholding too many suits against Uncle Sam.

In agreeing to decide the labor case, the Supreme Court accepted the Labor Department's plea for review of a lower-court decision restricting the department's authority under the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclusure Act. The 1959 law requires union locals to elect officers by secret ballot at least every three years and contains various provisions to ensure union members' right to vote. A member who believes his union isn't complying with the law can file a complaint with the Labor Department, which then can sue to set aside an election.

The new issue, concerning the extent of the department's authority under the law, was raised by a union member who ran unsuccessfully for president of a California local of the United Steelworkers. The member had protested inside the union the incumbent president's use of union facilities to prepare literature for his reelection campaign. The member's complaint to the Labor Department alleged that the incumbent's activities constituted illegal use of union facilities.

The department sued to set aside the election, charging illegal use of union facilities and, in addition, challenging a union rule that restricted candidacy for local office to those members who had attended at least 50% of all local meetings in the prior three years. The department's suit asserted that the rule made 90% of the members ineligible to run for office and that it hadn't been uniformly followed.

A Federal district court ordered the local to hold a new election and the U.S. Appeals Court in San Francisco affirmed the district court ruling. But the appeals court based its ruling on a finding that the incumbent president had illegally used union facilities, and it held that the Labor Department hadn't any authority to challenge the meeting-attendance requirement because the requirement hadn't been challenged in the complaining union member's internal union protest.

The appeals court said "Congress intended to empower the (Labor) Secretary to assert those violations that are apparent from a member's protest to the union and no others." The Labor Department apealed that part of the decision to the Supreme Court.

The Lee National Case

The procedural question raised in the Lee National case is an important one in antitrust a Sherman Act violation and denied Lee's motion for summary judgment. Lee attempted unsuccessfully to appeal the procedural question to the Federal appeals court in Philadelphia and then went to the Supreme Court.

The High Court didn't comment in denying Lee permission to appeal the procedural question.

The Patent-Issue Case

The Justice Department sought High Court review of the patent issue because, in the department's view, the Court of Claims has been applying a "much laxer standard than that prescribed" in previous Supreme Court decisions. The department asserted that the Court of Claims was applying lax standards in upholding the validity of patents in ruling on infringement suits brought by private patent owners against the Government. Such cases frequently are brought in connection with Government defense procurement.

The department told the Supreme Court it's concerned because more than 70 cases currently are pending in the Court of Claims alleging that the Government infringed on various privately owned patents. The department estimated that it could be liable for damages of up to $500 million under the pending infringement suits.

All infringement suits against the Government must be brought in the Court of Claims, a special tribunal.

The Justice Department asked the High Court to review the Court of Claims' standards on the basis of two cases decided against the Government by the claims court.

One suit was brought by Garrett Corp., a Los Angeles concern, for alleged infringement of two patents covering devices used in the manufacture of inflatable life rafts purchased by the Government for sea-rescue work. The other suit was brought by Standard Parts & Equipment Corp., based in Fort Worth, Texas, which is the licensee of a patent covering runway emergency lights, used at airports.

The Court of Claims upheld the validity of all three patents and ruled that the Government, by utilizing the patented devices, had infringed. The court ordered further proceedings on the amounts to be paidfby the Government.

The Supreme Court didn't comment in refusing to review the Court of Claims decisions in the two cases, except to note that Justices Black, Douglas and Blackmun voted for review. The affirmative votes of at least four of the nine Justices are necessary for review.

90% of the members ineligible to run for office and that it hadn't been uniformly followed.

A Federal district court ordered the local to hold a new election and the U.S. Appeals Court in San Francisco affirmed the district court ruling. But the appeals court based its ruling on a finding that the incumbent president had illegally used union facilities, and it held that the Labor Department hadn't any authority to challenge the meeting-attendance requirement because the requirement hadn't been challenged in the complaining union member's internal union protest.

The appeals court said "Congress intended to empower the (Labor) Secretary to assert those violations that are apparent from a member's protest to the union and no others." The Labor Department apealed that part of the decision to the Supreme Court.

The Lee National Case

The procedural question raised in the Lee National case is an important one in antitrust litigation. The question is whether, when the Federal Trade Commission rules that a company engaged in unfair or deceptive practices in violation of the FTC Act, the ruling on its face provides a basis for a competitor to bring a private antitrust damage suit against the guilty company.

The Clayton Antitrust Act specifically allows injured competitors to bring private antitrust suits for triple damages against companies that have been sued successfully by the Justice Department for price-fixing, or other violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act. In other words, for purposes of private damage actions, a successful Government suit is, on its face, evidence of a Sherman Act violation.

The law doesn't specify any parallel right to bring a private damage suit for violations of the FTC Act, however.

The question of whether a parallel right exists was raised by Lee National, which formerly was known as Lee Rubber & Tire Co. and was a tire maker competing with larger companies, including Goodyear and Firestons.

The origins of Lee's case go back about 10 years to a series of complaints issued by the FTC. Each complaint attacked an agreement between a major oil company and large tire maker under which the oil company agreed to promote, in its retail gas stations, sales of the manufacturer's tires, batteries and auto accessories. For its sponsorship, the oil company, as well as its retailers, received a sales commission from the tire maker. The FTC found such agreements in violation of the FTC Act, in part because they unfairly excluded competing tire makers from the service-station market.

The Supreme Court in 1965 affirmed the FTC's ruling in the agency's case against a sales-commission agreement Atlantic Richfield had signed with Goodyear in 1951. The same year, Atlantic Richfield signed a similar agreemnt with Firestone, sponsoring Goodyear products in some of its stations and Firestone products in others. But Firestone wasn't directly involved in the High Court's 1965 decision.

However, in a subsequent case the Supreme Court left standing an FTC decision against a similar agreement between Shell Oil Co. and Firestone. In a third case in 1968, involving an agreement between Texaco Inc. and Goodrich Tire & Rubber Co., the High Court, in upholding the FTC, said such agreements are illegal even when there isn't any evidence that an oil company coerced its retailers into selling a particular brand of tires.

Lee filed its triple-damage suit against Atlantic Richfield, Goodyear and Firestone in 1966, soon after the Supreme Court decided the FTC's case against the Atlantic-Goodyear agreement. The suit said that Lee had sold its tires to Atlantic Richfield retail gas stations from 1932 until 1951, when Atlantic signed its agreements with Goodyear and Firestone. Lee's suit sought damages for the 1951-1965 period, for the alleged losses in sales it had suffered because it was excluded from the Atlantic-stations market.

In 1967, after the High Court decided the Texaco-Goodrich case, Lee asked the Federal district court in which its case was pending to hand down a summary judgment in its favor. Lee's theory was that the Supreme Court's 1968 decision, even though based on the FTC Act, was the equivalent of a finding of a Sherman Act violation and thus Lee, under the Clayton Act, was entitled to damages.

But the district court rejected the notion that an FTC Act violation was the equivalent of interest of improving opportunities for teenagers." (See story on page 3.)

At the same time, some economists note, women make up an increasing portion of the adult labor force, and the record clearly shows that unemployment runs higher among women than men. Since 1965, the number of women at least 20 years old in the labor force has climbed 20%, while the number of men has risen only about 5%. The rate of unemployment among adult women in recent years has been nearly twice as high as the rate of unemployment among men.

The female unemployment problem is compounded, according to some analysts, by the fact that teaching jobs, for which women traditionally have trained, are no longer going begging, as they were a decade ago. "Significant surpluses of elementary and secondary teachers are expected to occur" in the years just ahead, says Herbert Bienstock, a Labor Department official. "The traditional fields of employment for women may not be able to absorb the tremendous increase in women college graduates expected over the next decade."

The number of women receiving a bachelor's degree is expected to increase about two-thirds by 1980, Mr. Bienstock reports. This is nearly double the expected rate of increase for men.

Although no teacher shortage is anticipated, studies show that intense shortages will exist for doctors, dentists and engineers, fields where women, until now at least, have played a minor role. Women account for only 7% of all U.S. physicians, 2% of dentists and fewer than 1% of engineers. These statistics contrast bleakly with similar figures for foreign lands. In West Germany, 20% of the physicians are women. In England, the figure is 16%.

A recent study of the situation by Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. concludes: "It is plain that the U.S., compared with most foreign nations, is not taking full advantage of the brainpower and potential of women."

Some analysts say that the labor needs of the economy are undergoing a dramatic change at present, and that this also makes the 4% jobless goal unrealistic. They cite major cutbacks in military spending in recent months. Federal defense outlays in the third quarter were at an annual rate of $75.8 billion, down from $76.8 billion in the second quarter and $79.3 billion in the first. Defense spending now amounts to just over 7% of gross national product, down from nearly 10% two years ago.

In the process, thousands of highly skilled workers in defense industries have lost their jobs. Eventually, labor analysts expect that most of these people will find work in other fields. But such relocations, often necessitating extensive retraining, will take time. For the moment, many economists conclude, the shift away from defense is bound to complicate the full-employment problem.

"What we face here is not just the normal problem of getting back to full employment after a business recession, but that problem plus the problem created by the transition from defense to civilian employment," says Don R. Conlan, vice president and chief economist of Dean Witter & Co., a San Francisco-based securities firm.

For this and other reasons, Mr. Conlan says that the 4% jobless goal is "totally unrealistic." He regards 4.5% as the "absolute minimum" jobless rate that the U.S. economy can sustain, without an accompanying burst of sharp inflation. He cautions that even the 4.5% figure cannot possibly be reached, without causing new inflationary damage, until "about the spring of 1973," or well after the next Presidential election.

Jobless Construction Workers

Very large pay increases in some heavily unionized industries also add to the full-employment problem, in the view of many economists. They cite joblessness in the construction industry as an extreme example. Construction wage increases averaged 17.5% during the first nine months of this year, far above productivity gains in the industry, according to the Nixon Administration's recent "inflation alert." At the same time, however, some 324,000 construction workers, or more than a third of the construction labor force, are jobless.

Arthur Wood, president of Sears, Roebuck & Co., the country's largest retailer, recently showed how the construction wage spiral also kills jobs in other fields. "Because of the escalation of building costs," the executive said, "our company today can build three stores where a few years ago we could build four." That unbuilt fourth store, he added, "would have employed another 700 people."

Looking ahead, many economists fear that reasonably full employment will become even more difficult to achieve if a bill to restrict imports into the U.S., now pending in Congress, becomes law. "Any legislation that serves to protect labor inefficiency, as does this trade bill, also tends in the long run to cause unemployment," says an analyst at Chase Manhattan Bank, New York. "The emphasis should be on making the U.S. labor force more mobile and competitive, rather than more sheltered."

Bright Spots

Some economists note that not all developments on the labor front point toward a high jobless rate at full employment. As the 1970s roll on, the bulge in the teen-age labor force will turn into a bulge in the 25-to-34-year-old labor force, an age group where jobless rates are relatively low. At the same time, the increase in the under-25 labor force will be relatively small. The teen-agers of the mid-1970s, in large number, will be the children of persons born during the 1930s, a depression period in which the U.S. birth rate was unusually low.

Many analysts also attach considerable importance to various projects launched in recent years to provide job training and job placement for persons seeking work. "This is one area where, fortunately, the Government has been careful not to curtail programs," remarks Mr. Conlan of Dean Witter. One effort that economists feel is particularly helpful is the Labor Department's new Job Bank program. Operating in more than 50 U.S. cities, the program uses computers to alert job-seekers to job openings in a wide range of businesses.

Mr. Conlan cites another development that may eventually enable the economy to operate efficiently at lower unemployment levels: Women's Liberation. To the extent that the movement opens up more jobs in such understaffed fields as medicine to trained females, it will also tend to make full employment a more realistic goal, the economist asserts.

SUMMARY

GUIDE . . .

OF THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT

REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT

JAMES P. MITCHELL

Secretary of Labor

Commissioner
Bureau of Labor-Management Reports

The United States Congress declared that the Federal Government has the responsibility to protect employees' rights to organize, choose their own representatives, bargain collectively, and otherwise engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection.

Following the recent Senate investigations in the labor and management fields, Congress found that there had been a number of instances of breach of trust, corruption, disregard of the rights of employees and failure to observe high standards of responsibility and ethical conduct in administering the affairs of some organizations.

In order to eliminate or prevent future improper practices in the labor-management field, Congress enacted the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act on September 14, 1959.

The Act, in general, provides for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial dealings and practices of labor organizations, employers, and labor relations consultants; to prevent improper actions in these areas and in the management of trusteeships (union subordinate bodies whose right to run themselves has been suspended by parent bodies); to provide basic standards and methods for conducting elections and removing officers of labor organizations; to permit the States to regulate labor relations in those areas of labor-management conflict where the NLRB refuses or has no jurisdiction; to plug certain loopholes in the protections against secondary boycotts; to regulate organizational and recognition picketing; and to make certain other limited changes in the Taft-Hartley Law.

The Act is worded broadly so as to cover the greatest number of labor organizations although unions composed entirely of Federal, State, municipal or other public employees are not included in this law. Neither are State and local central bodies.

Title I -- Bill of Rights of Members of Labor Organizations

This Title intends to guarantee democracy in union affairs by insuring basic rights such as equality among members, freedom of speech, assembly, and the right to have access to the courts, as well as protections from arbitrary discipline and increases of dues, initiation fees, and other assessements without fair procedures. Union members may enforce these rights by civil suit in Federal court for appropriate relief.

The Title also requires unions to give any member, upon request, a copy of any collective bargaining agreement which affects the member's rights. This requirement is enforceable by the Secretary under the reporting provisions listed below. Title I is not otherwise directly enforceable by the Secretary of Labor.

Title II -- Reporting and Disclosure

This Title requires labor organizations to adopt a constitution and bylaws (if they do not have one) and file a copy with the Secretary of Labor, along with details as to how they conduct their internal affairs. It requires unions to file annual financial reports containing certain specified information "in such detail as may be necessary accurately to disclose its financial condition and operations."

The Act requires union officers, principal employees, certain employers, and persons providing labor relations consultant services to file reports on certain financial transactions, and to reveal "conflict of interest" dealings of union officers.

It requires employers to reveal what, if any, money is spent for the purpose of influencing employees in their right to join a union or choice of representation, or for learning what their employees' opinions and plans for collective action may be.

Basic financial records must be kept for five years. Wilful violation of Title II is a misdemeanor subject to $10,000 fine and up to one year imprisonment. Specific violations include knowingly making false statements of reportable facts or knowingly failing to disclose such facts and wilfully making false entries, concealing, withholding or destroying any books or records required to be kept to back up the reports. Each individual required to sign a report is personally responsible for the filing of the report and for any statements in it.

The Secretary of Labor is given the power to enforce these reporting requirements. He may take court action to see that the law is observed.

All reports are public, and all unions must make the reported information "available" to all of their members.

All unions must permit their members to examine, for just cause, all records necessary to check the accuracy of the reports. Union members may sue in Federal district courts to enforce this right.

The Act cancelled the filing requirements of the Labor Management Relations Act (Taft-Hartley) since the information required of labor unions by this Act includes generally what was required by "Taft-Hartley", except that non-Communist affidavits are no longer required.

Title III -- Trusteeships

This Title requires every labor organization which takes over supervision and control of one or more of its groups (such as an international taking over operation of a local) to file a report with the Secretary of Labor within 30 days after taking such control, and every six months thereafter. Such reports must include, among other things, the reasons for the trusteeship and a complete accounting of the financial conditions of the union under control. The same requirements for disclosure, regulations, and compliance of Title II apply to the reporting provisions of this Title and the same criminal penalties apply for wilful violations.

The Act lists the reasons for which a trusteeship may be set up and prohibits the transfer of funds of the local, other than normal "per capita" fees. Delegates from such locals cannot vote in union elections unless they are elected by secret ballot of members of the trusteed local. Upon a bona fide break-up of a trusteed union, distribution of its assets must be made in accordance with the union constitution and by-laws.

The Secretary of Labor, upon complaint of a member, or any member alone, may sue in Federal court to make unions follow these rules of the Act. However, only the Secretary may sue to enforce the reporting requirements. When the Secretary files a complaint, the court shall have exclusive jurisdiction. That is, an individual member could not also bring another suit, while the suit by the Secretary is pending.

Title IV -- Elections and Removal of Officers

The Act requires that union elections be held periodically by secret ballot, that reasonable opportunity be given for the nomination of candidates, the protection of freedom of choice in voting, due notice of elections, publication of the results of votes cast by local members, conduct of elections in line with the constitution of the union, conformity of the constitution to the Act, and preservation of election records. It prohibits the use of dues money of labor organizations, or of employer contributions to promote the candidacy of any individual.

Officers of local unions guilty of serious misconduct may be removed by the members if the Secretary of Labor finds, upon application of a member, and after a hearing, that the union's constitution and bylaws do not provide for removal. They also may be removed after a hearing and vote at the direction of the Federal district court in a suit brought by the Secretary as indicated below.

An election may be challenged by a member who has tried to remedy the situation through his union procedures and received no decision in three months, upon complaint to the Secretary of Labor, If, after investigation, the Secretary finds probable cause to believe a violation has occurred, he may bring action in Federal court to set aside the election and conduct a new election or hearing and vote upon the removal of an officer.

Existing rights and remedies to enforce a union's election bylaws are preserved before an election is held. Once the election has been held then the rights and remedies under the Act become the exclusive procedure for challenging its legality.

Title V -- Safeguards for Labor Organizations

Fiduciary duty

A fiduciary (position of trust) responsibility is imposed on officers, agents, shop stewards or other representatives of labor organizations, requiring them to hold and use monies and properties only for the benefit of the members and in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of the organization. Existing union bylaws freeing officers from any part of this responsibility are declared void as against public policy. Whenever any officer has violated the duties as laid down, and the union, upon request fails to sue, any member may sue for an accounting or other suitable relief, including the recovery of profits which might have been secured through activities in violation of these fiduciary (position of trust) duties. The Act also makes it a Federal crime for an officer or an employee of a union to embezzle or steal union funds.

Bonding

The Act requires every labor organization whose property and annual receipts exceed $5,000 to see to it that every officer, employee or other official who "handles" union funds is bonded in appropriate amounts for faithful performance of duty. It sets standards for acceptable security companies and prohibits bonding through an agent or with a company in which the union has an interest. Violations become criminal offenses under the Act. Labor Organizations are also prohibited from making loans to their officers or employees for more than $2,000.

Barring Criminals and Communists from Office

The Act prohibits Communists and persons convicted of certain listed crimes, including wilful violation of the Act's reporting requirements, from serving as union officers, agents, or employees, labor consultants, or officers or employees of employer associations dealing with unions, for five years after (1) quitting membership in the Communist Party, (2) date of conviction, or end of imprisonment, unless citizenship rights, which may have been lost, are restored or unless the Federal Parole Board determines suitability of an ex-convict to serve.

Title VI -- Miscellaneous

Investigatory power of Secretary

The Act gives the Secretary of Labor authority to investigate violations of any part of the Act, except Title I or amendments made to other statutes, whenever he thinks it necessary to find out whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision.

Preservation of existing laws

The Act makes clear that, except where it is plainly stated to the contrary, nothing in the Act shall be understood to reduce or limit rights and remedies or duties and responsibilities under other Federal or State law.

Cooperation with other agencies

The Act makes it clear that the Secretary may make arrangements for cooperation and mutual assistance with other agencies, Federal or State. The Attorney General is directed to receive from the Secretary evidence which may require criminal prosecution under this Act.

Discipline of union members

The Act gives union members a right of civil action against labor organizations for disciplining any member for exercising rights to which he is entitled. It also makes it a Federal crime to use force or violence, or threat, to interfere with the exercise by union members of rights given them under the Act.

Effective dates

The first reports of labor organizations on constitution and bylaws were required to be filed within 90 days after the Act became effective. Persons and organizations required to file financial reports must file within 90 days after the end of their fiscal year. The first report however may cover only that portion of the year after first becoming subject to the Act.

The election provisions of the Act became effective 90 days after enactment if the union constitution could lawfully be changed by its officers. If not, the effective date of the election provisions is not later than the next constitutional convention or one year, whichever is sooner. If no convention is held within one year, the governing board of the union is empowered to make the necessary changes.

Most of the changes made by the Act to the Taft-Hartley Act take effect 60 days after enactment.

Title VII --Taft-Hartley Amendments

This Title contains the amendments to the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley) which is enforced by the National Labor Relations Board.

The Act clarifies, strengthens and broadens the Board's jurisdiction and scope of action in such matters as voting by economic strikers, secondary boycotts, hot cargo agreements, organizational and recognition picketing, extortionate picketing, no-man's land situations, unlawful employer payments and discrimination.

The Department of Labor has no responsibility for investigation or enforcement in these areas.

TITLE I OF THE LANDRUM-GRIFFIN ACT
AFTER FOUR YEARS OF COURT DECISIONS

Collective Bargaining Seminar

Title I of the Landrum-Griffin Act After Four Years of Court Decisions

Background

The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 is divided into seven titles. The first title grants certain rights to members of a labor organization, the second requires the reporting of specific information by officers, employers, consultants, and labor organizations, the third provides safeguards against improper trusteeships by national organizations over their locals, the fourth lists election procedures to be followed, the fifth deals with fiduciary responsibilities of union officers, the sixth is a catch-all of miscellaneous provisions and, finally, the seventh contains amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947.

Legislation of this kind had been contemplated in the past. As early as 1947 the American Civil Liberties Union was pressing Congress to adopt a Trade Union Democracy Bill. At that time, however, Congress was concerned with collective bargaining and rebalancing the employer-union relationship. Another pressure came from the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce and other employer organizations who wanted to use anti-union public sentiment to revise labor relations laws to weaken unions. The unions themselves had tried to cope with their internal problems and passed the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Code in 1955 which provided for sanctions and expulsion for those nationals not adhering to it; however, this proved to be relatively ineffective.

The direct impetus for its passage came from the disclosures made by the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, commonly known as the McClellan Committee. The flagrant racketeering, dishonesty among officers, misuse of union funds and denial of democratic procedures to union members revealed by the Committee brought forth a storm of public protest and subsequently the passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The statute is not a complete reversal of policy, however, but has its beginnings from state court intervention and decisions dating in the 1940's. The courts had intervened on a common law basis to protect union funds, members' rights to participate in meetings and elections and to protect procedural due process in union discipline cases. Although reluctant to enter into the internal affairs of unions, the court had adopted and applied two common law principles to justify their intervening.

Under the property right doctrine, the courts reasoned that membership in a labor union must be protected against any unlawful interference. The property right extended to union benefits such as pensions and health insurance. This concept did not provide for nonmaterial benefits derived from membership such as participation rights which are equally if not more important. The second principle held that membership in a union creates a contractual relationship between the member and the union. The danger with this concept was that it guaranteed only what was provided in the constitution and if, for example, the constitution called for expulsion for criticizing union officers, the courts would carry out the contract.

Just what the Bill of Rights, Title I, has contributed to union democracy is examined through federal court cases over a four year period, covering September 1959 through December 1963. A few of the issues will be discussed, including: What a union cannot discipline its members for; Should a member who believes he has been denied the right to nominate candidates go to court or to the Secretary of Labor? Are union officers protected from the union's disciplining procedures? Should a member bring his discipline case through the union's trial body for four months before going to court? What is a fair hearing as defined by the courts? What are some of the issues not covered by the law? These are just a few of the many questions raised by the Bill of Rights.

Disciplining Union Members

Some union officers have used their power of fining and expulsion to get rid of members or groups opposed to their policies, as revealed by the investigation of the McClellan Committee. The investigation showed that union members in certain unions were disciplined for speaking up at meetings making their views known and running for office. Once they were expelled and as a result denied employment, they had no place to seek relief.

The Bill of of Rights gives a union member disciplined for exercising certain democratic rights protection through use of the courts. The premise for establishing a Bill of Rights for union members is that unions are democratic institutions. According to Archibald Cox, the enactment of the Landrum-Griffin Act became inevitable when Congress, through the Wagner Act, accepted the majority rule principle and granted exclusive representation. Clyde W. Summers has also stated that the legal status of unions compelled government legislation in order to make or keep unions responsive to their members.

Title I provides that each union member has the right, subject to reasonable rules and regulations, to nominate candidates, vote in elections, attend, vote and participate at membership meetings and meet and assemble with other members. Each member has the right to a fair hearing if disciplined and the right to sue in a federal or state court. What these rights actually mean can be seen through some of the cases that have been decided.

The courts have decided discipline cases on one of two possible principles. One theory holds that unions have the right as institutions to protect themselves from destructive internal conflict, the other holds that the individual member's rights are supreme and must be protected. The courts have adhered to the individual member's rights theory on all accounts.

In Salzhandler v. Caputo[1] the United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, New York, overruling the District Court, held that the Act was designed to protect the rights of union members to freely discuss and criticize the management of their unions and the conduct of their officers, and that even though Salzhandler's libelous statements may be the basis of a civil suit, the union cannot subject a member to any disciplinary action on a finding that his statements are libelous. The same decision was reached in Stark v. Twin City Carpenters[2] where the court found that even though a member's statement was false and bordered on slander, the speech is protected when the topic of conversation relates to union affairs. It further held > "Trials for slander cannot be used to unfairly silence those who would attempt to unseat the incumbent in power or question their conduct as union officers, or both. Unions will not be allowed, subject to what was said earlier, to coerce so called malcontents into silence with slander trials. It would not be long before everyone who disagreed with the incumbents would be silenced by heavy fines or other punishment."

The United States District Court, Southern District of New York, in Farowitz v. Musicians[3], based its decision on whether the union member's conduct had violated the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution. In this case the member had distributed a pamphlet interpreting a court's decision on the legality of a union's taxes, and urged members not to pay them. The court held that Farowitz had a right to speak his mind and spread his opinions regarding the union's collection of taxes regardless of whether the pamphlet reflected the legal situation.

Other decisions have held that picketing the local's office with signs displaying disparaging remarks about officers, although it may be mistaken criticism, is within the realm of free speech. (Gartner v. Soloner;[4] Graham v. Soloner[5])

Similar rights have been extended to formal opposition groups within an international union. When a group of officers and members formed the Local Union Reunification Committee which sought to oust President Cross of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers Union, they were disciplined. The union contended that it was within its right to take such action because the union's constitution made no provision for the organization of members formed to achieve intra-union political objectives. The court discounted the union's argument and held that their activities were directed against the present officers as distinguished from the BCW as an institution. (Moschetta v. Cross[6])

As has been seen, the courts have granted union members a wide range of freedom of speech without fear of union discipline, ranging from libelous statements to picketing, forming opposition groups and even campaigning for right-to-work laws in the noted California state case.[7] Unions will have to re-evaluate their concept of "conduct unbecoming a union member" and rationalize their disciplining.

Routes of Appeal

The bill of Rights of the Landrum-Griffin Act raised many problems, among them is Sec 101(a)(1) which guarantees every member the right to nominate candidates as one of the Equal Rights. Aside from stating this in Title I, a similar guarantee is provided for in Title IV which states that "a reasonable opportunity shall be given for the nomination of candidates and every member in good standing shall be eligible to be a candidate to hold office." Both Titles qualify the right with "subject to reasonable rules and regulations."

At first impression it appears that this is a restatement of a right and should present no dificulty. The problem arises when two entirely separate routes for enforcing these provisions are found. The right guaranteed in Title I is enforceable in the federal district courts or, as provided for in Sec 103 of Title I, in state courts, while violations of the guarantee in Title IV must be processed through the Secretary of Labor.

A number of union members have claimed a denial of their rights to nominate candidates and brought their cases to the federal district courts. In Jackson v. International Longshoremen's Association[8] a member was nominated for union office and was notified by the President of the International that as a candidate he must submit to a physical examination. When he refused and was disqualified, a few union members protested, alleging they were deprived of their right to vote for a candidate of their choice. The United States District Court, Eastern District of Louisiana disclaimed jurisdiction and held that Title IV prescribes the procedures to be followed in nominating and electing union officers. Again in Boling v. Teamsters[9] a union member contended that he was denied the right to run for the office of local president and business manager. The United States District Court, Eastern District of Tennessee held that the question was governed by Title IV.

Again in Colpo v. Highway Truck Drivers, Local 107, IBT[10] a member was nominated for office and ruled ineligible because of the Union's constitutional continuous good standing provision. The United States District Court, Delaware held that Title I includes no right to be a candidate and ruled that redress should be through the Secretary of Labor. Although a United States District Court, Western Pennsylvania District had declared an election null and void because of an omission under the union constitution, the United States Court of Appeals, Third Circuit (Philadelphia) reversed the decision. In this case, Mamula v. Steelworkers,[11] the court held that a District Court cannot enjoin or set aside an election regardless of whether the union constitution is deficient in setting forth nominating procedures for officers and that Title IV governs the question.

The exceptions came in Harvey v. Calhoon[12] and in Jackson v. National Marine Engineers Beneficial Association[13] where the members questioned the requirements for candidacy. In following the principle established, the Southern District Court of New York held that the matter should be brought under Title IV and commented,

> "It is hard to imagine any rule or requirement of candidacy, no matter how reasonable which would not similarly limit the number of people plaintiffs might nominate. If plaintiffs argument were accepted every eligibility requirement for office would fall within Title I."

The United States New York Court of Appeals, however, felt that the District Court had erred and reversed the decision. It reasoned that the members had unsuccessfully sought to nominate themselves, imposed an injunction on the election and ordered the union to submit new provisions for nomination.

The inclusion of the two separate rights to nominate appear to be for different reasons. In Title I Sec 101(a)(1) which is headed Equal Rights, it states that all members have the right to nominate a candidate, not, for example, just the Executive Board or the exclusion of a troublesome member. The decision as to who is rightfully a candidate, what the reasonable rules are which govern elections or any other question directly concerned with elections lies within the Secretary of Labor's jurisdiction. The exception to this is the Harvey case where the Court of Appeals usurped the Secretary's powers.

Officers, Included or Excluded?

The legislators who drafted the Bill of Rights were concerned about the protection of members from the power of the union officers. Title I seeks to restore and preserve the democratic rights of participation, voting and free speech to the members who they believed were being suppressed. One of the ironies that has come about over the four years since the passage of the Act is the use of the Bill of Rights by union officers who feel they are being wrongly disciplined.

The courts have been unable to cope with this unexpected use of the Act and have been divided in their opinions as to whether or not union officers are protected. Some of the court opinions have emphatically stated that the Act protects union members, not union officers, which is in fact an employer and employee relationship. This was decided in Bennett v. Hoisting Engineers,[14] Hamilton v. Guinan,[15] Burton v. Packinghouse Workers Union, Local 12[16] and Kelly v. Streho.[17]

Another theory the courts have adopted is that officers are also members and as such should be granted the same membership rights. For example, in a series of cases involving officers of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers Union, the District of Columbia Court held that the union officers who supported a campaign to oust the union President had had their rights under the Act violated when the union expelled and removed them from office. The court ordered the reinstatement of the Executive Assistant to the President, because of his union membership, while denying reinstatement to the Public Relations Director because he was not a member of the union. These decisions were made in Moschetta v. Cross.[18]

The same decision was reached in King v. Grand Lodge, IAM[19] where six representatives appointed by the International President were terminated for supporting the wrong candidate for the office of General Secretary Treasurer. The union constitution provided that the President have full control over the Representatives and granted them an appointment document in effect for one year unless revoked. The six brought their case before a United States District Court. The Court ruled that there is an inextricable link between each plaintiff's status as a member and as an employee or officer of the union and that depriving a member of employment in the organization he is a member of is denying that link. The court went on to say that even if there is no link, depriving a member of employment is effective discipline and the discipline of supporting a losing candidate violates the purpose of the statute which is to protect free elections. The case was to be appealed.

The courts in deciding whether officers come under the Act have considered whether they were acting as members or as officers when they were disciplined. Such a theory holds that an officer has a dual function, that of an administrator and that of a member in a democratic institution. It is perhaps this dichotomy of roles that the courts will try to preserve. This distinction has been carried too far, as in the Moschetta case, and will no doubt result in more problems.

Exhaustion of Remedies

The exhaustion of internal union remedies provision found in Sec 101

(a)(4) has given rise to a variety of interpretations. The section states

> "that any such member may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures (but not to exceed a four-month lapse of time) within such organization, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof."

Some court decisions have held that the four month period is a mandatory provision to be observed by union members who should not seek judicial relief until internal remedies have been tried and a four month period has lapsed. McCann v. Building Service Employees,[20] Acevedo v. Bookbinders, Local 25,[21] Johnson v. UAW,[22] Sanders v. Local 559, Carpenters.[23] Members have claimed that to go through the union procedures would result in futile action. Union members in Tomko v. Hilbert[24] made such an allegation. However, the court held that alleging futility could be measured only by initial resort to procedures embodied in the union constitution. In another case, Harris v. ILA, Local 1291,[25] a United States District Court held that union members may not avoid the union constitution by claiming possible long delays in processing a disciplined case, where there have been no attempts to exhaust available remedies within the union or any showing that such attempts would be in vain. The Appeals Courts held that as long as there is a likelihood that some decision will be forthcoming within a four month period and the aggrieved member has not shown that he will be harmed by being required to seek such a decision, the purposes of the Act require a member to give the internal grievance procedure the chance to operate which Congress deemed to be reasonable.

The court ruled in Deluhery v. Marine Cooks Union[26] that the exhausting of administrative remedies is not absolute as a condition to relief by the court, but that each case should be considered on its merits. It reasoned that if the courts are to review the first steps in administrative procedures taken by the union and enjoin them if error is found, then there would be no need to provide for review and appellate procedures in union constitutions. The court said that it is only when the organization violates its rules for appellate review or upon a showing that it would be futile to invoke them that the pursuit of internal relief is excused.[27]

The deviation came in Detroy v. American Guild of Variety Artists where an appeals court found that in view of the legislative history of the section, Congress had no intention of establishing the absolute duty to exhaust union remedies. The statute provides that any member of a labor organization "may be" required to exhaust internal union remedies not that they "must" exhaust them. In the Appeals Court opinion, if it is probably that the union will grant no award or that its award will be so speculative that there is great likelihood court proceedings will be instituted anyway, then the court should render a decision. A court will also rule that exhaustion of remedies is not necessary if there are multiple appellate agencies, infrequent meetings and the absence of time limits for a decision in the constitution.

Two opposite opinions have been rendered by two different United States Appeals Courts but the latest decision in 1963 held that internal union remedies must be used. The 1963 decision indicates that the courts have recognized that the union's disciplining processes will be eroded if members are free to by-pass them.

A Fair Hearing

The authors of the rights section included a guarantee to any member fined, suspended, expelled or otherwise disciplined, except for nonpayment of dues, the right to be served with the specific charges, given a reasonable time to prepare his defense and be afforded a full and fair hearing. Just how far the courts have stepped into the internal union disciplining procedure can be illustrated by a few cases.

On the question of the union basing its decision on sufficient evidence, the courts in all cases but one have ruled that it was not the duty of the courts to weigh the evidence of the case. In Phillips v. Teamsters, Local 560[28] the court held that it was not authorized to substitute its judgment for that of the union body. The reverse decision was reached by the United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, New York, in Vars v. Boilermakers[29] which held that although the courts may be without power to review matters of credibility, the court is justified in insuring that the union's findings have some foundation of evidence.

A number of cases have decided just what a member's rights are before a trial board. A member who is present at the hearing before the trial body, represented by fellow union members, confronted by witnesses, calling witnesses in his behalf and receiving a ruling not fraudulent, arbitrary or capricious is considered to have received a full and fair hearing. (Robinson v. Boilermakers, Local 104;[30] Anderson v. Brotherhood of Carpenters[31]) The right to be represented by counsel also doesn't apply to union members in hearings before their unions as decided in Smith v. General Truck Drivers, Local 467.[32] The court ruled in Parks v. IBEW[33] on the question of an International President's being both prosecutor and judge. In the court's opinion, the separation of functions is not an absolute due process prerequisite for fair administrative proceedings.

The courts rely on the union's own constitution which provides for the disciplining procedure. As long as the guarantees for a fair hearing are set forth and the union adheres to its own rules the courts will not interfere. The possibility remains that the courts may frequently step into the trial board's decisions to see that along with democratic procedures, the decisions reached reflect impartiality. In Salzhandler v. Caputo[34] the court commented:

> "The Trial Board in the instant case consisted of union officials, not judges. It was a group to which the delicate problems of truth and falsehood, privilege and fair comment were not familiar."

Just as unions ask for an impartial arbitrator to decide labor-mangement disputes, they may have to formulate steps for internal disputes ending with a neutral's decision, similar to the UAW Public Review Board.

Not Covered by Landrum-Griffin

A number of union members have brought their cases to the federal courts which involve issues unrelated to the rights guaranteed in the Act. Benjamin Aaron, along with other critics of the Bill of Rights, has pointed out that the outstanding defect is one of omission; that is, no protection is made for individuals who want to join a union. There is no protection made against discriminatory activities of some unions. An individual, eligible for membership, who applies but is not accepted does not have a cause of action under the statute. (Moyahan v. Pari-Mutuel Employees Guild)[35] A United States Court of Appeals, however, did hold that a member who had fulfilled all the union constitutional requirements for transfer to a new local was a member of that local and entitled to "equal rights" under the law, even though the local had declined to grant him admission. The courts are not inclined to decide who is or is not qualified for membership since the rights in the statute are guaranteed to members only and do not create rights where none had existed. Other legislation would be necessary to enforce non-discrimination by unions.

Some members have sought a right to vote on collective bargaining contracts or provisions. The courts have held that the right to vote on collective bargaining agreements was not a right guaranteed in the Act. (Orchestra Committee v. Musicians Local 4)[36] Voting on pension plans and seniority rights is also not mandatory under the rights . (Davis v. Washington State Council of Carpenters;[37] Horn v. Amalgamated Association of Street Employees)[38]

Union members have also gone to court to claim discrimination by the union in job referrals. In Green v. Local 705, Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders,[39] and Baruncia v. Local 55, Hatters[40] the courts have held that the question of job referrals comes under Sec 8(a)(3) of the Taft-Hartley Act which is under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. In Lucas v. Kenny,[41] a case brought by a union member failing to receive job assignments, the court held that the matter was unrelated to the guarantees provided in the Bill of Rights and should be decided on the basis of what is provided for in the collective bargaining agreement. Only in an early case, Johnson v. Local 58, IBEW,[42] did a court hold that job discrimination interferes just as interference with the right to assemble, threat of physical violence or any other method of interference. The later cases have held that job referral is not a specified right in the statute and the route to relief is through the NLRB.

CONCLUSION

The greatest single accomplishment of the Bill of Rights has been to give each union member a set of rights which he can exercise, and to guarantee fair disciplining procedures to be secured through the courts if necessary. Title I reassures the member that he is entitled to speak at union meetings, assemble with other members, express his views and vote if he chooses to do so.

The cases have shown that the courts are ready to uphold a wide range of freedoms of speech and will reprimand the unions for disciplining members exercising those rights. The courts have held that members can make slanderous statements about members or officers, picket union offices and have sanctioned opposition groups within union.

As a result of these court decisions, there is a need for unions to take a new look at their concept of "conduct unbecoming a union member," a common phrase in many union constituttions. The unions will have to enumerate the acts which are subject to discipline, have time limits for decisions, streamline their appellate procedures, and provide for an internal judicial system to handle discipline cases ending with an impartial arbitrator. Unions will have to learn to do unto their members as they would have industry do unto them.

Neither the legislative history nor the Act clarifies two important issues, the exhaustion of remedies provision and officers' rights. As was pointed out, a number of decisions held that the four-month hearing requirement was mandatory before starting court proceedings. Late decisions sought to introduce flexibility into the four month rule by judging each case on its merits. The latest appeals decision has held that the four-month requirement should be strictly followed to give the union's internal trial machinery a chance to operate. Thus, the courts have made a complete circle in their decisions.

The courts have devised their own rules as to whether union officers are protected from discipline for expressing their views. The Act speaks of members' rights and makes no mention of officers. In a few cases the courts have decided that the Act was not intended to cover officers. In later decisions the courts have held that where officers are members their rights will be protected just as those of rank and file members.

A fair hearing before a union trial body should give a member sufficient notice, allow him to have witnesses in his behalf, cross-examine adverse witnesses and receive a fair decision. If a member feels he has received a prejudiced decision, based on insufficient evidence, then takes his case to court, the court will review the trial board's decision and render a decision on the facts as it evaluates them.

Both Titles I and IV grant members the right to nominate candidates; however, the Title I provision guarantees general over-all rights while Title IV specifies election procedures. Violations of the Bill of Rights are brought to federal courts, whereas violations of Title IV are processed with the Secretary of Labor. When union members complain that they were denied their rights to nominate candidates for office, the courts held that Title IV governs and the route for relief outlined in that section should be followed.

The greatest defect of the Bill of Rights is the omission of a provision guaranteeing each applicant for union membership the right to be admitted without discrimination as to race, religion, origin or sex. The Act, as it now stands, protects those already members and the courts will not go beyond the wording of the statute.

Thus, once members are given rights which are protected by law, it becomes each member's duty to exercise them. Apathy towards democracy on the grass roots level can breed autocracy on the national level if opposition withers.

The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 is divided into seven titles. The first title grants certain rights to members of a labor organization, the second requires the reporting of specific information by officers, employers and labor organizations, the third provides safeguards against improper trusteeships by national organizations over their locals, the fourth lists election procedures to be followed, the fifth deals with fiduciary responsibilities of union officers, the sixth is a catch-all of miscellaneous provisions and finally the seventh are amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947.

The question to be asked is why was such a statute passed. In searching for the reasons, it is found that as early as 1947 the American Civil Liberties Union was pressing Congress to adopt a Trade Union Democracy bill. At that time, however, Congress was concerned with collective bargaining and rebalancing the employer-union relationship. Another pressure came from the National Association of Manufacturers, the U. S. Chamber of Commerce and other employer organizations who wanted to use antipunion public sentiment to revise labor relations laws to weaken the unions. The unions themselves had tried to cope with their internal problems and passed the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Code in 1955 which provided for sanctions and expulsion for these nationals not adhering to it, however, this proved to be relatively ineffectual. The direct impetous for its passage came from the disclosures made by the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, commonly known as the McClellan Committee. The flagrant racketerring, dishonesty among officers, misuse of union funds and denial of democractic procedures to union members revealed by the Committee brought forth a storm of public protest and subsequently the passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The statute is not a complete reversal of policy, however, but has its beginnings from state court intervention and decisions dating in the 1940's. The courts had intervened on a common law basis to protect union funds, members' rights to participate in meetings and elections and to protect procedural due process in union discipline cases. Although reluctant to enter into the internal affairs of union, the courts adopted and applied two common law principles to justify their intervening. Under the property right doctrine, the courts reasoned that membership in a labor union must be protected against any unlawful interference. The property right extended to union benefits such as pensions and health insurance, however this concept did not provided for nonmaterial benefits derived from membership, equally if not more important, such as participation rights. Secondly they held that membership in a union creates a contractual relationship between the member and the union and improper discipline, for example, would constitute a breach of that contract. The union's constitution and bylaws provided the basis for the courts' decisions.

With this brief background, a closer view of the Landrum-Griffin as seen through the eyes of the federal courts is necessary. It is by studying each case that we see the law develop. Have the dire predictions of chaos and a flooding of the courts by repressed members held true? Or on the other hand has there been only a few cases because of the costs involved in litigation, or members' apathy or lack of knowledge about the law? One attorney has maintained that Congress in its wisdom legislated confusion by not preempting state action which will promote non-uniformity. With a multiplicity of courts and a diversity of procedures uncertainty and confusion will be the main and lasting legacies of Congressional intent. By in large the prediction of chaos has been unfounded except in two, but important, areas. One area deals with the exhaustion of internal remedies and the other is the question of whether the act covers officers.

The exhaustion of internal remedies means that a member is required to process his complaint against the union or its officers within the union's own reviewing machinery for at least four months. If after that time a member hasn't received an answer, he may take the union to a U. S. District Court. Directly related to this problems is the union's due process procedure. What is a full and fair hearing? Is merely asserting futility and unreasonably long delays sufficient reason to by-pass the union's established procedures? Should a court reverse a union's decision on the merits of the case?

The courts have split on the question of whether the four month exhaustion of internal remedies is an absolute requirement, however, the later cases have tended to judge the case on the facts presented. They interpret Sec 101 (a)(4) as meaning "may" not must. The standard in intervening on a cases by case basis becomes a question of irreparable damage or futility. As was pointed out in Harris v. ILA, Local 1291 how is futility to be determined if the member refuses and is allowed to by pass the union machinery. The courts' threatening to intervene no doubt will be an incentive to the unions to streamline their procedures, yet is it fair not to give the union at least four months to adjudicate a case. It might be noted that many courts would be hard put to match such a time limit.

The courts, in general, have held that they will not review the facts of a case, but merely see that procedural due process was granted.

A Court of Appeals, in Vars v. Boilermakers, held that the courts are justified in insuring that the union's findings are based on sufficient evidence. If this were to become the generally adopted principle for the court's to follow, the union's decision would be dependent upon the court's coming to the same conclusion. In Parks v. IBEW the Appeals Court held that courts should not step in by establishing ad hoc standards in the pursuit of democracy.

The procedural due process established by the act provides that a member be served with written specific charges, be given a reasonable time to prepare his defense and be afforded a full and fair hearing. This has been interpreted to mean that a member charged by the union has the right to be confronted by his accusers, be permitted to cross examine them and adverse witnesses, be represented by fellow union members and call witnesses in his defense. Robinson v. Boilermakers, L cal 104, Anderson v. Brotherhood of Carpenters. The guide posts for the courts are the unions' constitutions and bylaws, with reasonable time limits and procedures neither capriously nor discriminately applied. If the unions do not violate their own rules, the courts are generally satisfied and will not intervene.

The question of the coverage of officers in their union positions is one of the issues that the Supreme Court should decide to establish a principle and clearly define their rights, if any exist. Thus far the lower courts have been inconsistent in their rulings. The courts have held that union officers are not protected under the act and have dismissed the case for lack of jurisdiction. In other cases the courts have held that where officers are also members of the union they are accorded all the rights and privileges of membership which includes the right to support candidates of their choice King v. Grand Lodge, IAM, Sheridan v. Carpenters, Local 626. The line between officer membership and non-membership was drawn even sharper in Moschetta v. Cross where one officer, the Public Relations Director, was not reinstated by the court and the Executive Assistant to the President was because of his membership. The courts also consider whether they were acting as members or as officers when they were disciplined. Such a theory holds that an officer has a dual function, that of an administrator and that of a member in a democractic institution. It is perhaps this dichotomy of roles that the courts will try to preserve. This interpretation will no doubt create more problems, for the opinions of an officer, whether elected or appointed, carry more weight with the general membership than the views expressed by other members.

Some decisions have made clear what the Act does and does not cover. There is no provision in the statute requiring a union to accept into membership a qualified candidate. A union cannot discipline a member for libelous or slanderous statements. Neither job rights nor voting on collective bargaining contracts within the scope of the Act. Questions relating to candidacy, nominations and elections should be brought before the Secretary of Labor. The notable exception to this is Harvey v. Calhoon where the Court of Appeals ruled that the union's constitution deprived members the right to nominate themselves.

Many irrelevant cases have been brought under the Bill of Rights by dissatisfied members, some with very legitimate complaints. The courts are narrowly interpreting these provisions and a wise union member seeking judicial relief should be sure that his complaint is specifically stated in the statute.

Title I - Bill of Rights of Members of Labor Organizations

Sec. 101 (a)(1) Equal Rights. --Every member of a labor organization shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization to nominate candidates, to vote in elections or referendums of the labor organization, and to attend membership meetings, and to participate in the deliberations and voting upon the business of such meetings, subject to reasonable rules and regulations in such organization's constitution and by laws.

One of the early cases under this section was brought to a Southern New York District Court by members of a local who alleged their rights had been denied. In McFarland v. Building Material Teamster, Local 282, members made a motion at a union meeting to relieve the business agent, who had been indicted for bribery and extortion, to relieve him from functioning in an official capacity. The meeting was adjourned without a motion for adjournment and without a vote on the motion then on the floor. The court held that there was no reason for adjourning without taking a vote on the motion and directed that a meeting should be held within twenty days to vote on the suspension of the business agent. (1)

Rizzo v. Ammond involved the rights of members to vote for delegates to the International Convention. This local was under a trusteeship. The court, in this instance, decided that the plaintiffs should have resorted to the remedies for review of a complaint outlined in the International Constitution and Bylaws and that if the members were alleging improper conduct of the trusteeship, then the complaint should be directed to the Secretary of Labor. (2)

The right of a union member to transfer from one local to another is not protected by Sec 101 (a)(1) as decided by the U. S. District Court of New Jersey. The court reasoned that a member in good standing of a labor organization refers only to persons who are or have been members of a specific organization and the right to transfer to or from an organization is not included in Sec 101 (a)(1). (3)

On appeal, the Third Circuit of Philadelphia reversed the decision on the grounds that a union member who had fulfilled all the constitutional requirements for transfer to a new local was a member of that local and was entitled to "equal rights" under the law, even though the local had declined to grant him formal admission and recognition. (4)

One of the rights questioned by union members was that of voting on a pension plan referendum called for by the collective bargaining agreement. In Davis v. Washington State Council of Carpenters union members complained that they were denied the right to vote on the referendum. The Washington District Court decided that this right was not covered by the Act and since the referendum was set up prior to the enactment of Landrum-Griffin, it would not apply. The court further stated that the relief sought, that of restraining the actions of a joint bargaining committee of employers and employees, can not be brought under the Act because the committee involved is not a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.(5)

A similar case dealing with changes in the seniority provisions in collective bargaining was brought before the Eastern Michigan Court. The membership claimed that the change was made without the membership's approval. They complained that at a subsequent meeting a vote was taken to ratify the change, but it mislead the members as to its importance. In judging this case, the court held that Sec 101(a)(1) deals with equal rights and guarantees specific rights to union members and cannot be used as a catch-all provision for dissatisfied union members. (6)

A U. S. District Court, Northern District of Illinois decided that members of a local union were not entitled to an order directing their international and its president to issue a charter. It held that the court had no jurisdiction in the absence of oppression or fraud and the members' failure to exhaust their internal remedies. (7)

A Northern District of Ohio Court decided a case brought before it by union members of a symphony orchestra who alleged discrimination on not being permitted to ratify or reject collective bargaining agreements made on their behalf. They claimed that other union musicians vote at local union meetings on wage scales. The court stated that Sec 101 (a)(1) rights are limited to those specifically set forth and that the Act was not intended to require unions to submit for a vote all matters to the membership. The Act only requires that all members be accorded equal rights to vote in elections and to participate, deliberate and vote on business at union meetings.(8) On review the Sixth Circuit Court of Cincinnati held that the right to vote on collective bargaining agreements was not a right guaranteed in the Act and affirmed the lower court's decision. It also said that there is a difference between the right of union members to approve or reject a wage scale and the right to approve or reject a collective bargaining agreement. In one case, the musicians work under conditions that they have unilaterally agreed upon, in the other, they work under a contract with an employer. Under a collective bargaining agreement, the employer contracts with the representative of the employees. (9)

Sec 101 (a)(1) gave rise to a complaint by union members of a district which had not been invited to send delegates to the National Convention. The Northern District Court of Alabama held that the union constitution provision barring participation in conventions by district delegates had been known and in effect for more than twenty years and that members had failed to pursue administrative remedies as provided for by the act while showing no reason for failing to do so. Further, union members are not entitled to a temporary injunction against the holding of the convention. The district, under the union constitution is in provisional status and is specifically barred from participation in the convention. The Act is designed to protect the right to vote and participate where that right exists and is not designed to confer the right to vote and participate where rights had not previously existed. (10)

What rights exist for Class B members remained undecided by a Southern New York District Court decision. A Class B member alleged he was denied the right to vote for the President, Vice President, Secretary-Treasurer, certain of the Executive Board members and other officers of the local union. Class B, semi-skilled, and unskilled workers, nominate candidates for Second Vice President, Recording Secretary, five Executive Board members and Sergeant at-Arms. The court decided that the court does not have jurisdiction to set aside the eledtion because relief should first have been sought through the union and post election remedies can be obtained only through the Secretary of Labor. (11)

A number of cases have come before the courts where union members seek a right to candidacy and union office. The question becomes one of Title I over which Federal Courts have jurisdiction or Title IV where the Secretary of Labor has jurisdiction. One such case came before the Delaware District Court. A union member alleged he was nominated as a candidate for the office of Recording Secretary and that the election committee rule him ineligible on the grounds that the International Constitution states that a candidate shall have been in continuous good standing for a 24 month period prior to nominations to be eligible for candidacy. The union member in this case had been late on two occasions with monthly dues payments. The court decided that nowhere among the rights enumerated in Title I is the right to be a candidate. Redress for a post election remedy is found in Sec 402, through the Secretary of Labor and Sec 403 permits pre-election redress in State courts. (12)

In another case, Jackson v. International Longshoremen's Association, a union member was nominated for the office of President and was notified by the International President that he must submit to a physical examination. When he refused, protesting that such a requirement did not exist in the Constitution or By laws, the International President disqualified him. Union members brought this case to the Eastern District of Louisiana contending they were denied their right to vote for the candidate of their choice. The court held that while Title I guarantees union members an equal opportunity to vote Title IV prescribes the procedures to be followed in nominating and electing union officers. In the case at hand, neither the right to nominate nor the right to vote was deprived. Whether the disqualification was proper is a matter to be resolved by Title IV provisions enforced by the Secretary of Labor. (13)

In Harvey v. Calhoon, union members complained of the requirements for nominations to office. The same question also was decided in Jackson v. National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association.(14) The members contended that the requirements infringed upon their rights to nominate candidates as protected by Sec 101 (a)(1). The requirements for candidacy were: 1. The only candidate whom a member may nominate for any office is himself. 2. The practice of the District prohibits a member from nominating himself for more than one District Office. 3. The National Constitution of the union further restricts a member's right to nominate by providing that no member other than an incumbent official is eligible for nominations or election to a full-time elective office unless he has been a member for five years and has served 180 days or more of sea time on vessels ~~covered by~~ covered by Collective bargaining agreements with the national organization or its subsidiary bodies in each of two of the three years preceding nomination. The national constitution further provides that a candidate for the office of District President must have previously been elected and served as a full time and paid official of an organization affiliated with the national body. The union members challenged the reasonableness of the sea time requirement because they felt they had a right to nominate someone who did not meet that standard. The Southern District Court of New York held: "It is hard to imagine any rule or requirement of candidacy, no matter how reasonable which would not similarly limit the number of people plaintiffs might nominate. If plaintiffs' argument were accepted every eligibility requirement for office would fall within Title I." The court further held that the matters complained of would be tested under Title IV procedures. The complaint, therefore, was dismissed. (15) The case was taken before the New York Court of Appeals which decided that the complaint was included under Sec 101 (a)(1) claiming jurisdiction and reversing the lower court's decision. The Court of Appeals reasoned that the union members unsuccessfully sought to nominate themselves and in that sense the union had deprived members of the equal rights and privileges to nominate guaranteed by Sec 101 (a)(1) . The court ordered an injunction against the holding of the election under the existing Constitution and Bylaws and directed the District Court to require the union to submit new provisions as to the right to nominate that meet Sec 101 (a)(1) standards. (16)

The former case was decided by the Court of Appeals on November 1963, a similar case was decided by an Eastern District of Tennessee Court on December 1963. A union member contended that he was denied the right to run for the office of President and Business Manager. The court held that the eligibility to be a candidate is provided for and governed by Title IV, Sec 401 (e) which is enforced by the Secretary of Labor. The union member also claimed damages but the court held that damages are not recoverable for denial of the right to be a candidate since an election is a fortuitous event. (17)

In a series of cases, Mamula v Local 1211, Steelworkers, a number of issues were raised and decided. The first case brought before the Western Pennsylvania District Court on October 1961, involved the International's constitution which did not provide any specific method for selection by local unions of nominees for office. The court concluded that under the constitution there was no effective way for union members to exercise equal rights to nominate or be nominated as a candidate for District Director. The election was declared null and void. (18) The Court of Appeals, Third Circuit (Philadelphia) disagreed with this decision and held that a District Court cannot enjoin or set aside a union election regardless of whether the union constitution is deficient in setting forth nominating procedures for officers. Title IV governs procedures for nominating and electing officers. The Appeals Court reversed the decision and directed the District Court to dismiss the complaint. (19)

The second case decided in Febraary 1962, involved an officer who was removed from office and barred from holding office for five years. The court held that the procedural safeguards of the Landrum-Griffin Act which applied to disciplining members did not apply to removing officers, however the restriction on the number of years should not be imposed arbitrarily. (20)

The third case came to court when Mamula filed a complaint charging the union with interfering with his right to be a candidate for local union Presidency. The union determined that he was ineligible and refused to include his name on the official ballot. The court decided that Title I does not protect a member's right to run for office nor can a district pourt pass on the validity of an election before or after the election since there is a remedy in Title IV. (21) A June 1962, decision found that the Federal Courts do not have jurisdiction over a local union officer who had been removed from office for five years. The court said that such discipline was imposed on Mamula as an officer and not as a union member, hence not covered by the Act. It was his duty to follow title IV procedures. (22)

A Southern District Court of California decided that a union member complaining of of being recommended for expulsion for speaking against the union administration must first exhaust his internal remedies and was not entitled to a temporary injunction.

In Deluhery v. Marine Cooks Union, the court held that in determining whether or not the exhaustion requirement should be imposed, the preferable approach is to proceed on a case by case basis considering each case on its facts. (23) The same case came before the court more than a year later, on December 1962, however, his case was brought up under Sec 101 (a)(5). Deluhery sought to prevent the union from carrying out the Trial Committee's recommendation unless he was afforded a reasonable time to prepare his defense. The court concurred with the previous decision that administrative remedies must be exhausted unless such remedies are futile or result in irreparable injury. The courts cannot and should not intervene in any and every intra-union dispute. The rule is well established that the exhausting of administrative remedies is not absolute as a condition to relief by the courts but that each case should be considered on its merits. If the courts are to review the first steps in administrative procedures taken by the union and enjoin them if error is found, then there would be no need to provide for review and appellate procedures in union constitutions. The court emphatically said that it is only when the organization violates its rules for appellate review or upon a showing that it would be futile to invoke them that the pursuit of internal relief is excused. (24)

The following four cases deal with ballots for local and national elections. In the first case Beckman v. Local 46, Iron Workers Union, members complained that the ballot box was tampered with. The union maintained that the court lacked jurisdiction to restrain them from counting the ballots or ordering a new election and that the remedy was contained in Title IV. The court held that the disappearance incident of the ballot box might have lead to the removal of ballots cast by the members or the substitution of another box. In either case, the rank and file members of the union would be denied the right to vote. Union members need not wait for the counting of the ballots and seek a remedy under Title IV, since an appeal to the Secretary of Labor is not the only method of redress. (25)

In Yochim v. Caputo union members sought to protect the voting rights of members against flooding of the election by non member votes. As a result of their action, they were fined and threathened with further retaliatory punishment. The court held that in view of the fact that, Sec 101 (a)(4) and 411 (a)(4) preserves the right of a union member to sue without interference by the labor organization and the claim that all remedies have been exhausted, then a pre injunction is not only proper but necessary. The court further held that those fines already paid were to be returned. (26)

Members of one of the locals composing the Suffolk County District Council of Carpenters sought to enjoin the holding of an election for Secretary-Treasurer and Business Agent. They claimed the use of the ballot form that required the voter to write in his choice destroyed the secrecy of the ballot and the failure to require all members to produce their due books or work cards as identification did not safeguard the votes. Wayfield, who brought the case to court, claimed he was nominated to the office of Secretary-Treasurer by a local other than his own, then denied the right to have the District Council distribute his campaign literature. The court decided that on the record presented, a preliminary injunction was not warranted, a write-in ballot did not dissolve the secrecy of the election and that Wayfield was not a candidate and could not appeal to Sec 401 (c). (27)

Balloting on the Machinists' Union Constitution came into question. The court held in Young v. Hayes that a ballot on proposed amendments to the constitution was defective. The ballot presented forty-seven amendments as one proposition and was not in accord with the union's own constitution which stated that "each subject" was to be "voted upon separately." The court also object to the ballot heading which stated "These changes made mandatory through passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act." The court issued an injunction restraining the international from putting the

Employment rights are not included with the scope of the Landrum-Griffin Act as decided by three different courts. In Burris v. IBT members of the union heeded a strike called by the union in violation of the contract. The employer replaced the strikers and refused to reinstate them. When the replaced strikers requested the local officers to institute unfair labor practice charges, which they failed to do, the protesting strikers were disciplined. The union induced them to accept honorable withdrawal cards and were blacklisted from employers where the union had agreements, thus depriving them of employment. The strikers sought damages. The court decided that nothing within the Act or in the legislative history of the Act indicates or specifies that punitive damages are an appropriate relief. The Western District Court of North Carolina held that cases decided under the Labor-Management Relations Act followed the theory that absent express Congressional intention, punitive damages were not recoverable when invoking the jurisdiction of the court on a federally created cause of action. (29)

In Baruncia v. Local 55, Hatters, a member in good standing complained that she was able, ready and willing to work at her trade and was denied employment for two years. The court held that the facts alleged did not come within the meaning of Sec 101 (a)(1). The union member had instituted a complaint under Sec 8(a)(3) of the Taft-Hartley Act through the labor board but when her case was rejected and she did not appeal to the General Counsel, she had abandoned the administrative remedy available. (30)

A case was brought before the Eastern District of Michigan Court which involved charges of extortion, violence, intimidation, job discrimination in favor of those who paid to attend a waitress school. The member sought an injunction against beating and assulting plaintiffs and a placing of the hiring hall in receivership. Judgment was in favor of the union on the grounds that the charges made were not included under Title I and the question of job referral came under National Labor Relations Board's jurisdiction. (31)

The paying of dues to a union does not ipso facto give a person the privileges of membership, the Eastern District Court of Michigan decided. In this case a member was suspended from the union in 1953 and claimed the restoration of all privileges, benefits and rights of a member. He alleged continuing membership because his employer continued to deduct union dues from his wages which were sent to the union. The court held that the employee was required to sign an authorization card and approved of the continuing deductions because no charges are brought against the employer. The Landrum-Griffin Act does not apply to events occurring prior to the effective date of the Act. The court also said that his allegation that the union has not fairly represented him and has caused him pecuniary damages would be a case for the NLRB. (32)

Other cases involving the employment relationship were decided. In Johnson v. UMW, District 50 employee sought an injunction against the union and the employer to prevent them from paying out severance benefits to some, but not all, of the employer's workers. The court decided that it did not have jurisdiction of action absent a showing of an exhaustion of remedies within the union.(33)

A case came before the U.S. Districtt Court, Southern District of New York, where a member asked to be reinstated to his prior union status and to his regular job. In Cafero v. Typographical Union, the plaintiff based his action on the theory that the union regulations affected the employee's priority status and caused him to lose his job in violation of the Act. The court held that his case was devoid of facts and did not sufficiently allege a violation of the Act by the union. The Act deals only with the relationship between a union and its members. The case dismissed. (34)

Moynahan v. Pari-Mutuel Employees Guild involved an individual who was eligible and applied for membership in the union but was not accepted. The Southern District Court of California held he had no cause of action against the union under the Landrum-Griffin since the Act grants rights to union members. (35)

Conclusions on Sec 101 (a)(1)

On reviewing the cases thus far decided under Sec 101 (a)(1) some noticeable discrepencies are found in court interpretations. In deciding the questions of the right to candidacy, nominations and elections, the courts have held that Title IV governs which provides that relief be sought through the Secretary of Labor. Such a decision was reached in Colpo v. Highway Truck Drivers, Local 107, IBT (12), Jackson v. ILA (13) Boling v. Teamsters (17), the U.S. Court of Appeals, Third Circuit (Philadelphia) in Mamula v. U.S. Steelworkers (19), and Mamula v. Local 1211, Steelworkers (21).

The exception rendered by the U.S. District Court of Appeals, Second Circuit (New York) on November 1963. It is in Harvey v. Calhoon (16) the court ruled that it has jurisdiction over voting qualifications of the members. The Appeals Court believed that the limitations deprived members of the right to nominate themselves. The U.S. District Court, Southern District of New York first hearing the case, seemed to answer the question when it stated that any rule of candidacy limits the nominations.

The decisons have held that there is no right entitling a person to become a union member, rather unions are free to selection their own members. The decision made by the U.S. Court of Appeals, Third Circuit of Philadelphia in Hughes v. Local 11, Ironworkers[4] gave a person the right to join even though the union had refused him. The court relied on the phrase "equal rights". This decision is in contract to Moynahan v. Pari-Mutuel Guild (35) which held that this provision applies only to those already members and that the specific rights outlined are the only rights available. Along with this theory, the paying of dues does not automatically give a right to the privileges of membership, as held in Knox v. UAW (32)

The courts are in agreement that members are not given the specific right to vote on collective bargaining contracts as decided in Davis v. Washington State Council of Carpenters (5), Horn v. Amalgamated Association of Street Employees (6), Orchestra Committee v. Musicians, Local 4 (8) and (9).

Job rights are not within the perview of the Act as decided by Baruncia v. Local 55, Hatters (30), Green v. Local 705, Hotel and Restaurant Employee's and Bartenders Union (31) and Cafero v. Typographical Union (34).

This section is often used by dissatisfied members who have a grievance against the union, however, unless they are stated in the Section, the court has refused jurisdiction, as has been stated in Horn v. Amalagmated Employees (6) this section is not a catch-all provision. A member whose grievance is not covered by the Landrum-Griffin or the National Labor Relations Act will have recourse only through the union itself.

Sec 101 (a)(2) Freedom of Speech and Assembly. -- Every member of any labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with other members; and to express any views, arguments, or opinions; and to express at meetings of the labor organization his views, upon candidates in an election of the labor organization or upon any business properly before the meeting, subject to the organization's established and reasonable rules pertaining to the conduct of meetings: Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to his refraining from conduct that would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligations.

This section grants specific rights to members, however the limits of these rights are determined by the cases coming to the courts. The scope of such rights was determined in one such case Salzhandler v. Caputo. In this case Salzhandler prepared and distributed an leaflet untruthfully attacking Webman, the President and business agent of a local of the crime of larceny. Caputo, President of District Council 9, appointed a Trial Board to hear the charges against Salzhandler who received proper notice and a fair hearing. The Trial Committee found him guilty, removed him as Financial Secretary and prohibited him from attending meetings, voting or being a candidate for office for five years. His rights and obligations as a member were continued in other respects. He filed an appeal with the General Executive Board. The Southern District Court of New York held that the limitation in Sec 101 (a)(1) & (2) make the equal rights provision subject to reasonable rules and regulations in the Union Constitution and Bylaws and provide that nothing in the freedom of speech and assembly provisions should be interpreted to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution. The attack which was circulated was in violation of the Union Constitution forbidding libeling, slandering or in any other manner abusing fellow members or officers of local unions unless its truth was established. The court recommended that he exhaust his internal union remedies and denied a preliminary injunction. (1)

The New York Court of Appeals rendered a decision on the case during April 1963. It held that the Landrum-Griffin was designed to protect the rights of union members to freely discuss and criticize the management of their unions and the conduct of their officers. "The Trial Board in the instant case consisted of union officials, not judges. It was a group to which the delicate problems of truth and falsehood, privilege and fair comment were not familiar." The court continued by saying that it is immaterial whether Salzhandler spoke truthfully or not. Although libelous statements may be the basis of a civil suit, the union may not subject a member to any disciplinary action on a finding that such statements are libelous. The Court of Appeals reversed the decision of the lower court. (2)

A series of cases came before the District of Columbia Court involving the rights of members of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers Union. In Alvino v. Bakery Workers Union members and officers supported a campaign to oust the Union President, as a result they were suspended and removed from their positions and offices in the union. The District of Columbia Court issued a preliminary injunction requiring the International Union to restore the status quo, deciding that the activities these individuals engaged in were protected against reprisals by the statute. (3) The court decided in Moschetta v. Cross on August 1960 that the disciplined union officers and members who supported a campaign to oust the Union President were being violated their rights under the Act. (4) In another case involving Moschetta v. Cross decided July 1961, the court held that the discharge of the Executive Assistant to the President of the Bakery and Confectionary Union because he supported and assisted in prosecution of action against the union is entitled to reinstatement with back pay. The court made this award because of his union membership. The discharge of the Public Relations Director was not deemed a violation of the Act because he was not a member of the union. (5) In the fourth case decided Jan. 1962,

Moschetta and others were founders and officers of the Local Union Reunification Committee (LURC), an organization formed in 1959 by local unions of the International Union. At a special convention in 1958, following its expulsion from the AFL-CIO on grounds of alleged corruption on the part of President Cross, BCW adopted a resolution calling for reunification of BCW with the American Bakery and Confectionery Workers International Union. The organization LURC called upon President Cross to resign, the only hold back to reunification. The court held that the existence and activities of LURC were protected by Sec 101 (a)(2), 101 (b), 501 and 609, therefore denying a preliminary injunction. The union argued before the court that the Constitution of BCW makes no provision for the organization of members formed to achieve intra-union political objectives. (6)

Members of the ILA claimed a denial of their rights, particularly the right to express their views, arguments and opinions on union business. In Harris v. ILA the court relied on the union's Constitution which provides that no member "shall institute any civil action, suit or proceeding in any court against the ILA, any of its local unions . . . or any officer. . .of any of its local unions on account of any controversy for which a remedy by trial or appeal is provided for in the Constitution, unless and until he has first exhausted all such remedies of trial and appeal." A union member alleged that he made a motion at a union meeting which was seconded but not voted on. The court held that he or any other member could have appealed in writing to the whole membership for the failure to vote on the motion and if the appeal were denied the next step would be to the Executive Council as provided for in the Constitution. The court commented that due to the confusion at the meeting in the past might account for the motion not being voted on. The preliminary injunction was denied, but the complaint could be renewed at any time. (7)

A motion to review was brought before the court July 1962. Harris' case centered on a threat alleged to have been made at a meeting held May 15 and an aura of unfairness and violence permeating the meeting, made it impossible for motions to be placed on the floor in a manner that the membership might vote on them without fear of intimidation and reprisal. The court found that the only specific threat of violence made at the meeting by a business agent that Harris might as well leave the waterfront if the motion passed because he was going to get rid of him so that the rest of the union wouldn't have to be worried by him any more. The business agent said he meant he would get rid of Harris as a member of the union by filing charges against him. The business agent also considered his statement a conditional resignation if the motion was passed by the membership which it wasn't. The court further rejected Harris' testimony as inconsistent and contradictory and reviewed the record which did not show that the union meetings had been unfairly conducted. The court also added the fact that the two parties used the court as a forum to justify their activities and criticize their opponents before the members present in the court. The complaint was dismissed with prejudice. (8)

Union members in Smith v. Johnson complained of impropriety at a union in connection with a vote on the matter of cashing savings bonds. The Eastern District Court of Louisiana decided that the members were not entitled to relief under the Landrum-Griffin Act. The union members failed to take proper action at the meeting to correct the impropriety they complained of and failed to appeal in accordance with the union constitution and bylaws. (9)

A case involving free speech at a local union meeting was decided by a District Court of Minnesota in Stark v. Twin City Carpenters. Stark referred to a controversial matter at a regular meeting and was punished. The court held that the union violated a member's free speech under Sec 101 (a)(2) by subjecting him to a union trial for slander on the basis of statements he made at the union meeting concerning activities of the business agent in his capacity as union officer and was entitled to a preliminary injunction. (10) Three months later on September 1963 the same case came before the court. The court decided that a permanent injunction should be issued against the union. It reasoned that when questions are stifled and union democracy subverted, the honest union is in danger of becoming a corrupt union. Even though the statement was false and tended to border on slander, it is protected when the topic of conversation relates to union affairs. Trials for slander cannot be used to unfairly silence those who would attempt to unseat the incumbent in power or question their conduct as union officers, or both. Unions will not be allowed, subject to what was said earlier, to coerce so called malcontents into silence with slander trials. It would not be long before everyone who disagreed with the incumbents would be silenced by heavy fines or other punishment. Sec 101 (a)(2) left the unions with procedural power to govern its meetings and not be kept in session all night by one side or the other. (11)

Another case, U.S. v. Roganovich, arose out of a member's denial of speech at a union meeting. Roganovich and Santangelo were indicted as having unlawfully and wilfully through force and violence restrained, coerced and intimidated a member to interfere with and prevented the exercise of his rights to express his views under union buisiness then under discussion. The case went to court and Roganovich and Santangelo were found guilty, sentenced to one year and fined $100. Their jail sentences were suspended and they were placed on a year's probation. In the case before the Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit (Chicago) these embers claimed that Sec 101 (a)(2) and 530 was intended to legislate only within the area of union-member relationships and not within member-member relationships. The court decided that Sec 101 (a)(2) gives every member a right. . . to express his views respecting any business properly before the meeting. Sec 530 invokes criminal sanctions against any person not merely against union officers or agents. It held that criminal sanctions were contained in the Act which made it unlawful for any person to interfere or attempt to interfere, by force, with the exercise of a union member's rights under the Act. This decision affirmed the lower court. (12)

The Graham v. Soloner decision held that union members' right of free speech and assembly is not limited to freedom of expression among union members themselves, but encompasses such public expressions of opinion as picketing union offices with signs critical of union officers. The case involved members who were suspended from membership and fined for picketing union offices, addressing appeals from elections to the International Union and to the Secretary of Labor. (They also refused to pay fines imposed for failing to attend union meetings.) The court held thzt the suspension for picketing and appeals from the election was in violation of Sec 101 (a)(2). (Although the rule requiring a fine for failure to attend meetings is reasonable and proper) their over-all conduct was not such as to support suspension thereby granting a preliminary injunction. (13)

In Johnson v. Local 58, IBEW members sought an injunction restraining the union and their agents from attending any meetings or discriminating against them in their job rights. The union sought to dismiss the action on the grounds that the plaintiffs had been petitioning the IBEW for a local charter for Oakland County and had disturbed meetings and threatened officers. The union questioned the constitutionality of the Act's regulation of internal affairs to which the court answered that the activities and relationships regulated have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. On the member's claim of fearing discrimination in their job rights, the court held that the threatened retaliation by job discrimination interferes just as interference with the right to assemble, threat of physical violence or any other method of interference. On the question of exhaustion of remedies the court held that in view of the multiple appellate agencies, infrequent meetings and the absence of time limits for decision in the Constitution the plaintiffs were justified in not seeking the internal remedies. The court refused to dismiss the case except over the class of plaintiffs who were not members of any labor organization. (14)

Conclusions of Sec 101 (a)(2)

The union cannot discipline a member for libelous or slanderous statements as decided in Salzhandler v. Caputo (2) and Stark v. Twin City Carpenters (11) or picketing in Graham v. Soloner (13) . Nor may unions discipline members and officers attempting to oust officers, Alvino v. Bakery Workers Union (3) nor declare an internal opposition group illegal, Moschetta v. Cross (6). Unions may, however, discipline hired officals who are not members Moschetta v. Cross. (5).

Sec 101 (a)(3) Dues, Initiation Fees, and Assessments. -- Except in the case of a federation of national or international labor organizations, the rates of dues and initiation fees payable by members of any labor organization in effect on the date of enactment of this Act shall not be increased, and no general or special assessment shall be levied upon such members, except. . .

The Eastern Pennsylvania District Court in Brooks v. Local 30, Roofers held that a dues increase voted by local union members was valid even though the vote was not implemented until a four month lapse occurred. When the increase was put into effect, it was less than that approved by the vote. The court dismissed the action. (1)

The following two cases involve the Musicians Union and their taxing procedure. In Farowitz v. Musicians the union member alleged violation of his rights and requested an injunction from the court requiring nullification of his expulsion and reinstatement. The case involves the union's 1½% tax which in previous cases, Carroll v. Association of Musicians and Cutler v. American Federation of Musicians the local's 1½% tax was held violative of Sec 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act. After the Carroll decision, the plaintiff circulated a handbill atttempting to interpret the court's decision and urged side men to refuse to pay the tax since the local's bylaws required the tax to be collected from the leaders which was held violative of Sec. 302. His distribution of the pamphlet after the local's Executive Board had issued and distributed a contrary interpretation led to his expulsion. The Executive Board interpreted the court decisions as meaning the local tax could not be exacted from the leader, but that individual members were still obligated to pay the tax. The plaintiff's pamphlet stated they were illegal per se and urged members not to pay. The union Trial Board found him guilty of seeking to undermine the existence of the local. The union advertised his expulsion in its newspaper stating that any member working with him would be subject to charges. The court reviewed the the facts and dismissed the contention that the pamphlet deliberately misstated the court decision to intentionally harm the union. The court said the real issue was whether Farowitz's conduct violated the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution. The Southern District New York Court held that it would seem in the interest of proper and honest management of union affairs to permit members to question the union's method of obtaining taxes and the interpretation of union bylaws even to the point of urging other members not to pay the tax which he believed was illegal. If he had failed to pay his taxes the union could have expelled him, but his expulsion was based on the dissemination of his views. As far as the court was concerned, Farowitz had a right to speak his mind and spread his opinions regarding the union's collection of taxes regardless whether the pamphlet reflected the legal situation. On the question of exhaustion of remedies the court held that in such a case, where the violation of federal law is clear and the union had advertized the expulsion, depriving him of employment and the Appeal Board for three years had been involved in litigation in opposition to that urged by the plaintiff, he may seek immediate court relief. (2)

The tax question came before the court again in Schwartz v. Musicians. Here the complaintant questioned the legality of the tax as directly collected from the members, which he contended violated, Sec 302 of the LMRA, Sec 101 of Landrum-Griffin and the local's Constitution and Bylaws. The question the court sought to solve was whether the local taxes are membership dues, thus an obligation of the sidemen or whether they are the obligation of the leader. The court reviewed the history of the tax and decided that it was an obligation of the membership although at times collected by the leaders. The question becomes, the court held, whether a per centage levy in the form of a work tax is within the statutory phase of membership dues. The 1½% tax is within the statutory term of membership dues. The court also held that there was no violation of Sec 101

(2)(3) when the union sought to collect the tax directly from the members by either direct billing or check-off authorization. (3)

Conclusions of Sec 101 (a)(3)

The problems that have come under this sub-section are peculiar to the Musicians situation, howdver, the court's decsion in stating that the member had a right to distribute a pamphlet which erroneously interpreted the court's decision on the tax issue is in keeping with the decisions reached in cases arising under Sec 101 (a)(1) and (2).

D.

Sec 101 (a)(4) Protection of the Right to Sue. -- No labor organization shall limit the right of any member thereof to institute an action in any court, or in a proceeding before any administrative agency, irrespective of whether or not the labor organization or its officers are named as defendants or respondents in such action or proceeding, or the right of any member of a labor organization to appear as a witness in any judicial administrative, or legislative proceeding, or to petition any legislature or to communicate with any legislator: Provided, that any such member may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures (but not to exceed a four-month lapse of time) within such organization, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof:

A discharged employee and union member brought his case before the New Jersey District Court. In Allan v. Teamsters the plaintiff accused the union of refusing to process grievances against the employer under the terms of the collective bargaining contract. The court held that the right to a copy of the collective bargaining agreement did not give a member the right to sue the union to make it carry out the contract under the Landrum-Griffin Act. (1)

In Tomko v. Hilbert the court held that it did not have jurisdiction of action brought by a local President who failed to exhaust the internal remedies available to him under the Constitution. The court decided that his contention that resort to such remedies would be futile would not satisfy the jurisdictional requirement. The case decided July 1960 held that the allegation of futility could be measured only by initial resort to procedures embodied in the union Constitution. (2) The case came before the U.S. Court of Appeals, Third Circuit (Philadelphia). Tomko sought damages and an injunction alleging Hilbert and another member of the Steelworkers Union libeled and assulted him, by means of threats, force and disorderly conduct and unlawfully intereferred with his rights as a member and officer of Local 1408. The Court held that since Tomko did not allege that a labor organization or any official or agent acting in its behalf had instigated or performed the acts complained of, private misconduct which incidentally may frustrate his rights as a union member does not give rise to an action under the Bill of Rights. (3)

The U.S. District Court of Delaware heard a case involving a union member who was suspended from membership and removed from the office of business agent. It appeared reasonably probable to the court that the business agent was improperly removed from office upon charges based upon his prosecution of a fellow union member for assault and battery in a municipal court. In Sheridan v. Carpenters, Local 626 the court held that the action he exercised was a right guaranteed him by Sec 101 (a)(4) and union discipline would be unlawful under Sec 609 of the Act. The exhaustion of remedies procedure does not bar a temporary restraining order enjoining a special meeting to elect a temporary business agent to act for the business agent who was suspended and removed from office. (4) The case was brought before the court again, Sheridan seeking damages and reinstatement to office. The court awarded him wages lost as a result of his removal from office, however he was not entitled to reinstatement to office, since the damages in amount of lost earnings constituted an adequate remedy and only a short time remained before the term of office would expire. The court said that the union's contention that the Act does not protect the right of a business agent to hold office does not apply since he was exercising his right as a union member under Sec 101 (a)(4). (5)

Union members' complaint alleging improper disciplinary procedures in union's refusal to register or refer them for employment is not subject to dismissal for failure to allege exhaustion of internal union remedies, since the exhaustion of remedies provision is not absolute, as decided in Figueroa v. National Maritime Union. The Southern District of New York Court during March 1961 held that questions remain whether reasonable hearing procedures within the union were available and if so, whether members should have utilized them and on this ground the motion to dismiss was denied. (6)

In Harris v. ILA, Local 1291 members of the local claimed a denial of their rights, particularly the right to express their views, arguments and opinions upon union business at its meetings as granted in Sec 101. The Eastern District Court of Pennsylvania held that union hearing procedures under the union constitution which provides rules for orderly adjudication of all grievances and appeals is not unreasonable and union members who claim a denial of their rights to express opinions on union business at its meetings may not avoid the union constitution by mere claim of possible long delays in processing a charge, where there have been no attempts to exhaust available remedies within the union or any showing that such attempts would be in vain. The court did stipulate that there might be occasions when the union constitution need not be followed, nevertheless, courts should be cautious in disregarding instruments of union government. (7)

A case came before the Eastern District of Tennessee Court which involved a number of issues. A union member filed charges against the local's business agent on discrimination on referral for employment. The Union Executive Board dismissed the charges and the aggrieved member then filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board for violation of Sec. 8 (b) of the NLRA. The business agent then charged him with the failure to exhaust internal remedies. The union Executive Board voted to sustain the charges and imposed a $100 fine. The union member appealed to the General Executive Board which affirmed the fine and he then appealed to the General Convention scheduled for 1966. The complaintant continued to pay his dues and seek to maintain his membership in the union. The local refused to accept his dues without payment of the fine. He was then suspended for non-payment of dues. He attempted to pay the fine but the union requested a $1.00 reinstatement fee, which he declined to pay. When he attempted to attend a union meeting he was bodily thrown out for refusing to leave. The union argued before the court that he had resorted only to a technical exhaustion of remedies and that he had not made a good faith presentation of his case to the union. The court decided in McGraw v. United Association of Journeymen & Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry, Local 43 that the courts should not be required to examine and pass judgment upon the skill or competance with which a member presents his claim to the union before resorting to the courts. It is not required that a member utilize four months. The court was of the opinion that the union's action in imposing the fine on the plaintiff violated Sec 101 (a)(4). The union's suspending him, declining his dues and excluding him from union meetings did constitute a denial of equal rights and freedom of speech. The court awarded him nominal damages of $1.00 since evidence failed to establish that he lost employment, he was not, however, entitled to attorney's fees. McGraw had also requested to inspect the union records. On this, the court held that just what records he sought was not determined nor whether they are records of the kind required to be disclosed under Sec 201 or whether he had shown just cause for having them produced. (8)

In Harris v. ILA (see 7) the U.S. Court of Appeals, Third Circuit (Philadelphia) held that the prescribed hearing procedures met the standard of reasonableness in Sec 101 (a)(4). As long as there is a likelihood that some decision will be forthcoming within a four month period and the aggrieved member has not shown that he will be harmed by being required to seek such a decision, the purposes of the Act requires a member to give the internal grievance procedure the chance to operate which Congress deemed to be reasonable. The plaintiffs had instituted no formal proceeding whereby the ILA might have corrected the abuses alleged. The court found that from the facts and inferences drawn, the union members failure to resort to internal procedures was not a product of ignorance of the procedure but a preference for the judicial form. (9)

A union member sought an injunction against the maintenance of his name on an unfair list of variety entertainers. The background information of Detroy v. American Guild of Variety Artists started with Detroy's refusal to pay an arbitration award rendered against him in favor of a resort where he was under contract to perform. The Southern District Court of New York decided that the placing of his name on the unfair list constituted disciplining. Detroy alleged that the union never gave him a reasonable time to prepare his defense nor afforded him a full and fair hearing. The union argued that the arbitration procedure provided such a hearing. The court held that the object of the arbitration proceeding was to determine a financial dispute between the parties and could not be considered a disciplinary hearing. It was provided neither in the Constitution nor Bylaws that failure to pay the award would result in placing a member's name on an unfair list. The union argued before the court that Detroy could not bring his complaint to court until he had exhausted his internal remedies. The court interpreted Sec 101 (a)(4) to mean that Detroy must prosecute for a four month period within the labor organization before applying to the U.S District Court for relief. (10)

The case came before the U.S. Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, (New York). The court held that the District court's decision that a union member had an absolute duty ot exhaust union remedies was erroneous. The legislative history of the Section indicates that Congress had no intention of establishing such a rule. The statute provides that any member of a labor organization "may be " required to exhaust the internal union remedies not that the "must" or is required to exhaust them. The court said that Sec 101 (a)(4) was incorporated in order to preserve the exhaustion doctrine as it had developed, otherwise the right to sue would abrogate the prior resort to internal procedures. It held that a member who attempts to institute proceedings before a court or an administrative agency may be required by that court or agency to exhaust union remedies of less than four month's duration before invoking outside assistance. The Court of Appeals held that federal courts are not bound by the doctrine of exhaustion of remedies as developed by state courts, but rather the federal courts may develop their own principles. It was their opinion that each case be decided on its own facts. If it is probable that the union will grant no award or that its award will be so speculative so that there is great likelihood that court proceedings will be instituted, then the policy calling for exhaustion of remedies will not apply. The court held that where internal remedies are uncertain and have not been brought to the attention of the disciplined party, the violation of the federal law is clear and undisputed. It concluded that the facts of the case warrented immediate judicial intervention. (11)

In Gartner v Soloner the plaintiff sought to enjoin the union from fining and suspending him from membership for a period of one year. Prior to an election union officers informed the membership that unless a member had paid up fines and dues, he would not be permitted to vote. Gartner, himself paid up, led pickets to the union office. When he was defeated in the election he appealed it to the Department of Labor which found no violation. The union charged him with unauthorized picketing of the local and displaying signs which contained disparaging remarks about specific officers. He was charged with bad faith in taking his appeal to the International Union and the Secretary of Labor. He was also charged with the removal of a union notice posted on the bulletin board of the work place. Gartner was fined $75 and appealed to the International Union. The U.S. District Court of Eastern Pennsylvania held that while he may be mistaken in his criticism of the local's leadership, he still has the right to express his opinion without fear of sanctions. He is entitled to express his opinions by means of picketing with signs bearing his criticism. The court decided that suspension and fining were in violation of the Landrum-Griffin Act and that he be reinstated as a member in good standing in the American Bakery and Confectionery Workers Union. (12)

A union member sought a preliminary injunction to restrain the union from holding a scheduled election. In Coburn v. Operating Engineers, Local 3 the plaintiff alleged disciplinary measures were taken against him in retaliation for his commencement of a libel and slander suit against certain officers. He sought the injunction until his eligibility for candidacy was decided by the court. The union showed that Coburn had been convicted of forgery in 1953. The U.S. District Court of California held that this case differs from the Sheridan case in that he had been removed from office and that it was reasonably probable that the plaintiff would be ultimately successful in establishing an improper removal. The court held that Sec 504 states certain minimum qualifications concerning the eligibility of persons to hold union office. Sec 401 (a)(e) grants the union the right to impose further restrictions, provided that the qualification is reasonable and uniformly imposed. It further held that it would not issue an injunction and would not hold that the Bylaw is an unreasonable qualification uniformly imposed which prohibits a member convicted of a crime to hold office. (13)

Another case involved a union member seeking a temporary restraining order to enjoin the union from conducting an election to which he claimed the nomination for office of business representative and financial secretary. In Sanders v. Local 559, Carpenters the Western District Court of Kentucky held that he must exhaust his administrative remedies and then his recourse would be to the Secretary of Labor. (14)

In Williams v. U.M.U. the Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit (Richmond) held that the Federal District Court did not have jurisdiction in a case against the United Mine Workers to enforce or assist a union member claiming his rights to benefits against Trustees of U.M.W Welfare and Retirement Fund. (15)

In Carroll v. Musicians the plaintiff sought an injunction requiring the nullification of his expulsion from the union, his reinstatement as a member of the union and the prevention of any retaliatory measures by the union on his business.

Local 38 charged him with failure to pay a $13.20 traveling surcharge and not filing the form B contract. He was informed that the International Executive Board had found him guilty and imposed a $50 fine. After not paying the fine he was removed from membership. Local 802 found him guilty of failing to pay the prescribed wages and fined him $450. This fine he paid but when he attempted to pay the $50, it and his dues were not accepted because of his nonmembership. The court decided that on Local 38 charges he had exhausted his remedies because an appeal to the Convention would have exceeded the four month appeal period. On Local 802 charges the court held he had not exhausted his internal remedies but would in any case consider the charges. The Southern District Court of New York held that there was substantial evidence to support his violation of the Union Bylaws, since he had admitted the charges and no violation of Sec 101 (a)(2) had been proved. He contended before the court that he was expelled because of the violations of the union regulations he was challenging in a suit he filed attacking union wages as illegal in an anti-trust case. In the court's judgment a union member must still continue to obey the regulation which he has challenged in the suit. The court held that it lacked jurisdiction to reinstate him, absent an illegal expulsion. (16) The case came before the Court of Appeals, Second Circuit (New York). The expelled orchestra leaders sought to maintain a class action to enjoin the union from collecting from leaders certain taxes, travelling surcharges and welfare plan payments. The Appeals Court held that since they can not seek equitable relief for themselves, they cannot represent a class of orchestra leaders all of whom are union members. (17)

The question of the exhaustion of remedies is one which has given rise to the most diversified court opinions. In cases coming under Sec 101(a)(1) the courts denied relief on the grounds of failure to exhaust internal remedies in McCann v. Building Service Employees (7), Acevedo v. Bookbinders, Local 25 (11), Johnson v. UMW (33). In Deluhery v. Marine Cooks Union (23) the court held that this provision is not absolute, but rather the courts should proceed on a case by case basis. The case was brought to court a year later (24) and the decision held that intra-union remedies need not be sought where such remedies are futile or would result in irreparable injury. The danger of the court's intervening at the first step would make all union remedies useless. Each case should be decided on its merits and only when the organization violates its rules for appeal or its futility demonstrated, should the court decide the issues. In the case of Smith v. Johnson (9) under Sec 101 (a)(2) the court also held that intra-union appeals must be made.

The court in Sanders v. Local 559, Carpenters (14) held that a member claiming nomination to office must exhaust his administrative remedies. The court held in Tomko v. Hilbert (2) coming under Sec 101 (a)(4) that the allegation of futility could only be measured by first resorting to the procedures in the union constitution. The same conclusion was reached in Harris v. ILA, Local 1291 (7). The court held that merely claiming possible long delays without even attempting to process a claim through the union is not claim enough. On appeal the court said that as long as there is some likelihood that a decision will be reached within a four month period the Act requires a member to process his complaint through the union. In Detroy v. American Guild of Variety Artists (10) the District Court also held that the plaintiff must use the four month period for intra-union remedies. The Appeals Court disagreed saying that "may be" does not mean "must" and that each agency or court should decide whether to impose the four month limitation for a member to exhaust the internal remedies. It also added an imporatnt qualification, that if it is probable that court proceedings will be instituted after the exhaustion of remedies, then the court should decide the case in the first instance. The same decision was reached in Figueroa v. National Maritime Union (6) where the court questioned whether reasonable hearing procedures were available and whether members should have used them.

Sec 101 (a)(5) Safeguards Against Improper Disciplinary Action. -- No member of any labor organization may be fined, suspended, expelled or otherwise disciplined except for nonpayment of dues by such organization or by any officer thereof unless such member has been (A) served with specific charges; (B) given a reasonable time to prepare his defense; (C) afforded a full and fair hearing.

(b) Any provision of the constitution and bylaws of any labor organization which is inconsistent with the provisions of this section shall be of no force or effect.

A number of cases have been brought before the courts by union officers who have been removed from office. In Bennett v. Hoisting Engineers (1), Hamilton v. Guinan (2), and Burton v. Packinghouse Workers Union, Local 12 (3) the courts have decided that the safeguards provided by the Act protect union members not union officers and does not cover an employer and employee relationship.

A complaint was brought before the U.S. District Court of New Jersey by former officers of a local union who allegedly were expelled from the union without being specifically charged of any offense. In Calabrese v. United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry, the International revoked Local 14's charter and excluded the former local's officers from membership in the new Local 69. All former members of Local 14 were automatically admitted except the former officers. The court held that the situation involved an attempt by one faction to eliminate an opposing faction from office in violation of statutory guarantees. When the revocation is part of a scheme to discriminate against certain members, then those excluded from union benefits have been expelled without specific charges made against them. The revocation of Local 14's charter for refusal to comply with the International President's directive was legitimate. However, the United, its officers and members should refrain from directing Local 69 from excluding the former officers from membership. The court directed the local to accept them as members and accord them all rights and benefits as provided for in the union constitution. (4)

The rights of a union to discipline its officers are questions which came to court in the next three cases. In King v. Grand Lodge, IAM, six members of the union who were employed by the union as Grand Lodge Representatives were discharged. The union constitution provided that Representatives shall be appointed by the International President. It also provided that the IP would have full control and assign them to particular duties. Each year they were to receive an appointment document in effect for one year unless revoked. The six were terminated for supporting the wrong candidate for the office of General Secretary Treasurer. The U.S. District Court reasoned that there is an inextricable link between each plaintiff's status as a member and as an employee or officer of the union. By depriving a member of employment in the organization he is a member, is denying that link. The court went on to say that even if there is no link, depriving a member of employment is effective discipline. Their being disciplined for supporting a losing candidate violates the purpose of the statute which is to protect free elections. This decision was made during March 1963, two earlier decisions reached the opposite view.(5)

In Hamilton v. Guinan the plaintiff, both a member and Second Vice President of Local 100 of the Transport Workers Union was terminated from the position as officer. After a wildcat strike of the local, the Executive Board suspended him from office for his failure to properly perfrom his duties and fulfill his responsibilities as a vice president, the International Executive Council affirming the Board's decision. The court held that Sec 101 (a)(5) applies only to discipline imposed on union members as members and not to discipline imposed on union officers for conduct as officers. The action was dismissed. (6)

The U.S. Eastern District of Michigan Court heard a complaint by an elected official whom the union refused to recognized or seat. In Kelly v. Streho, the plaintiff asked the court to seat him as port agent and to unseat Streho. The court held that this section protects the rights of union members as members and does not confer upon the federal district courts jurisdiction in which union members seek elected jobs. (7)

The U.S. Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit (New Orleans) heard a case brought before it by a plaintiff who had been an active member of the union until 1951 when he became a general superintendent and received a withdrawal card. His claim involved a labor dispute, with the union threatening to strike if he wasn't fired. He again secured employment in another state but the union again made the demand that he be fired. The plaintiff claimed that he has lost income and has not been able to secure employment in his field without being given the right to have his case given a full and fair hearing. In Seeley v. Brotherhood of Painters the court held that an individual employed as a supervisor may remain a member of a labor organization under Sec 14 (a) of the Taft-Hartley. This right extends to nominal nonparticipation which allows them to protect their seniority and fringe benefits. In order to discipline a member who is a supervisor, the union must affect his membership insofar as it protects his seniority or fringe benefits. The court concluded that while Seeley had been punished, he had not been disciplined as a member of the Brotherhood and no claim on wh ich to grant relief. (8)

In Gross v. Kennedy, of Local 1500 Retail Food Clerks Union a union member sought a preliminary injunction requiring the union to revoke its order in removing him from his job and membership. The U.S. District Court Southern District of New York held that even though the disciplinary procedure followed by the union was in violation of the union constitution and bylaws as well as Sec 101 (a)(5) which provides safeguards against improper disciplinary action. The court ruled Gross was not entitled to a preliminary injunction. The court reasoned that since the employer no longer wished to employ the plaintiff, it would not do the vain act of instructing the union to revoke the order which removed the plaintiff from his job.

Parks v. IBEW involved the International President's revocation of Local 28's charter and granting its jurisdiction to Local 24, chartered immediately after Local 28's had been revoked. The revoking of the charter was done on the grounds that the local had engaged in a strike without the International President's approval. The plaintiffs claimed that the strike did not need approval and if it was true that it had violated the constitution then a fair hearing should have taken place before the revocation. The union contended that the IP was angered by the Local's defying his wishes in connection with the collective bargaining agreement. The U.S. District Court of Maryland decided that the revocation of the charter without a fair hearing and in view of the surrounding circumstances was a breach of the contract between the local and the international. The revocation was unreasonable and unjust discipline and punishment of the members of Local 28. The court ordered the IBEW to revoke the charter of local 24. (10) The case was reviewed by the U.S. District Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, (Richmond). The Appeals Court reversed the District Court's decision holding that courts should not step in in order to achieve immediate objectives, even though it may be desirable to to establish a rule that locals may with impunity defy their parent unions and strike at will. By establishing ad hoc standards in the pursuit of democracy in union government, the courts will succeed in introducing chaos, not democracy. On the argument that the IP was both prosecutor and judge, the court held that the separation of functions is not an absolute due process prerequisite to fair administrative proceedings. (11)

The question of the court's jurisdiction to review the union trial's findings were decided in the following three cases. In Phillips v. Teamsters, Local 560 the plaintiffs asked the court to review the evidence presented before Joint Council 73, to determine if it was sufficient to support the findings and penalties imposed. The U.S. District Court of New Jersey held that in determining whether a member was afforded a fair hearing, a court is not authorized to weigh the evidence presented or to substitute its judgment for that of the union body. It further held that the power of a union local to adopt a constitution and bylaws and to provide for disciplinary proceedings for its members existed before the Landrum-Griffin. (12)

In Robinson v. Boilermakers, Local 104 the union member sought an injunction against the continuance of disciplinary measures imposed by the union. Robinson asserted that he was not granted a full and fair hearing. He contended that the evidence introduced did not sustain the findings and conclusion. In deciding his case the U.S. District Court, Western District of Washington held that he was present at his hearing before the trial body, was represented by a fellow union members, was confronted by withesses and called witnesses in his defense, consequently he was not entitled to relief. Further the rulings of the trial body were within its discretion and not prejudicial to the plaintiff and neither was fraudulent, arbitrary or capricious. (13)

The U.S. District Court of Connecticut looked at the record and held that the charge of wilfully and fraudulently submitting false pay and expense claims was not supported by the facts. In Vars v. Boilermakers the union removed the plaintiff as union president charging him with circulating false and erroneous information, fraudulently submitting false pay and expense claims. Vars contended that he received notice of the hearing fourteen (14) not the required fifteen (15) days. On this the court ruled that since the notice was mailed seventeen (17) days before the trial, it satisfied the requirement. The court reinstated Vars as a union member. (14) The case was appealed before the U.S. Court of Appeals, Second Circuit (New York). It held that although the courts may be without power to review matters of credibility or weighing the evidence, the court is justified in insuring that the union's findings have some foundation of evidence. A union hearing examiner is not independent from union controversies. The Appeals Court held the evidence before the union hearing provided no basis for his expulsion, therefore violating his rights. (15)

The case of Rekant v. Shocktay, Gasos Union Local 446 of Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen involved a work sharing resolution passed to help provide work for the plaintiff which was later rescinded. The kosher slaughterers with whom the plaintiff was to share work felt that since he failed to appear punctually and was otherwise unable to perform the work satisfactorily, a resolution should be passed by the membership rescinding the original work sharing resolution. He was not given written charges or time to prepare his defense. The court held that this was disciplinary action and he was denied due process. The court ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction reinstating the status quo as existed prior to rescinding the resolution to share work. (16) The case was appealed, the court holding that the rescinding resolution did not close the door to employment which previously was opened. Rekant had by either refusing to take work offered to him or by failing to perform satisfactorily when he was on the job, had alienated his employers and fellow workers. The appeal's court reversed the lower court and held that the action was not within the scope of the Act. (17)

The U.S. District Court of Southern California held that a union disciplining a member by having the employer suspend him from employment for a five (5) day period was not within the meaning of the Landrum-Griffin Act. In Beauchamp v. Weeks, Local 761, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry the court held that the conduct alleged constituted an unfair labor practice within Sec 8 of the Labor-Management Relations Act. (18)

In Sordillo v. Sheet Metal Workers the union member requested an injunction against the union suspending him. The U.S. District Court of Mass. found reasonable cause to believe that the plaintiff was exercising his right as a union member in questioning union officials with respect to their salaries and was the cause for charges made against him. The court also found reason to believe that the trial was not fairly conducted and that he was denied a full and fair hearing. The court ordered a preliminary injunction restraining the union from enforcing his suspension and discriminating against him in the allocation of jobs. It directed the union to display the hiring list used to allocate job opportunities. (19)

The U.S District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania decided that a complaint was inadequate which gave no claim that the member's rights had been violated. It granted time for a more definite statement to be presented. (20) Several months later the amended complaint came to court. In Krulikowsky v. Carpenters, the plaintiff was expelled from the union by the Trial Committee of the District Council of Philadelphia on June 1959. The IP overruled its decision and placed him on probation for five years. ~~probation~~, prohibiting him from serving as an officer, delegate or committeeman. On April 28, 1960 the District Council amended the IP's order to include a prohibition against the plaintiff's attendance at any meetings of the local during his five year probationary period. The court held that the original expulsion from the union was not subject to any of the requirements of the Act. A new disciplinary penalty is, however, the imposition of an additional punishment and is subject to the Act. Since the additional penalty was imposed after the statute became effective, it was subject to the section granting the court jurisdiction. (21)

The U.S. District Court Eastern District of Pennsylvania Court held that the failure of union orchestra leaders to exhaust internal remedies did not bar their action under Title I for an injunction against the union for imposing discipline and economic sanctions. In Orchestra Leaders v. Musical Society, Local 77 the court held that it appeared that the economic sanctions were not the result of any appealable union proceeding or subject to any procedures for relief under the union constitution or bylaws. (22)

A procedural question was ruled on in Rinker v. Local 24, Lithographers. An expelled union member sought relief against the union, the company and against all the defendants for restoration of back pay and punitive damages. The U.S. Court of Appeals, Third Circuit (Philadelphia) held that the appeal was dismissed because it was not entered in accordance with the provisions of Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure which states "'when more than one claim for relief is presented in an action . . . or when multiple parties are involved, the court may direct the entry of a final judgment as to the one or more but fewer than all of the claims or parties only upon an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and upon an express direction for the entry of the judgment.'" Since an order which is not fully dispositive of a case, or which is not entered in conformity with Rule 54(b) is not final and and generally not appealable. (23)

The union had charged a member with falsifying his application for membership by answering "no" to the questions "Are you a Communist" "Are you in sympathy with communistic philosophy." He was found not guilty. A year later he was charged with "acting contrary to the interests of the union." In Anderson v. Brotherhood of Carpenters the union member complained that he had not received a full and fair hearing. The U.S. District Court of Minnesota agreed on the grounds that he was not confronted by his accusers and was not permitted to cross-examine his accusers and adverse witnesses. The court concluded that he was entitled to immediate reinstatement to membership and restrained the union from interferring with his rights to membership, including the right to run for office in Local 7. The court, however, allowed the union to hold another hearing in accordance to the constitution and bylaws and Sec 101 (a)(5). (25)

The courts are divided as to whether union officers are or are not protected under the Act. In Mamula v. Steelworkers 101 (a)(1) (20) and the cases arising under Sec 101 (a)(5) - (1)(2)(3)(6) and (7) the court held it had no jurisdiction. In King v. Grand Lodge IAM the court held that the union had no right to discipline union officers by depriving them employment.(5) The same decision was reached in Moschetta v. Cross Sec 101 (a)(2). (4) The court did hold that officers who were not members of the union were not protected. (5)

The court is reluctant to interfere with the internal affairs of the union as decided in Parks v. IBEW (11) and Rekant v. Shocktay (17). This is also true with respect to reviewing a union trial's findings (12) and (13). The exception was stated with the court's saying in Vars v. Boilermakers (15) that the court is justified in insuring that the union's findings have some foundation of evidence and held that the evidence provided no basis for his expulsion. Vars was also a union officer and the court in the first instance assumed jurisdiction.

Civil Enforcement

Sec. 102. Any person whose rights secured by the provisions of this title have been infringed by any violation of this title may bring a civil action in a district court of the United States for such relief (including injunctions) as may be appropriate. Any such action against a labor organization shall be brought in the district court of the United States for the district where the alleged violation occurred, or where the principal office of such labor organization is located.

The U. S. District Court of Mass. claimed jurisdiction over a complaint of a union member who alleged he was unlawfully expelled from the union on grounds other than failure to pay dues or initiation fees. The court held that the action did not involve an unfair labor practice under the Labor-Management Relations Act which would be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, since there was no allegation of interference with the expelled member's employment. In Leonard v. M.I.T. Employee's Union the plaintiff was expelled on charges of distributing printed material which was alleged to have been a legitimate expression of views on a controversial matter of union business. Other members who claimed that if they engaged in the same action they might also be expelled were told by the court that these injuries and remote or hypothetical. (1)

In Robertson v. Banana Handler's Union Local 1800 the U.S. District Eastern District of Louisiana held that expelled union members may not maintain an action against the union for reinstatement and damages where the expulsion occurred before the effective date of the Act. (2)

Bringing his complaint under Sec 102, the plaintiff in Lucas v. Kenny sought to collect $12,288.28, an amount alleged to be due him as a result of failing to receive job assignments. He brought the action against Kenny and Rust as individuals and against Kenny as President of District council of Carpenters. The U.S. District Court, Northern District of Illinois held that the complaint charging the defendant with violating their obligation to secure and assign work is a subject unrelated to the guarantee provided in the Bill of Rights. The case is one of contract law.

In Jackson v. Martin Co. and Local Union 738, UAW a former union committeeman took action against the union and employer for the restoration to his job and to his office of committeeman. He had been removed from office with loss of superseniority and subsequently laid off from work. The U.S. District Court, District of Maryland held that it did not have jurisdiction under Sec 102 since it enforces those rights in Sec 101 to 105 and 609 all of which deal with rights of union members as members rather than officers of the union. (3)

The U.S. Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit (San Francisco) held that the Federal District Court had jurisdiction under Sec 102 of an action by an expelled member against the union for damages and reinstatement to membership. The member was expelled as a result of his demand for the publication of the audit report indicating embezzlement by a union officer. The union and officers conspired to expel him in violation of the rights guaranteed by Sec 101. The court reasoned in Addison v. Grand Lodge IAM that the failure to state a cause of action calls for a judgment on the merits and not for a dismissal for want of jurisdiction. The court reversed the judgment of dismissal.

In Lodge 42 v. Boilermakers a procedural question was decided. The U.S. Court of Appeals Sixth Circuit (Cincinnati) questioned the bringing of the case to the Middle District Court of Tennessee. Neitherof the defendants has its principal office in that district and neither is alleged to have done anything there. The court held that under the venue provisions of Sec 102, venue was not properly laid in the district where the complaint was filed. (8)

In Grasso v. Phillip of United Papermakers the U. S. District Court, Southern District of New York held that a state court action brought by an individual against the union challenging the validity of the election is not removable to the federal court. It held that jurisdiction of the federal court is conferred only by the Secretary of Labor finding probable cause to believe that a violation occurred. (6)

Title V Fiduciary responsiblity of officers of Labor Organizations

Strauss v. Inter'l Bd of Teamsters, Local 596, U.S Distrtic Court, Eastern Dist of Penn. 45 LRRM 2349, Dec. 1959.

Action by union business agent against union and union officers for equitable relief including reinstatement of business agent following his discharge in accordance with union's interpretation of LMRDA to require his discharge and for declaritory judgment as to meaning of word imprisonment. Strauss was released from E. Pa prison 1949, parole ended 1956. Question of definition of imprisonment. Federal court held it does not have jurisdiction under Sec 102 of union business agent's action against union for wrongful discharge. Sec 101 deals with the membership in general and their relationship as members with their union. Sec 101(a)(5) court interpreted as breach of employment contract. Sec 501 his contract right is enforcable, if at all, in the common law courts of the state.

Sec 501 (a) & (b)

Union members brought suit against union officials who had allegedly conspired to cheat and defraud union of large sums of money, and against union to enforce fiduciary responsiblities of union officials. Dist. Ct. held th t union could not pay for legal fees of union officials in defense of criminal and civil actions brought against union officals for alledged conspiracy to cheat and defraud union of money, though majority vote at regular union meeting authorized such expenditures. Plaintiffs ordered to amend their complaint to state specific acts of misconduct in violation of Sec 501 which occurred subsequent to Sept. 1959 and which the union failed to correct.

Highway Truck Drivers v. Cohen, U.S. Ct of Appeals, Third Circuit, Philadelphia Nov. 2, 1960 amended Dec. 14, 1960 47 LRRM 2040

Appeal from U.S. Dist. Ct. affirmed.

53 LRRM 2782

Sec 401 permits duly established representative of a minority of a union to enforce rights of the union as a whole despite the wishes of the majority. It has been determined that money is owed by employees to the employer. There is no execution involved here. This is merely an injunction in aid of collection based upon the right of a judgment creditor to set off claims owed it by the judgment debtor. This court must secure and protect the benefits of the L-G by fashioning suitable law in accrodance with the intent of Congress. Since Collection of the judgment of $24,921.41 is what is sought, defendant-intervenor will be allowed to accept a bond with surety sufficient to secure secure payment of judgment, interest and costs by defedants. A bond of $30,000 approved by this court will be deemed sufficent to secure the payment of judgment, interest and costs.

Serio v. Liss, Local 478, IBT, U.S. Dist Court, Dist of N.J. Dec 1960, LRRM 2225

This section bars persons convicted of crimes from holding union office for a 5 year period. It is illegal for previously convicted individual to hold office within 5 years of end of his parole, even though his prison confinement ended more than 5 years ago. Action by Sec. of Labor upheld.

Sec. 501 (b)

Sec 501 which authorizes suit in federal district court by union members against union or officers for breach of fiduciary duty upon leave of court for good cause shown requires that union members exhaust internal union remedies as condition to federal court jurisdiction. Sec 501 (b) which authorizes union members to bring suit in federal district court against union or officers alleged to have violated fiduciary duties, where such union or officers refuse or fail to sue or recover damages or secure accounting or other appropriate relief after being requested to do so, requires that union member bringing action first demand that union or officers take court action to secure such relief. Judgment and the action be dismissed without prejudice.

Serio v. Liss, Local 478 IBT, U.S. Ct of Appeals, Third Circuit (Philadelphia)
Nov. 1961 49 LRRM 2119

Federal dist. court properly asserted jurisdiction over union officer's action for declaratory judgment that he is entitled to retain his office, where underlying issue concerns meaning of term imprisonment as used in Sec 504 which bars persons convicted of certain crimes from holding union office for 5 yr period after end of imprisonment. Although officer's claim is derived from state law, it challenges application of Sec 504 which establishes a national policy deemed important by Congress. Union officer is not entitled to recover from union for his removal from office, where removal was pursuant to opinion that he was disqualified from holding office because leass than five years had expired since he was relieved of parole in connection with his conviction of crime listed in Sec 504 which bars persons convicted of such crimes from holding union office for 5 years after the end of imprisonment, it appearing that both federal law and applicable state law would include parole as part of imprisonment. Affirmed.

Sec 501 prohibits union from furnishing or paying counsel to defend individual officers in suit charging officers with breach of fiduciary duty. Motion by a union for an order permitting it to provide and pay for legal counsel for its officers who are defendants in a suit. Motion denied.

U.S. v. Haverlick, U.S. Dist. Ct. North Dist of N.Y., June 1961, 49 LRRM 2006.
Sec. 501(c)

Sec 501(c) which makes it a criminal offense for any union officer to steal or convert to his own use any moneys or property of the union, is constitutional as a proper exercise of commerce power of Congress in that the statute bears a reasonable relation to collective bargaining in matters affecting interetate commerce. Sec 501(c) is not unconstitutional either as an illegal interference with internal affairs of a union or as an unlawful intrusion upon the rights reserved to states. Motion to dismiss indictment denied.

U.S. v. Decker, U.S. Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit (Cincinnati) June 1962
Sec 501 (c)

Decker was President and Chief Business Agent of Local 86 of Teamsters Union in Louisville Kentucky. Decker and Guinn, Sec-Treas were convicted of embezzlement. Sec 501 (c) which makes it a crime for union officers and employees to embezzle or steal funds of union, is not unconstituional as an improper delegation of power to federal courts which is unwarranted under Art. III of federal constituion. We find nothing in the Constituion which would forbid Congress from protecting the rights of members of such union against the kind of thievery invlved here. Affirmed.

Forline v. Marble Polishers, Local 42, U.S. Dist. Court, Eastern Dist of Penn.

Trusteeship, Fiduciary 501(b), 104, 101

1. Defendants claim plaintiffs failed to exhaust internal remedies in Constitution and By-laws and Sec 101(a)(4). It should place before the court facts establishing that union remedies are available to the plaintiff and that the plaintiff has neglected to use them, by means of exhibits, affidavits, depositions, etc. Defendents have placed no facts in the record, they have just attached to their brief what purports to be a copy of the union constitution. The union constituuion has not been made part of the record, but even if it had, that document in and of itself, falls short of establishing that plaintiffs have failed to take advantage of available, reasonable union procedures. Failure to dismiss on this ground denied but the denial will be without prejudice to a renewal of the motion if and when a proper factual foundation has been laid.

2. Filing complaint with Sec. of Labor is not prerequisite to union members' bringing civil action under LMRDA for relief against allegedly improper trusteeship over local union.

3. Sec 501(b) which gives union members right to bring actions to correct abuses in handling of union funds, does not give union members right to obtain information regarding status of welfare funds. Such infromation may be obtained under Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act in procedding against fund administration or trustee.

4. Requirement of Sec 104 by L-G that labor union supply copies of collective bargaining agreements upon members' request is enforceable in civil action by members. Provision for action by Sec. of Labor is supplemental remedy, not exclusive remedy. Sec 210 gives the Sec. of Labor the power to enforce those requirements by court proceedings. Sec 104 deals with infromation required to be furnished to union members. Vesting in such members a private right to enforce that requirement is in no way incompatible with, and indeed, is supplemented by the existence of a similar right in the Sec.

5. In contrast to the express requirements of Sec 104 that a labor union supply copies of labor agreements upon request to its members, there is no similar provision covering union constitution whether members are excused from requirement that they resort to union remedies before bringing action alleging other violations of L-G.

6. Union members' action under L-G alleging improper discipline in union's refusal to accept their dues does not state unfair labor practice subject to exclusive jurisdiction of NLRB, it appearing that union's refusal of dues tender was because amount was less than required under dues increase and that members actually are challenging validity of increases. However, action is within exclusive jurisdiction of NLRB insofar as it claimed that union is causing employers to refuse to hire members. Motion to dismiss union members action granted in part.

Sec 501(a)

Holdeman, Pres. of Local 88 of Masters, Mates and Pilots of Amer. on behalf of the union against defendants, officers of Local 88 for certain alleged unlawful acts as officers of the union. The claims against these defendants arise out of issuance of certain checks expending the funds of the union. The question of whether Local 88 can intervene or supply counsel to defednats in this case presents serious questions involving the interpretation of Sec 501(b). Plaintiff maintains that in Highway Truck Drivers the union is not entitled to furnish counsel to defendants. Defendants contend the union request the right to intervene since it contends that its cause is common with that of defendants.

This court cannot adequately determine whether there is any merit in the distinction based upon the intervention until it has determined whether the interests of the individual defendants is in conflict with the union. The evils which Sec 501 was designed to cure would often continue unchecked if a union officals was to be permitted to use the power of the union to protect himself whenever he is accused of a wrongful act.

This court is of the opinion that procedural device of intervention which the union seeks to employ should not be granted if the charges alleged in the complaint demonstrate that the interest of the union are inconflict with those of the defendant. It appears there could be conflict with the defendants.

Intervenors have contended that Holdeman had no right to bring this suit since he has not exhausted his remedies within the union. Sec 501(b)'s language sets forth the conditions precedent for instituing this type of suit without the necessity of exhausting remedies available within the union. Concept of exhausting internal remedies was knwoingly omitted. The motion of the plaintiff for a preliminary injunction is granted and the motion for an order premitting Local 88 to intervene is denied.

In action by union president against union officers for alleged violations of Sec 501(a) arising out of issuance of checks expending union funds, the president is entitled to temporary injunction restraining officers from using union counsel to defned them, and union is not entitled to intervene and file common answer with officers.

We specifically not approval of the court's suggestion that the district court should determine whether the conduct of the defendants is in conflict with the interests of the union. This in combination with a policy of permitting a union to reimburse a defendant if he is successful in his defense or perhaps even where his actions were based on a reasonable judgment as to appropriate procedures and do not evidence bad faith, should provide sufficient financial protection of union officials against nuisance suits. Affirmed.

Secretary of Labor sought books of Local 502. The respondents claim to have no objection to any examination of the books and records but wish to have a member of their union present at all times during inspection. They further claim that the surrendering of the books and records involved puts them in the position of not being able to conduct their business activities and would therefore greatly hinder their functioning.

Secretary of Labor, in furtherance of investigation to determine whether there has been a violation of L-G, has the right to inspect and retain for a period of 30 days a union's original books and records requested under administrative subpoena duces tecum, as against union's contention that such retention of its books and records puts it in position of not being able to conduct its business activities and would therefore greatly hinder its functioning. Subpoena enforced.

This is an action by 8 members of Local 380 of Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers. Petitioners claim that Respondents have refused to sign checks in payment of certain bills which have been approved by the membership of the union namely a $3,475 claim for reimbursement for fees for services paid to attorneys in first federal court action. On May 1960, a group of dissatisfied members decided to nominate a slate of officers to oppose the incumbent local union officers. At the May meeting the President preferred charges against twelve union members most of them opposition candidates. On Dec. 1960 petitioners brought an action charging respondents with violations of Sec 101(a)(2) & (5). Petitioners incurred attorneys' costs of $3,475 and other expenses of $262.44. The membership approved the payment of these fees. The Pres of the International union said that the petitioners' bills and expenses were individual indebtedness of these members and should not be paid by the local union.

Sec 501 attempts to define in the broadest terms possible the duty which the new federal law imposes upon a union official. Congress made no attempt to codify the law in this area. It appears evident to us that they intended the federal courts to fashion

Third Installment.

Other cases involving the employment relationship were decided. In Johnson v. UMW, District 50 employee sought an injunction against the union and the employer to prevent them from paying out severance benefits to some, but not all, of the employer's workers. The court decided that it did not have jurisdiction of action absent a showing of an exhaustion of remedies within the union.(33)

A case came before the U.S. District Court, Southern District of New York, where a member asked to be reinstated to his prior union status and to his regular job. In Cafero v. Typographical Union, the plaintiff based his action on the theory that the union regulations affected the employee's priority status and caused him to lose his job in violation of the Act. The court held that his case was devoid of facts and did not sufficiently allege a violation of the Act by the union. The Act deals only with the relationship between a union and its members. The case dismissed. (34)

Moynahan v. Pari-Mutuel Employees Guild involved an individual who was eligible and applied for membership in the union but was not accepted. The Southern District Court of California held he had no cause of action against the union under the Landrum-Griffin since the Act grants rights to union members. (35)

PAGINATION INCORRECT

Sec 101 (a)(2) Freedom of Speech and Assembly. -- Every member of any labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with other members; and to express any views, arguments, or opinions; and to express at meetings of the labor organization his views, upon candidates in an election of the labor organization or upon any business properly before the meeting, subject to the organization's established and reasonable rules pertaining to the conduct of meetings: Provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to his refraining from conduct that would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligations.

This section grants specific rights to members, however the limits of these rights are determined by the cases coming to the courts. The scope of such rights was determined in one such case Salzhandler v. Caputo. In this case Salzhandler prepared and distributed an leaflet untruthfully attacking Webman, the President and business agent of a local, of the crime of larceny. Caputo, President of District Council 9, appointed a Trial Board to hear the charges against Salzhandler who received proper notice and a fair hearing. The Trial Committee found him guilty, removed him as Financial Secretary and prohibited him from attending meetings, voting or being a candidate for office for five years. His rights and obligations as a member were continued in other respects. He filed an appeal with the General Executive Board. The Southern District Court of New York held that the limitation in Sec 101 (a)(1) & (2) make the equal rights provision subject to reasonable rules and regulations in the Union Constitution and Bylaws and provide that nothing in the freedom of speech and assembly provisions should be interpreted to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution. The attack which was circulated was in violation of the Union Constitution forbidding libeling, slandering or in any other manner abusing fellow members or officers of local unions unless its truth was established. The court recommended that he exhaust his internal union remedies and denied a preliminary injunction. (1)

The New York Court of Appeals rendered a decision on the case during April 1963. It held that the Landrum-Griffin was designed to protect the rights of union members to freely discuss and criticize the management of their unions and the conduct of their officers. "The Trial Board in the instant case consisted of union officials, not judges. It was a group to which the delicate problems of truth and falsehood, privilege and fair comment were not familiar." The court continued by saying that it is immaterial whether Salzhandler spoke truthfully or not. Although libelous statements may be the basis of a civil suit, the union may not subject a member to any disciplinary action on a finding that such statements are libelous. The Court of Appeals reversed the decision of the lower court. (2)

A series of cases came before the District of Columbia Court involving the rig hts of members of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers Union. In Alvino v. Bakery Workers Union members and officers supported a campaign to oust the Union President, as a result they were suspended and removed from their positions and offices in the union. The District of Columbia Court issued a preliminary injunction requiring the International Union to restore the status quo, deciding that the activities these individuals engaged in were protected against reprisals by the statute. (3) The court decided in Moschetta v. Cross on August 1960 that the disciplined union officers and members who supported a campaign to oust the Union President were being violated their rights under the Act. (4) In another case involving Moschetta v. Cross decided July 1961, the court held that the discharge of the Executive Assistant to the President of the Bakery and Confectionary Union because he supported and assisted in prosecution of action against the union is entitled to reinstatement with back pay. The court made this award because of his union membership. The discharge of the Public Relations Director was not deemed a violation of the Act because he was not a member of the union. (5) In the fourth case decided Jan. 1962,

Moschetta and others were founders and officers of the Local Union Reunification Committee (LURC), an organization formed in 1959 by local unions of the International Union. At a special convention in 1958, following its expulsion from the AFL-CIO on grounds of alleged corruption on the part of President Cross, BCW adopted a resolution calling for reunification of BCW with the American Bakery and Confectionery Workers International Union. The organization LURC called upon President Cross to resign, the only hold back to reunification. The court held that the existence and activities of LURC were protected by Sec 101 (a)(2), 101 (b), 501 and 609, therefore denying a preliminary injunction. The union argued before the court that the Constitution of BCW makes no provision for the organization of members formed to achieve intra-union political objectives. (6)

Members of the ILA claimed a denial of their rights, particularly the right to express their views, arguments and opinions on union business. In Harris v. ILA the court relied on the union's Constitution which provides that no member "shall institute any civil action, suit or proceeding in any court against the ILA, any of its local unions . . . or any officer. . .of any of its local unions on account of any controversy for which a remedy by trial or appeal is provided for in the Constitution, unless and until he has first exhausted all such remedies of trial and appeal." A union member alleged that he made a motion at a union meeting which was seconded but not voted on. The court held that he or any other member could have appealed in writing to the whole membership for the failure to vote on the motion and if the appeal were denied the next step would be to the Executive Council as provided for in the Constitution. The court commented that due to the confusion at the meeting in the past might account for the motion not being voted on. The preliminary injunction was denied, but the complaint could be renewed at any time. (7)

A motion to review was brought before the court July 1962. Harris' case centered on a threat alleged to have been made at a meeting held May 15 and an aura of unfairness and violence permeating the meeting, made it impossible for motions to be placed on the floor in a manner that the membership might vote on them without fear of intimidation and reprisal. The court found that the only specific threat of violence made at the meeting by a business agent that Harris might as well leave the waterfront if the motion passed because he was going to get rid of him so that the rest of the union wouldn't have to be worried by him any more. The business agent said he meant he would get rid of Harris as a member of the union by filing charges against him. The business agent also considered his statement a conditional resignation if the motion was passed by the membership which it wasn't. The court further rejected Harris' testimony as inconsistent and contradictory and reviewed the record which did not show that the union meetings had been unfairly conducted. The court also added the fact that the two parties used the court as a forum to justify their activities and criticize their opponents before the members present in the court. The complaint was dismissed with prejudice. (8)

Union members in Smith v. Johnson complained of impropriety at a union in connection with a vote on the matter of cashing savings bonds. The Eastern District Court of Louisiana decided that the members were not entitled to relief under the Landrum-Griffin Act. The union members failed to take proper action at the meeting to correct the impropriety they complained of and failed to appeal in accordance with the union constitution and bylaws. (9)

A case involving free speech at a local union meeting was decided by a District Court of Minnesota in Stark v. Twin City Carpenters. Stark referred to a controversial matter at a regular meeting and was punished. The court held that the union violated a member's free speech under Sec 101 (a)(2) by subjecting him to a union trial for slander on the basis of statements he made at the union meeting concerning activities of the business agent in his capacity as union officer and was entitled to a preliminary injunction. (10) Three months later on September 1963 the same case came before the court. The court decided that a permanent injunction should be issued against the union. It reasoned that when questions a e stifled and union democracy subverted, the honest union is in danger of becoming a corrupt union. Even though the statement was false and tended to border on slander, it is protected when the topic of conversation relates to union affairs. Trials for slander cannot be used to unfairly silence those who would attempt to unseat the incumbent in power or question their conduct as union officers, or both. Unions will not be allowed, subject to what was said earlier, to coerce so called malcontents into silence with slander trials. It would not be long before everyone who disagreed with the incumbents would be silenced by heavy fines or other punishment. Sec 101 (a)(2) left the unions with procedural power to govern its meetings and not be kept in session all night by one side or the other. (11)

Another case, U.S. v. Roganovich, arose out of a member's denial of speech at a union meeting. Roganovich and Santangelo were indicted as having unlawfully and wilfully through force and violence restrained, coerced and intimidated a member to interfere with and prevented the exercise of his rights to express his views under union bulsiness then under discussion. The case went to court and Roganovich and Santangelo were found guilty, sentenced to one year and fined $100. Their jail sentences were suspended and they were placed on a year's probation. In the case before the Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit (Chicago) these members claimed that Sec 101 (a)(2) and 530 was intended to legislate only within the area of union-member relationships and not within member-member relationships. The court decided that Sec 101 (a)(2) gives every member a right. . . to express his views respecting any business properly before the meeting. Sec 530 invokes criminal sanctions against any person not merely against union officers or agents. It held that criminal sanctions were contained in the Act which made it unlawful for any person to interfere or attempt to interfere, by force, with the exercise of a union member's rights under the Act. This decision affirmed the lower court. (12) bg ?

The Graham v. Soloner decision held that union members' right of free speech and assembly is not limited to freedom of expression among union members themselves, but encompasses such public expressions of opinion as picketing union offices with signs critical of union officers. The case involved members who were suspended from membership and fined for picketing union offices, addressing appeals from elections to the International Union and to the Secretary of Labor. They also refused to pay fines imposed for failing to attend union members. The court held thzt the suspension for picketing and appeals from the election was in violation of Sec 101 (a)(2). Althought the rule requiring a fine for failure to attend meetings is reasonable and proper their over-all conduct was not such as to support suspension thereby granting a preliminary injunction. (13)

In Johnson v. Local 58, IBEW members sought an injunction restraining the union and their agents from attending any meetings or discriminating against them in their job rights. The union sought to dismiss the action on the grounds that the plaintiffs had been petitioning the IBEW for a local charter for Oakland County and had disturbed meetings and threatened officers. The union questioned the constitutionality of the Act's regulation of internal affairs to which the court answered that the activities and relationships regulated have a substantial effect on interstate commerce. On the member's claim of fearing discrimination in their job rights, the court held that the threatened retaliation by job discrimination interferes just as interference with the right to assemble, threat of physical violence or any other method of interference. On the question of exhaustion of remedies the court held that in view of the multiple appellate agencies, infrequent meetings and the absence of time limits for decision in the Constitution the plaintiffs were justified in not seeking the internal remedies. The court refused to dismiss the case except over the class of plaintiffs who were not members of any labor organization. (14)

High Court Decides Unions May Penalize Members Who Exceed Production Quotas

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court decided that labor unions may fine members who exceed daily production ceilings fixed in union rules.

The decision was the latest of several in which the High Court has upheld the legality of union rules governing members' job conduct and thus narrowed the meaning of the law forbidding unions to "restrain or coerce" their members.

The broadening scope of such regulations, unilaterally adopted by a union, and their affirmation by the Justices may well heighten criticism by employers who assert that unions are using such rules to accomplish what normally is a collective bargaining matter.

In other actions, the Supreme Court:

—Rebuffed a group of major book publishers and wholesalers on a key procedural issue in triple-damage antitrust suits brought against them by more than 35 states and cities. The High Court's action will assist the states and cities in their cases involving purchases of library editions of children's books by giving them access to certain Federal grand jury documents.

—Declined to rule on the Constitutionality of state laws barring public-employe strikes, and thus left standing union convictions stemming from the New York City garbage strike last year.

— And held that a stevedoring company whose employe was killed while loading a ship and which made payments to the workers' survivors under the Longshoremen's Compensation Act may seek to recover the payments from the vessel's owner.

The Labor Cases

The labor controversy centers on two provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. One guarantees to workers the right to both join a union and engage in its activities. It also guarantees the right to refrain from such activities. The other provision says unions can't "restrain or coerce" employes who want to refrain. But it also says the National Labor Relations Board, in enforcing the ban on union coercion of employes, can't interfere with a union's right "to prescribe its own rules with respect to . . . membership."

The Supreme Court has refused in its decision to interpret literally the ban on restraint or coercion by unions. Rather, it has attempted to balance the legal rights of individual workers with those of unions by rejecting challenges of union rules to discipline members, that is provided the rules are adopted by a union majority and don't conflict with any overriding Federal law.

effort to restrain or coerce the workers and an appeals court upheld the board. The workers went to the Supreme Court.

Justice White, writing the Court's opinion in the 7-to-1 decision, said the Court is following a "dual approach" in judging internal union rules providing for fining dissenting members. Noting that the Court has struck down union rules curtailing members' access to the NLRB, Mr. White said that the dual approach, on the other hand, "leaves a union free to enforce a properly adopted rule which reflects a legitimate union interest, impairs no policy Congress has imbedded in the labor laws and is reasonably enforced against union members."

Mr. White suggested that a rule wouldn't be acceptable if it represented the "arbitrary fiat of a union officer" or were enforced through violence. Otherwise, he said, unions are free to adopt "reasonable" rules that don't conflict with some overriding Federal labor policy.

Justice White said the UAW rule reflected a legitimate union interest. Unions, he asserted, rightly are suspicious of piecework pay systems that can generate competitive pressures among workers. Such pressures, he said, can "endanger workers' health, foment jealousies" and ultimately reduce the number of employes a company requires. If ambitious workers are frustrated by union ceilings on production, they are free to "leave the union," he declared. He didn't touch on the consequences of leaving, however. At many plants, union membership is a requirement for continued employment.

The White opinion acknowledged that a major argument against union rules concerning piecework production rates is that they impede collective bargaining. He rejected the argument, however, at least as applied to the Wisconsin Motor case. Justice White asserted that the ceiling rate, though fixed by the union, was indirectly involved in union-management negotiations on the machine rate. Moreover, he said that Wisconsin Motor acquiesced to the union rule to the extent of making available to the union records of workers' production rates and of failing to demand in bargaining that the union abandon the rule.

The opinion, however, is unlikely to quiet employers and other critics who claim that unions increasingly are using their rule-making power to, in the words of one academic labor expert, "unilaterally establish terms and conditions of employment without bargaining collectively with the employer." According to this expert, the High Court's 1967 ruling upholding a union's power to fine a member for crossing a picket line encouraged extension of such rules.

Justice Marshal didn't participate in the between Federal Marine Terminals Inc. and Burnside Shipping Co. Employes of Federal Marine, a stevedoring company, were working on a vessel owned by Burnside and docked at Detroit. One of the men fell into a tank aboard the ship and was killed. His survivors were awarded weekly compensation under the Longshoremen's Compensation Act, to be paid by Federal Marine. The total payments could amount to $70,000.

Under the act, survivors needn't prove negligence to collect compensation. Federal Marine in the litigation thus wasn't contesting its duty to make the payments but asserted that, where a stevedoring company wasn't at fault and a shipowner was negligent, the shipowner has an implied obligation to reimburse the stevedoring company.

A lower court rejected Federal Marine's argument. The Supreme Court reversed the lower court and remanded the case to a Federal district court for trial on the merits.

—Rebuffed a group of major book publishers and wholesalers on a key procedural issue in triple-damage antitrust suits brought against them by more than 35 states and cities. The High Court's action will assist the states and cities in their cases involving purchases of library editions of children's books by giving them access to certain Federal grand jury documents.

—Declined to rule on the Constitutionality of state laws barring public-employe strikes, and thus left standing union convictions stemming from the New York City garbage strike last year.

— And held that a stevedoring company whose employe was killed while loading a ship and which made payments to the workers' survivors under the Longshoremen's Compensation Act may seek to recover the payments from the vessel's owner.

The Labor Cases

The labor controversy centers on two provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. One guarantees to workers the right to both join a union and engage in its activities. It also guarantees the right to refrain from such activities. The other provision says unions can't "restrain or coerce" employes who want to refrain. But it also says the National Labor Relations Board, in enforcing the ban on union coercion of employes, can't interfere with a union's right "to prescribe its own rules with respect to . . . membership."

The Supreme Court has refused in its decision to interpret literally the ban on restraint or coercion by unions. Rather, it has attempted to balance the legal rights of individual workers with those of unions by rejecting challenges of union rules to discipline members, that is provided the rules are adopted by a union majority and don't conflict with any overriding policy of Federal law.

Thus, the High Court in 1967 upheld a union rule providing for fining members who crossed a picket line during a strike. But the court in two other cases (1964 and 1966) ruled as illegal union regulations providing fines for members who took grievances against unions to the NLRB without exhausting internal union hearing procedures. The decisions in the latter cases were based on the Court's finding that overriding policy required free access to the NLRB.

The new decision is likely to have wider application to union practices and thus be considerably more controversial than the previous rulings.

The new case grew out of a dispute between the United Auto Workers and four members employed by Wisconsin Motor Corp., a large Milwaukee manufacturer of heavy-duty engines.

Many of the company's production employes who belong to the UAW are paid on a piecework, or incentive, basis under which they are guaranteed a basic "machine rate" of hourly pay.

The machine rate is established in the collective bargaining agreement, like any other pay rate, and is defined as the production level of an "average competent operator working at a reasonable pace." The machine rate, as a result of union bargaining, makes allowance for nonproductive time such as rest and tool-cleaning periods.

The UAW local at Wisconsin Motor for some years has had a union rule fixing a ceiling on the production of its members above the machine rate. The ceiling allows members to produce faster than required by the machine rate, but if a worker's production exceeds the quota he's subject to a fine. Originally, the rule allowed a worker to earn up to 10 cents an hour above the machine rate and more recently the ceiling has been raised to as high as 50 cents hourly.

As it stands, the union rule allows a worker to produce at greater than the ceiling rate, but he may be paid immediately only up to the ceiling rate. Any additional pay due is "banked" by the company—meaning that wages due are retained by the company and paid to the employe for days when he otherwise couldn't work because of a machine breakdown or some other reason.

If the employe demands immediate payment for his above-ceiling production, the company will comply. But then, according to the union rule, the worker is fined $1 a day for each violation of the ceiling and can be fined up to $100 for repeated violations.

In 1961, the union made a random check and found four employes had exceeded the ceiling and were paid for their excess production. The union imposed fines of $50 to $100 and, when the four refused to pay, the union sued in a state court to collect. It based its suit on state contract law. The four, in turn, filed charges against the union with the NLRB. The board decided that the union rule didn't constitute an violence. Otherwise, he said, unions are free to adopt "reasonable" rules that don't conflict with some overriding Federal labor policy.

Justice White said the UAW rule reflected a legitimate union interest. Unions, he asserted, rightly are suspicious of piecework pay systems that can generate competitive pressures among workers. Such pressures, he said, can "endanger workers' health, foment jealousies" and ultimately reduce the number of employes a company requires. If ambitious workers are frustrated by union ceilings on production, they are free to "leave the union," he declared. He didn't touch on the consequences of leaving, however. At many plants, union membership is a requirement for continued employment.

The White opinion acknowledged that a major argument against union rules concerning piecework production rates is that they impede collective bargaining. He rejected the argument, however, at least as applied to the Wisconsin Motor case. Justice White asserted that the ceiling rate, though fixed by the union, was indirectly involved in union-management negotiations on the machine rate. Moreover, he said that Wisconsin Motor acquiesced to the union rule to the extent of making available to the union records of workers' production rates and of failing to demand in bargaining that the union abandon the rule.

The opinion, however, is unlikely to quiet employers and other critics who claim that unions increasingly are using their rule-making power to, in the words of one academic labor expert, "unilaterally establish terms and conditions of employment without bargaining collectively with the employer." According to this expert, the High Court's 1967 ruling upholding a union's power to fine a member for crossing a picket line encouraged extension of such rules.

Justice Marshal didn't participate in the High Court ruling and Justice Black dissented. Mr. Black's brief dissent noted merely that he had dissented in the 1967 case.

The Book Case

The procedural issue before the Supreme Court in the treble-damage antitrust case against the book publishers and wholesalers was whether the suing states and cities can have access to secret grand jury documents.

The states and cities are claiming damages growing out of their purchases of hard-cover library editions of children's books for schools, public libraries and other such institutions.

A Federal grand jury at Chicago, in the course of a 1966 investigation of pricing of such books, subpoenaed documents from several publishers and wholesalers. No criminal indictment for price-fixing resulted. However, in 1967, the Justice Department brought separate civil antitrust suits against 18 publishers. The suits didn't allege any price-fixing among the publishers but charged each one with maintaining resale prices of the children's books with its wholesalers. The actions were settled with consent decrees.

Before the settlement, some states and cities that had filed their own damage suits sought to intervene in the Justice Department's civil cases. A Federal judge refused to allow intervention, but ordered the department to retain the secret grand jury documents. Thereafter, the states and cities asked for access to the documents and a Federal district judge approved the request.

An appeals court affirmed the district judge's decision and the Supreme Court without comment refused to review the appeals court decision.

Publishers named in the damage suits include Harper & Row Publishers Inc.; Charles Scribner's Son's; E. P. Dutton & Co.; Houghton Mifflin Co.; McGraw-Hill Inc.; and Holt, Rinehart & Winston Inc.

The Public Employes Case

The High Court also refused without comment to review the Constitutionality of state laws barring strikes by public employes. It thus left standing the convictions of the Uniformed Sanitationmen's Association and its president, John J. DeLury, for violating New York State's Taylor Act in New York City's 1968 garbage strike.

The sanitationmen didn't formally strike, but almost none of them reported for work beginning Feb. 2, 1968. The city immediately went to a state court and obtained an injunction to halt the work stoppage, and when it didn't end, the court cited the union and Mr. DeLury for contempt. It sentenced him to 30 days in jail and he served the sentence.

The state's highest court upheld the convictions, rejecting the arguments that they violated the defendants' rights to a jury trial and that the Taylor Act is unconstitutional. The Supreme Court left standing the state court decision.

The stevedoring case grew out of a dispute

Some Wrong Remedies for NLRB Delay

By JOHN E. ABODEELY

The National Labor Relations Act provides employes the right to join or not to join a labor organization and to engage in collective bargaining. Stating the policy is easy, but implementing it is fraught with difficulties. The interests of employers, employes, unions and the public must all be considered, balanced and eventually compromised. The solutions to the problems must conform to the law, be in line with justice and be acceptable to the parties. The task is difficult, but it is one that our society demands be accomplished.

The National Labor Relations Board, the agency responsible for implementing the law, must resolve the problems created by the existence of these conflicting interests. For example, when attempting to organize a group of employes, unions will utilize every available means to accomplish their objectives. Employers will not easily forfeit their unilateral-decision making powers for a system of bilateral decision making. A result of these clashes may be allegations, by both sides, of violations of the Federal labor law. The NLRB must decide whether the law has been violated and, if so, how best to remedy the situation.

Say that a union obtains a majority of authorization cards allowing it to seek an election. The employer, wishing to test the appropriateness of the unit of employes and the validity of the cards, refuses to recognize and bargain with the union. The NLRB determines the appropriate unit and orders an election. If the employer should now desire to appeal the labor board's decision, it must refuse to bargain, be found guilty of an unfair labor practice and then appeal to a Federal court. A consequence of this Congressionally imposed procedure is, in some cases, a long delay in bargaining.

Traditionally, the labor board has ordered employers—even after months and often years of delay—to bargain with the union on the basis of the authorization cards initially used to obtain an election. Recently, certain commentators have advocated the use of the so-called "make whole" remedy in addition to the bargaining order. Simply stated, the make whole remedy would require an employer to compensate all employes in the bargaining unit for wage increases they might have received had the bargaining begun immediately.

The problem is indeed serious. The solution, however, does not lie in stiffer remedies against employers. The proposed make whole remedy is not only illegal and impractical, it also aggravates the very problem it was intended to resolve. Furthermore, the use of the mandatory bargaining order as a remedy does itself create problems that should be viewed with grave concern.

The Kennedy Board

The causes of the delay in the NLRB's decision-making process must be determined before the proposed solution of stiffer remedies can be examined. Although there are many sources of this delay, much of the problem can be attributed to the board itself. In 1969 the NLRB filed 1,610 complaints against employers and 391 against unions. Undoubtedly, this increased caseload against employers was compounded by the Kennedy board's promulgation of newly invented duties, such as bargaining about decisions to subcontract, to move and to sell a plant. The result was to provide another weapon in the unions' arsenal, so that if they failed to obtain their demands in good faith collective bargaining, they could turn to the NLRB for help.

Analyzing NLRB decisions during the decade of the 1960s reveals still other board-created causes for long delays. In the areas of discrimination and arbitration, for example, the board has been presented with alternative forums for deciding the various substantive issues. Despite the Supreme Court's endorsement of the arbitration process and the expertise of agencies such as the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the NLRB has consistently refused to cede jurisdiction. It would seem that in institutions, as in humans, self-preservation is not an unknown characteristic.

A comparison of NLRB cases, particularly before and after the advent of the Kennedy board, reveals inconsistent decisions leading to an obvious absence of guidelines. Consequently, parties involved in the area of labor relations generally have been unable to look to board decisions as a consistent guide. Admittedly, factual distinctions in cases may require seemingly different results. These legitimate differences, however, do not absolve the board of handing down clearly written opinions in which the law is consistently applied and the facts clearly distinguished.

Congress, too, has had an active role in the imposition of delays in many refusal-to-bargain cases. Under the Wagner Act, Congress chose to deny judicial review of representation certifications until there was a finding by the NLRB of a refusal to bargain. This procedure requires an employer who wishes to contest a certification to intentionally commit a refusal-to-bargain violation.

The resultant delay is thus imposed by Congressional mandate. More specifically, the Supreme Court, in Boire v. Greyhound, noted "that this indirect method of obtaining judicial review imposes significant delays. . . . But it is equally obvious that Congress explicitly intended to impose precisely such delays." To remedy the problem by imposing stiffer remedies on the employer would certainly contravene all notions of fairness. Moreover, empowering the NLRB to compute what "might have been" the bargained-for wage gains would serve only to increase the delay and thus enhance the problem.

Some Other Problems

Aside from the delay that the imposition of the make whole remedy would potentially create, other problems should be considered.

On the one hand, collective bargaining embodies the concept of two parties seeking to determine wages, hours and working conditions in a free market. On the other hand, the make whole remedy involves the external imposition of the wages that might have been negotiated. Authorities such as Professor George Taylor have long contended that the heart of our industrial relations system is consent—consent by both parties to live and work within terms upon which they themselves agree. And in the words of NLRB Chairman Edward Miller: "They (board remedies) are, rather, part and parcel of an administrative effort to shape viable and continuing relationships among the parties who appear before us and who must often live together long after our file on their case has been sent to the archives."

With regard to the legality of the make whole remedy, there are still other problems. The National Labor Relations Act gives the NLRB broad discretion in fashioning remedies. It is not so broad, however, as to allow the imposition of a punitive remedy. Furthermore, the law specifically forbids the NLRB to compel either party to agree to any substantive provision of a collective bargaining agreement.

From a practical point of view, the make whole remedy offers even less of a solution. The remedy would require the board to devise a computational formula that would yield those wage gains which the employer might have given and the union might have accepted. When one considers the tremendous amount of time, money and energy that both employers and unions spend in reaching this figure, one cannot help but ponder how the five NLRB members could achieve such a formula. Moreover, since the parties would be required to bargain over future wages, the figure established by the board would no doubt become an absolute floor from which the union would begin to negotiate. Finally, if the board is allowed to dictate what the wage gains might have been, why then not also permit it to dictate the possible gains in fringe benefits, in working conditions and in hours worked? Such a result would surely violate not only our nation's labor policies, but all sense of justice as well.

A final issue is the possibility that a union may lose a secret-ballot election due to an unfair-labor practice charge found against an employer. The NLRB's remedy for this has recently become the issuance of a mandatory bargaining order despite the employes' vote for no union. The board thus assumes that the employes want union representation but that because of the employer's actions they are, and continue to be, afraid to so vote. This is true, the board has reasoned, even though there may be a substantial lapse of time and a significant employe turnover in the interim.

Benefitting the Unions

The intended beneficiaries of the National Labor Relations Act are the employes and the public. The use of the mandatory bargaining order may well serve to benefit, at the expense of the employes, only the union. The NLRB, in justifying the use of the bargaining order, has reasoned that the unfair-labor practice has destroyed the "laboratory conditions" necessary for a valid secret ballot election. The remedy for this cutback on freedom has been to order the employer to recognize the union based on the authorization cards that a majority of employes signed. The result then is that because some employe freedom is lost, the board will use an even less free method—card check—to force union representation. Surely such a result contravenes the Congressional mandate added by the Taft-Hartley Amendments that clearly give employes the right to refrain from joining a union.

The use of the bargaining order becomes even more startling when one considers the tremendous time lag in board decisions. The NLRB has consistently refused to examine whether there has been a substantial change in the identity of the employes during the time of the commission of an unfair labor practice and the decision. The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, in the case of Clark's Gamble Corporation, strongly criticized the board for issuing a bargaining order despite a time lag of nearly two years, occasioned, the court noted, not by the procrastination of the employer but rather by the board itself. Where there has been a substantial change in the identity of the employes, the use of the bargaining order deprives those employes of their Congressionally guaranteed rights.

Speedier justice at the NLRB is indeed necessary, but speed without justice must be avoided. Again quoting NLRB Chairman Miller: "[The] emphasis . . . should be more heavily placed on prompt and efficient case handling than on belated expanded remedies, no matter how imaginative or inventive those remedies might be." If we are to maintain justice, preserve the policies of the National Labor Relations Act and protect the free system of collective bargaining, the proposed make whole remedy must be viewed with grave concern.

NLRB SPEEDS UP its processing of cases, but the backlog still mounts.

The median time for handling unfair labor practice charges filed with the National Labor Relations Board drops to 335 days from about 360 days in June 1970, when the board's present chairman, Edward B. Miller, took office. In the first four months of fiscal 1972, the board decided a record 265 unfair labor practice cases, about 50 more than it had ever decided during the same four-month period.

Board-watchers attribute the NLRB's quickened pace to the increased emphasis given speed by Nixon appointee Miller. But critics gripe that the NLRB still drags its feet on cases. One problem: a burgeoning influx of cases; the number swelled 11% in fiscal 1971 from the year before. "It's tough to do both, handle more cases with the same size staff and still improve on the timetables," explains Mr. Miller.

But with one of the five-man board positions vacant for three months, observers fear the NLRB's output of decisions will again decline.

NLRB Kills Job Bias Ruling Against Firm, Avoids Use of Act to Enforce Civil Rights

11/12/71

WASHINGTON—The National Labor Relations Board overturned a trial examiner's decision that could have plunged the board into its deepest involvement yet in civil rights questions.

By a three-to-one vote, the board reversed a June 1970 ruling by Alba Martin recommending that the National Labor Relations Act be used for the first time to force an employer to take specific steps to eliminate allegedly discriminatory employment practices against nonwhite workers.

The NLRB may still find itself a factor in efforts of minority groups against job bias, however. In this case, the board simply held that the examiner's conclusions as to the facts were "ill-founded." Thus it didn't even consider court rulings that it has the authority to bar discrimination in cases where the facts warrant such action.

The examiner's decision dealt with complaints by the United Packinghouse Workers Union that Farmers' Cooperative Compress, a Lubbock, Texas, cotton-producing concern, had committed an unfair labor practice by allegedly discriminating against its employes on grounds of race and national origin.

Affirmative Action Asked

To correct the alleged abuses, the examiner recommended that the company "cease and desist" and take "affirmative action designed to eliminate these policies and practices."

Acceptance of the examiner's decision would have represented a significant step, because the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission, created by the 1964 Civil Rights Act to deal with all forms of job bias, doesn't have the power to issue cease-and-desist orders.

But the board disputed Mr. Martin's finding that Farmers' Cooperative discriminated against Negroes and Latin Americans in the conduct of its job transfer policy, retirement pension plan and recreation program. The majority, consisting of the board chairman, Edward B. Miller, John H. Fanning and Ralph E. Kennedy, held that "the evidence doesn't support a finding" that Farmers' Cooperative "has maintained a policy and practice of invidious racial discrimination against its employes on account of their race or national origin."

A fourth board member, Howard Jenkins Jr., dissented. He argued that the statistical evidence disclosed an overwhelming disparity between white employes and black and Mexican-American employes in higher-paying jobs and pension eligibility.

Some "Doubt Persists"

The majority conceded that "doubt persists" whether the concern "fully rectified the effects of past discrimination concerning supervisory positions." But the board held that such uncertainty should be resolved in the company's favor, and added that in 1967 the company began an affirmative antidiscrimination policy.

The board's decision was its second in the case. In 1968, the NLRB ruled that Farmers' Cooperative had failed to bargain in good faith with the union over working conditions and alleged discriminatory practices. The board ordered the company to bargain over working conditions. It didn't, however, order the company to bargain on the issue of job discrimination.

In 1969, a federal appeals court enforced the board's bargaining order, but remanded the case to the board to determine whether the company indeed had a policy of racial discrimination. The court took the view that such a policy and practice could constitute an "unfair labor practice" under the law the NLRB administers.

Further hearings were conducted by Mr. Martin, who ruled that Farmers' Cooperative was guilty of job bias. The decision was appealed to the board, which now has overturned it.

Informing the Electorate

One of the more important decisions a worker makes may be his choice of a union.

Once he joins he usually must go along with the union's decisions and actions, even though he may disagree with some of them. Courts, for instance, have upheld the unions' right to fine members who cross picket lines to go to work, and some of the fines have been very stiff. In a union-shop situation, the worker can opt out of the union only by quitting his job.

Realizing that the stakes are high, the National Labor Relations Board has always conducted employe representation elections with great care. The board's effort, though, has centered almost entirely on making sure that the unions get their side of the story across.

To a certain extent the NLRB emphasis is understandable. Employers see their employes every day in the normal course of business operations. Unions are usually outsiders, without the same access to employes.

In a recent issue of the Record of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, labor lawyer Woodrow J. Sandler tells how the NLRB has sought to ease this problem for the unions. The tactic has been to require, since 1966, that employers give an employe list, with home addresses, to the board, which then gives it to the unions.

"Without a list of employe names and addresses," the board said, "a labor organization, whose organizers normally have no right of access to plant premises, has no method by which it can be certain of reaching all the employes with its arguments in favor of representation and, as a result, employes are often completely unaware of that point of view. . . . It seems to us obvious that the access of all employes to such communications can be insured only if all parties have the names and addresses of all the voters."

The names-and-addresses rule has been backed by the courts and, superficially at least, there may appear to be little wrong with it. Who can oppose the idea of an informed electorate?

Obviously there can be inconveniences for some employes, those who may prefer not to have union organizers ringing their telephones or knocking at their doors. In one case, though, a federal court said that "the possible annoyance of being telephoned or visited at their homes is far outweighed by the public interest in an informed electorate."

Even the strong probability that union organizers would harass the employes, possibly violently, has carried no weight with the board or the courts. It can be obvious to everyone that the union has ample access to the employes, without the home addresses, and still the addresses must be supplied. The union may have secured a complete list from other sources, and yet the employer must furnish his own list.

In one case the employes intervened as a group, opposing the release of their names and addresses; they feared the union would

Even the strong probability that union organizers would harass the employes, possibly violently, has carried no weight with the board or the courts. It can be obvious to everyone that the union has ample access to the employes, without the home addresses, and still the addresses must be supplied. The union may have secured a complete list from other sources, and yet the employer must furnish his own list.

In one case the employes intervened as a group, opposing the release of their names and addresses; they feared the union would harass them. Rejecting this plea a federal court said, with far more confidence than the employes apparently felt: "It is unlikely that a union seeking votes to be cast in a secret ballot election would alienate potential support by overly aggressive campaigning."

Nor does it matter whether employes are already fully informed on the issues. In one case several employes submitted written statements to show full knowledge of everything involved, and yet the employer had to supply their names and addresses to the union. "To look beyond the question of substantial completeness of the list," the NLRB said, "to see whether or not employes were actually informed would create an 'administrative monstrosity.' "

Some employers would argue that the board, in its whether-or-no use of the name-address rule, has created something of a monstrosity anyway. It wouldn't be fair to say that the board applies the rule to absolutely every situation, though. In one case the board held that the employer did not have to furnish home addresses: The employes lived and worked aboard the employer's ships almost the entire year.

When the NLRB began demanding home addresses, it said that the program was to some extent experimental. In effect it held that if the name-address rule did not help the unions enough it would consider another measure: equal time.

Under equal time, which some unions long have sought, employers would have to invite union officials to mass meetings on the employers' premises. At these meetings the union leaders could expound, before captive audiences of employes, in answer to each and every argument made by employers. "Should it ever be concluded that (the name-address rule) has failed its purpose," says Mr. Sandler, "the 'equal time' doctrine is waiting in the wings."

It would seem, however, that the rule could be applied with more discrimination, at least in cases where the prospect of harassment appears very real. It would help, too, if the employer were freer—or felt freer—to state his side of the case.

When the NLRB was first set up in the 1930s, it appeared for a time to assume that the employer had nothing of value to offer; the line seemed to be that unions were good for everybody, and employers were not allowed to say anything at all. Later the rules were relaxed a bit, and the Taft-Hartley Act supposedly established the employer's right of free speech.

The Taft-Hartley Act specifies that the employer can express any views, arguments or opinions without committing an unfair labor practice as long as he does not include an actual threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit. Whether this rule is enforced or not, though, has usually depended on whether the board has been controlled by prounion members or not.

During the Kennedy-Johnson years, the board so restricted employer statements that many employers have been afraid to say much of anything. The board's position may have eased a little lately, but not very much.

Labor unions differ greatly in their usefulness to employes; in some cases, the employes may be much better off with no union at all. The issues can be complex and the employes, who often are much brighter than the board seems to think, deserve reasonable access to relevant information. The NLRB does the employes a disservice by focusing so heavily on efforts to make sure that they see only the union side.

Labor Law - NLRA

Just published! The most comprehensive work ever written on the National Labor Relations Act

A monumental, 1,000-plus-page work of incomparable value not only to every lawyer with a labor relations practice, but also to the general practitioner in search of an authoritative and comprehensive reference work.

What Michael I. Sovern, Dean, Columbia University School of Law, thinks of . . .
THE DEVELOPING LABOR LAW

I would like to tell of my critical contribution to the realization of THE DEVELOPING LABOR LAW. I remember well a telephone call from the then-chairman of the American Bar Association's Section of Labor Relations Law. He reported, with some embarrassment, that he had just invited Professor Morris to serve as chairman of a committee to write a book on the National Labor Relations Act, and that Professor Morris had indicated his willingness but had suggested that I be asked first because of my recent service as co-chairman of the Section's Committee on the Development of Law under the National Labor Relations Act. . . . I deferred to Professor Morris. Had I accepted, I find it impossible to believe that I would have surmounted all the obstacles to completion, as he has.

The writing of THE DEVELOPING LABOR LAW required scholarly insight, editorial acuity, and a large measure of delicate mediation and sensitive leadership. THE DEVELOPING LABOR LAW is probably the only reference work that had not only to be written but to be negotiated as well with counsel for management and labor. That a highly useful volume has emerged is remarkable. That it is not an anthology but an integrated whole, stamped with the same style throughout, is little short of a miracle. The result is a tribute both to the many talents of Professor Morris and his coworkers and to the great capacity for cooperation that our profession can bring to a task when it is stimulated to do so.

Professor Morris and the Section have promised us annual supplements to be prepared by the Section's Committee on the Development of Law under the National Labor Relations Act. In my judgment, Professor Morris and his colleagues have done even better than that. Time and again they have analyzed a rule, a principle, or a trend so thoroughly that all of the relevant considerations and possible solutions are readily apparent. To be sure, the reader needs to be told, and the book does, of course, tell him, which solution is the current choice. If and when reversal comes, the change of a few words will be all that is necessary to make such discussions fully current.

Professor Morris and his fellow committeemen have done their work surpassingly well. They have, as they hoped to do, set forth clearly, succinctly, and fairly "whatever the law was and whatever it now is." The practitioner will find in THE DEVELOPING LABOR LAW a useful, practical guide to the law he needs to know. The student will find a helpful crutch. . . . Law professors will find THE DEVELOPING LABOR LAW a useful adjunct to their teaching.

Professor Morris, his committee, and the Section of Labor Relations Law have rendered us all a large service. We are in their debt.

We could fill columns with the names and professional qualifications of the 60-plus specialists in labor relations (all of them members of the Section of Labor Relations Law of the American Bar Association) who have participated in the writing of The Developing Labor Law. We could fill additional columns with the praises already heaped on the final fruits of this four-year project, conducted under the guidance and direction of Editor-in-Chief Charles J. Morris, Professor of Law at Southern Methodist University. But Dean Michael I. Sovern says it all in elegant and perceptive fashion in his Foreword to the book. We've reproduced excerpts here. AFL-CIO News 3/4/67

Union Action Upheld:

High Court Backs Grievance Ruling

The Supreme Court has reversed a Missouri Supreme Court ruling that a union must pay $10,000 in damages to a member for deciding not to carry his grievance to arbitration, the fifth step of the grievance procedure.

Five justices joined in finding that the National Brotherhood of Packinghouse & Dairy Workers, unaffiliated, and its Kansas City Local 12 did not fail in their duty of fairly representing Benjamin Owens, Jr., now deceased, by deciding not to take his grievance case to arbitration. Union officers said there was insufficient medical evidence supporting Owens' claim that he was well enough to return to work at the Swift & Co. packing plant in Kansas City Mo., after treatment for high blood pressure. A company doctor decided he was not.

Three justices concurred in reversing the lower court but for a different reason. They held that Owens should have carried his case to the National Labor Relations Board instead of the state courts. Justice Hugo L. Black dissented, saying the high court had set up a new rule in fair representation cases and he does not accept it.

Last year the AFL-CIO filed a brief supporting the position of the brotherhood and urging reversal. Though Owens' union is not a federation affiliate, the AFL-CIO has a "profound interest" in the dispute because more than 90 percent of all U.S. union contracts with management have a grievance procedure similar to the one in the brotherhood's contract, the brief noted.

The Supreme Court opinion, written by Justice Byron R. White, recited that a suit filed on Feb. 13, 1962, in the Circuit Court of Jackson County, Mo., alleged that Owens had been discharged by Swift in violation of the collective bargaining agreement then in effect and that the union had "arbitrarily, capriciously and without just or reasonable reason or cause" refused to take his grievance to arbitration.

A jury heard the evidence and awarded Owens $7,000 compensatory and $3,300 punitive damages. The trial judge set aside the verdict on the ground that the NLRB had exclusive jurisdiction. The Kansas City Court of Appeals upheld the judge's ruling but the Missouri high court reversed the lower courts on the basis of previous U.S. Supreme Court findings. It directed reinstatement of the jury's verdict but cut punitive damages to $3,000. Meanamination "did not support" Owens' claim and the union executive board decided to drop the grievance. It advised Owens to accept Swift's offer of referral to a medical center. He refused and filed his suit.

The Supreme Court majority concluded that state courts have jurisdiction in this type of case, but that federal law governs and federal standards must be applied. They were not applied in the Owens case, it found in reversing the state supreme court.

Rules of Conduct

A breach of the legal duty of fair representation occurs only "when a union's conduct toward a member . . . is arbitrary, discriminatory or in bad faith," the high court's opinion said. "Though we accept the proposition that a union may not arbitrarily ignore a meritorious grievance or process it in perfunctory fashion we do not agree that the individual employe has an absolute right to have his grievance taken to arbitration regardless of the provisions" of the contract.

The facts, related in the Supreme Court opinion, were these:

Took Sick Leave

In mid-1959 Owens, a long-time high blood pressure patient, entered a hospital on sick leave from his job at Swift's. After a long rest his family physician certified him as fit to resume work, but a company doctor examined him and concluded his blood pressure was too high for one doing the heavy work he performed.

Owens got a second authorization from another doctor and a nurse permitted him to resume work on Jan. 6, 1960. Two days later the Swift doctor discovered he had returned and he was "permanently discharged on the ground of poor health," the court related.

Owens then sought the union's help and a grievance was filed. On Feb. 6, 1961, the union sent Owens to a new doctor at its expense to see, as the union put it, "if we could go to arbitration with his case" after management continued refusing to reinstatement. The ex-

MO. Teamster 5/26/67

WASHINGTON (PAI) — How much power the U.S. Labor Department has in laying down conditions for local union elections is a question that the U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to decide.

The Court has granted the Labor Department permission to appeal two cases brought against local unions whose election procedures were challenged by the Department as part of its enforcement of the Landrum - Griffin Act. In both cases, lower courts ruled against the Labor Department on the grounds that subsequent elections made the Department's original challenges irrelevant.

Under Landrum-Griffin broad lines are laid down for local unions in conducting their elections. On the filing of complaints by members that the elections were irregular, the Labor Department can file suit to have them set aside and new elections held.

This happened in two cases. One was against the Washington, Penn. Local 153 of the Glass Bottle Blowers and the second was against the Youngstown, Ohio, Local 125 of the Laborers International Union.

The case involving the Glass Bottle Blowers went back to 1964 when the Department of Labor sued to set aside a 1963 election. The Department challenged the local's constitution and bylaws on the grounds that qualifications for office in the local were too restrictive.

A federal district court agreed with the Department on the "restrictive" point but saw no fraud in the election. In addition, the local had held an election in 1965 which was not challenged by a member of the local. The Labor Department then wanted to challenge the election on its own but the court refused it permission. It also held that the 1965 election had made the 1963 election irrelevant.

The second case — that of the Laborers — involved the question of eligibility of candidates and here again a subsequent election wiped out the original challenge.

The Labor Department now claims that there are a number of similar cases which have been left up in the air because of the two lower court decisions.

In its brief to the Court, the Department contended that the time element in a legal fight to overturn an election will frustrate enforcement of Landrum - Griffin unless the lower court decisions are overthrown.

A number of unions have taken issue with the way in which the Labor Department's Bureau of Labor-Management Reports administers the Landrum - Griffin Act. Most recently, sharp charges have been released by the Seafarers and the National Maritime Union.

Union Democracy in Action

TOM DEACON, OPERATING ENGINEER, AND LOCAL 12, LOS ANGELES

Bulldozers and cranes, shovels and hoists, tractors, road rollers, and all the other heavy equipment in building and construction, powered by gasoline, electricity, diesel, and steam, are run by members of the International Union of Operating Engineers (AFL-CIO). Tom Deacon, of Los Angeles, a licensed operating engineer, can handle them all.

Deacon is in his late fifties, is married, two children and two grandchildren. As a youth, he worked as a railroad fireman and engineer before entering the construction trades in 1933. During the war, he ran a crane at the Todd Shipyards in Brooklyn and served on union negotiating committees. For nineteen years, he held a card in IUOE Local 12. As long as he kept the engines running without thinking thoughts, he was all right. But he became curious about how the officers were spending the local's money and he kept looking. One familiar incident led predictably to another until he was finally thrown out in February, 1966.

While still a member, Deacon and other local members were interviewed by the Valley Times which reported on December 10, 1964, that Deacon had accused officials of the 22,000-member local of siphoning off over $1.7 million in salaries and expenses, including $50,000 to the top man, and that he had won a state court order permitting him to inspect the local's books. Deacon charged that his associate, Kevin Walsh, had been beaten at a union meeting and that union members feared retaliation if they voted and spoke their convictions.

On February 12, 1965, the Local's Business Manager, Joseph Seymour, chief target of Deacon's criticism, preferred charges against him.

Deacon went to court; the judge would not stop the union trial proceedings; but he did order a court reporter to make an official transcript, leaving for the interested historian an example of what frequently passes for a trial in the labor movement.

The trial outcome was predetermined by the local's structure. Its jurisdiction spreads over all Southern California and Southern Nevada. Many members work away from home and must travel hundreds of miles to a meeting and back, not easy for a man with a job. But the officialdom is freer and more adaptable. Business Manager Seymour, the complainant, can count upon a paid staff of some 60 Business Agents whom he fires and hires (B.A.'s are appointed, not elected.) Each Agent, in turn, has power enough over jobs and other perquisites to induce at least a few steady workers to follow his directives. It is not difficult for this assemblage of officials to round up buddies enough to control a meeting and bring them in by car and bus.

On May 31, 1965, a membership meeting assembled and Deacon's trial began. As he entered the hall, the booing began. When the Chairman asked Seymour if he was ready to proceed, he replied, "I have been waiting for fifteen years."

The atmosphere properly set, Deacon offered a calm and dignified defense—or tried to—interrupted by catcalls, epithets, and unrestrained profanity, all in the record. Then, he was quickly expelled by a vote of 326-66, fewer than 400 voting in this local of 22,000.

The charges ought to be preserved as a specimen; we print them in full:

> That Thomas M. Deacon has caused dissension among the members by committing an offense discreditable to the Union and has attempted to destroy the interests and harmony of the Local Union.
> Thomas M. Deacon was responsible for an article that appeared in the December 10, 1964, issue of the Valley Times newspaper. This accusation of Deacon's was outside the confines of the Local Union and reflects loss of dignity to the membership of Local No. 12. The article itself is not the issue. The issue is that Thomas M. Deacon has made public his personal opinions and accusations regarding members of Local 12.

Readers must note, because of what follows, that the validity of Mr. Deacon's "opinions and accusations" were not considered. In fact, the whole issue of truth or falsehood was ruled out of order. For example: Deacon charged Seymour with receiving $50,000 in salaries and expenses in 1963. At the local trial Deacon tried to ask, "Mr. Seymour, will you state for the

"DISCREDITABLE" OFFENSES

Deacon was expelled for "an offense discreditable to the International Union or its subordinates." He thought that he was defending the union's integrity by demanding fair elections, financial accountability, and democracy. His offense, whatever it was, brought retribution swift and fast.

But in other instances over the years, the officialdom of the International Union of Operating Engineers has been careful to temper its distinctive sense of justice with mercy.

When Joseph Fay, a Vice President in 1947, was convicted of extortion, his family drew $238,000 from the union while he was in prison. When he got out in 1956, his local awarded him a pension.

The union's president, 1940-1958, William E. Maloney, rose to power with the aid of gangsters. In 1953, a rank and file opposition leader, Dennis Ziegler, who had fought Maloney, was shot and killed on the streets of Chicago. Maloney went on to become rich: between 1950-1965 he made $742,000 and bought Cadillacs and a $35,000 yacht with union money. When these facts were exposed to public view he resigned in 1958. The union dispensed no harsh justice then; it magnanimously overlooked transgressions that might have seemed "discreditable" and granted Mr. Maloney a $50,000 yearly pension.

Since then there have been changes. The IUOE was presumably reformed from above by George Meany. But one vociferous rank and file leader suggests that something "discreditable" may still remain. The officialdom's reply comes as an automatic reaction. Get rid of him, of course! It may seem harsh after such magnanimity to others. But the quality of mercy is not inexhaustible or indiscriminate.

membership what your salary was for the year 1963?" The room went into an uproar while Seymour juggled the question and replied, "I charged you with going outside the local union through the newspapers. This is what I charge you with. I want the judge to know when he reads this transcript that this is what I am basing my charges on, and I said my sole charge was because you went outside the organization Deacon, to the press."

Deacon: "Mr. Chairman, I ask you now to instruct Brother Seymour to answer the questions and not to comment concerning the questions." The trial went into another furious uproar while Deacon persisted, "I still have not had your answer, Mr. Seymour. What was your salary last year?"

Chairman Carr: "You are out of order. It has nothing whatever to do with the charges."

Truth irrelevant, Deacon was expelled. A curious trial was now followed by a more curious appeal. Deacon promptly appealed to the International Office and after considerable delay, a special Hearing Panel assembled to act out the motions of due process, convening in Los Angeles June 24-25 and again November 17-18, 1965.

The Panel consisted of top International officials who, as usual, have a stake in preserving the family's equanimity against troublemakers. It denied Deacon the right to an attorney paid out of his own pocket while it enjoyed the services of its own attorney, General Counsel A. Woll, paid out of the union treasury. This is standard procedure and required no special imagination.

But in other respects, the tribunal injected something new into appeals procedure. It is not easy to make a contribution in a field that has been worked over by experienced hands. But Deacon's appeal inspired something new.

Ordinarily, an appeals tribunal reviews the validity of proceedings before a lower body and if charges are defective, and procedures unfair, it is expected to void the findings of the original body. Not in this case. The IUOE Panel developed a novel conception of its responsibility.

The Panel seems to have sensed that the charges were somewhat meager. But, instead of wasting all the effort that had gone into the original trial, the appeals board proceeded to patch up its defects ex post facto.

Deacon described the atmosphere at the local where, he contended, the jury was an organized screeching band. This, he suggested, was not quite fair. The Panel brushed aside the triviality. Even if he had not received a fair trial—which the Panel did not admit—the appeals proceedings in themselves somehow made up for this lack. The Panel need not bother itself with the validity of the original proceedings; it was perfectly capable of sustaining a guilty verdict without digressions.

Deacon had come to appeal from a verdict based upon a specific set of charges. In the course of the appeal hearings, he discovered that these charges had evaporated; the appeals tribunal had unexpectedly substituted a new set. At the original trial, he was not allowed to prove his accusations, for truth was out of order. But the Panel, in a rash of independent initiative and a sudden thirst for truth, found him guilty of three "false" statements. Two of these statements were not attributed to Deacon, who was not accused of making them himself. He was found guilty because these statements were made by others! Hard to believe? But there it is.

"False Statement" No. 1: The Valley Times reported that Deacon had won a slander suit against Local 12. Actually this was a slight error. He had won a slander suit, not against the Local, but against its former Business Manager. In the following month, the Times corrected its little mistake, but the Hearing Panel waved that aside with the comment, ". . . at least one member of Local 12 still believed at the time of the Panel Hearing that Deacon had sued both Bronson (the former Business Manager) and the Local Union." With such logic, anyone might be convicted of anything; at least one person is always available to believe almost anything. Deacon hadn't been charged originally with making false statements; this one wasn't so very false: and Deacon hadn't made it. But why beat around the bush? A reporter made a mistake: a newspaper made a tardy retraction; one local member was ignorant. The evidence was overwhelming. Expel Deacon!

"False Statement" No. 2: The Valley Times headline had read: "Engineers Local 12 Torn By Dissension." The Panel solemnly found "That the newspaper heading was false and untrue in that the union was not in fact torn by dissension but on the contrary 80 to 90 percent of the members of the union supported the leadership." With that, we can choose between two contradictory charges: 1. the local version—there was dissension, created, of course, by Deacon, and 2. the Appeals Panel version—there was no dissension, and the newspaper lied. But why be mired in facts and logic? The International had the power to enforce its analysis. Deacon was expelled and with one dissenter less, obviously there would be more harmony.

"False Statement" No. 3: Deacon did not utter the first two "false statements" but he did say something. Deacon told the press that members were afraid to attend meetings. This, the Hearing Panel decided, was false. Actually, it insisted, members staved home because in this Local, where it was a lie to speak of dissension, Deacon and friends were disrupters. Clearly a difference of opinion. The Panel proved its point by kick-

UAW REVIEW BOARD DECISION: A YEAR LATER

If Public Review is good for the United Auto Workers, why not other unions?

Why not, for example, the International Union of Electrical Workers? The IUE went through two debilitating factional struggles within a few years. It is led now by men who would not be in office if they had been denied recourse to an impartial judiciary. The present leaders of the IUE, when they were in opposition, appealed outside the power structure of their own union to federal court for fair play in their contest with James Carey. But an ordinary IUE member, who cannot afford the luxury of the nation's courts, has no such recourse.

Why not Public Review in the International Ladies Garment Workers union; why not in the American Federation of Teachers? Why not all the others which, like the UAW, are considered especially liberal and enlightened?

The UAW is content to enjoy the public and private benefits of its own institution without the burden of crusading for it elsewhere. It does not venture even to suggest, gently, that perhaps other unions might afford the same due process to their members. And since no one crusades for public review, no one else is compelled to oppose it publicly. It is difficult to answer objections to it because they are seldom publicly expressed.

In private, public review is sometimes ridiculed as a mere public relations gimmick. Only a union which is already democratic, the argument goes, would create a genuinely impartial review board. Even if a bureaucratic officialdom could be pressured into action, its board would surely be a fraud constituted by administration stooges for window dressing. Therefore, the thought concludes, public review is possible only where it is unnecessary.

But the UAW experience refutes the argument. The UAW is a genuinely democratic union; yet it does need public review. Democracy evolves; it can be strengthened in the minds of men; it can become debased and perverted. Public Review helps to strengthen and perpetuate UAW democracy. We are reminded of this truth by a letter to the UAW Public Review Board from Bob Weissman who wrote on June 5, 1965, that he had been elected president of UAW Local 122 in Twinsburg, Ohio. If not for the Public Review Board, Weissman would not have been a member of Local 122 and could not have run for office.

Weissman had been local union recording secretary in 1959 when he was discharged by Chrysler. The union filed a grievance; but when the Umpire upheld the company, Weissman's career as a Chrysler employee was over. In 1951, he was elected local president, a full-time job and he held the office until 1963 when he was defeated for re-election. Three weeks later, although he announced that he wanted to remain in the local and pay dues, the new financial secretary issued him a withdrawal card cancelling his membership. Weissman appealed without success to the International Executive Board which ruled that the membership of a discharged worker was dependent upon the will of the local.

Behind these formalities were the sordid realities of union politics. Weissman headed one group in the local. His opponents were now in power and happy to be rid of him. Weissman was no admirer of the Reuther Administration. His future in the UAW, if any, looked bleak indeed.

No union officialdom wants to lose a loyal follower, especially an experienced and able leader. If Weissman were part of the official family, he would have had no problem. Local 122, or some other, could be induced to keep him on the rolls somehow. He could be assigned a spot on the International staff. He might be sent to a new plant, put on the job by agreement with a friendly plant manager and quickly rise in a newly forming local leadership. These things are part of the normal life of any union, including the democratic UAW.

But not for a Weissman. He wasn't part of the administration caucus and did not submit to its discipline. In the natural course of events, he would have drifted away somewhere.

Hundreds of able leaders have been lost to the labor movement in this process which winnows out the experienced critic and retains only the experienced supporters of an officialdom. Administrative machines become stronger; the rank and file loses those who independently express the dissatisfactions of the working membership. The officialdom seems to have a natural monopoly of talent but that is one artificial result of the decline of effective democracy.

In an important way, the UAW Public Review Board countered this process in the Weissman case. It ruled that discharge could not justify depriving a man of his membership.

On June 22, 1964, the Board ordered Weissman reinstated in Local 122. On June 5, 1965, Weissman wrote this letter to it:

> Dear Rabbi Adler:
> I am sure that the Board will be interested to learn, as a follow-up to last year's case in which my UAW membership was restored by the Board's decision, that I have been again elected to the Presidency of UAW Local 122. Since my candidacy and election were possible only as a result of the Board's action, I am now doubly appreciative of the decision the Board rendered in my favor.
> I believe that my case points out a particularly important aspect of the Board's very useful role: the protection of individual and group rights and interests against the tyranny of temporary majorities. . . . I was originally denied membership by a small group of officers of my Local, who were upheld by a membership vote of 35-26. Two years later, I was elected President from among eight candidates, with top vote on the first ballot of 814 out of 2600 voting, and with 1361 votes in the run-off election to 1282 for my opponent.
> If there is ever anything I can do to further the work of the Board or the democratic concepts for which it stands, please feel free to call on me. Thanks again.

STILL NO PENSION FOR ALBERTZ

Hubert Albertz has won a long battle against corrupt officials of Local 32-E, Building Service Employees International Union. He might be expected to take satisfaction in the victory except for certain flaws. He still remains expelled from the Local; he has lost a pension as a result.

The Local's officers were found guilty in federal court of taking money from employers as bribes or loans. Henry F. Chartier, President, and Vincent J. Ricciardi, Vice President, and Stanley Unger, Secretary Treasurer, were sentenced to jail terms. Fred Meyer, Recording Secretary; and Thomas DiSalvo, Business Representative, were put on probation.

Albertz, a building superintendent, was expelled by racketeers in 1947 for opposing a dues increase and conducted a 19-year one man crusade for action by public officials. Albertz provided the leads that finally exposed the corrupt setup.

Yet he remains out. The union's General Executive Board has twice upheld his expulsion over the years. Although International President David Sullivan is pleased to be known as an enlightened labor leader and the local is now under International trusteeship, he has not discovered a way to restore Albertz to the position of honor he deserves.

NMU, THE DEPT. OF LABOR, AND A PINCH OF MARIJUANA

Five seamen challenged the May elections of top officers in the National Maritime Union, charging wholesale violations of fair election procedure. Their internal union remedies have been exhausted and now the Department of Labor is asked to take steps to void the elections.

The five are: James Morrisey, opposition candidate for National Secretary Treasurer, who according to the official tally polled one-third of the national vote; Joseph Padilla, who was recorded with 6,000 votes for Vice President; Harry Alexander, with a third of the votes for New Orleans Port Agent; Gaston Firmin-Guyon, with 25 percent for New York Port Agent; and Richard Haake, who was denied the right to run against Curran for president.

It will be fascinating to watch the Department of Labor juggle this hot potato. It has been involved with the NMU before.

In 1960, Secretary of Labor, James Mitchell, filed suit in federal court to upset the NMU elections that year, charging that the union did not provide adequate safeguards to ensure a fair election. Later, when Arthur Goldberg took over the job from Mitchell, he invented a unique method for whisking away his Department's own complaints. He permitted the union to stipulate that the violations would not occur again. With this assurance, he withdrew the Department's suit. Future promises were allowed to wipe out current offenses.

In the years that followed, this device helped the Department of Labor to slough off its responsibilities to union democracy. Elections in the Marine Engineers union, in the Musicians union, and in others, admittedly in violation of the law, were allowed to stand on the basis of such promises. Three odd aspects of this procedure are worthy of special note:

1. The agreements between the Department of Labor and the offending union officials are made behind the backs of the men who made the complaints in the first place. The unionists whose rights are violated are not even permitted to be in the room and watch while the deal is worked out. Their rights are bartered away without affording them even the right to object.

2. The Department of Labor makes no effort to police the agreements. It will not act, in any case, without a complaint from union members. But if an opposition is demoralized, discouraged, or crushed, there is no one left to make a complaint. The offending officials can repeat their offense and the Department of Labor will busy itself with other things, like filing reports in cabinets. The recent NMU complaint compels the Department of Labor to return to the scene of its stipulation.

3. Under the law, the Department of Labor has no stated powers over future elections, only over current ones. When it accepts promises for the future, the Department shirks the responsibility of utilizing the powers which it does possess by empty references to powers which it does not.

And now, the NMU elections. What will Willard Wirtz do in 1966 to enforce the promises made to Arthur Goldberg in 1961?

The most effective challenge to the Curran administration comes from James Morrisey. He has been an NMU member since 1942, a union Patrolman (representative) from 1949-53 and in all those years supported Curran in the many factional struggles. By 1966 he became disenchanted and ran as an insurgent for National Secretary Treasurer. In an impressive show of strength, he was credited with 5,875 votes to the winner's 11,205. In the port of New York where half the NMU strength is concentrated, he won 47 percent of the votes, the only port where the ballot count was subject to outside scrutiny.

With the NMU triennial convention scheduled for October,

MUSICIANS' UNION UPHOLDS MEMBERS' RIGHTS

Musicians can criticize their union officials. That right was reinforced when top officers of the American Federation of Musicians struck down a gag rule imposed by the New Haven, Conn., local. In this unusual action, the leaders of an International union have supported the internal democracy of their own rank and file.

New Haven Local 234-486 has a book membership of about 700; but, as in most musicians' locals, half the membership never works at the profession; and few of the others make it a full-time livelihood.

For two years, a group of local members has published a tiny periodical as a vehicle for rank and file democracy, the Musicians' Voice of New Haven, under the editorship of William Winnick. It is a modest mimeographed effort, sometimes a single legal-sized sheet, sometimes two. But it crusades vigorously on the issues, urges members to attend meetings, and succeeds in infusing the local with life. Winnick is active in civil rights affairs in the city; under his editorship, the Voice called for unity between two separate white and Negro locals.

The Voice charges that in Local 234-486, "contractor-employers dominate the affairs of the local and maintain an atmosphere of fear and reprisal." Winnick campaigned successfully for a resolution to oppose reprisals by employers against unionists who demand their contractual rights.

All this spirited and provocative criticism was too much for the local officials who found it easier to suppress Winnick than to answer him. In March, by a vote of 33-25 (out of 700 members), resolution No. 525 was adopted at a membership meeting.

It expresses its point of view so pointedly that we reprint it here for the convenience of John Birch chapters that might find it useful.

> Be it resolved that the following rules and regulations govern the writing and issuance by any member or members of any unofficial newsletter, pamphlet, bulletin, circular or any other unofficial publication dealing with the activities of this Local or any of its members:
> 1. Imprinted across the top of each and every publication there shall be printed in bold, black letters of not less than 1/2 inch in height and 1/16 of an inch in width the following: "THIS IS NOT AN OFFICIAL PUBLICATION OF LOCAL 234-486, AFM.
> 2. The names of all persons participating in the writing or issuance of said publication shall be prominently listed therein.
> 3. When any such publication contains material which defames the character of any member of this Local, the writer of such defamatory material shall be summoned to appear before the Executive Board to prove the truth of said defamation, and, if he cannot do so, he shall be penalized as herinafter provided.
> Any member who violates Section 1 or Section 2 of this Resolution shall be fined not more than $500.00. Any member who violates Section 3 of this Resolution shall for the first offense be fined not more than $1000.00 and for any subsequent offense he shall be expelled from this Union.

Winnick ignored the provisions and continued to edit the Voice without submitting to censorship. He was brought to trial and convicted. But when seventeen local members appealed to the International, it ordered the local to rescind the gag-rule.

IAM ORGANIZERS WIN STAFF UNION

Staff organizers of the International Association of Machinists have successfully launched their own union, the IAM Representatives Association. The new union won a collective bargaining election in July 108-91. Plato Papps, IAM Chief Counsel, said that the results of the vote would be honored; and the union has been recognized by the IAM.

In a letter announcing the victory, Franklin Nix, head of the temporary Organizing Committee wrote:

> I pointed out to you how we planned to insure democracy and absolute secrecy in the nomination and election of your officers. You should be thinking now about nominations and which representatives you consider best qualified to serve you. Every person in the bargaining unit is eligible for membership and for nomination and election to any office. As pointed out previously, the call for nominations will direct that they be returned to a certified public accountant here not to me. The same procedure will be followed for the election. The nominations—and later the election results—will be tabulated by the certified public accountant in the presence of ministers of three faiths. The certified tabulations will be furnished to all participating members. No effort will be spared to see to it that this is your union which you run for your benefit.

This new union has its direct origins in the IAM international elections of 1961-62. At that time, the IAM top officialdom decided to get rid of Vice President Roy M. Brown and cut him off the administration slate for reelection. Brown ran for Secretary Treasurer as an oppositionist.

Among other things, the split between Brown and the administration stemmed from the expulsion of Joe Addison who had brought charges of misusing funds against a District official in California. Addison was promptly expelled by International President Hayes after hearings before a Special Trial Board which he, himself, appointed. Brown would not adjust calmly to this atrocity; the administration machine had to cut him down. (Addison went to court and won reinstatement and damages.)

When Brown went down to defeat, nine West Coast representatives who had supported him were instantly fired by Hayes. The move to form a staff union soon began.

The following comment is reprinted from the Banner, published by IAM Local 1853 in Chico, California, under the spirited editorship of Bob Neiter, President.

An election was held and our Grand Lodge Representatives now have their own union. Now after spending time and effort in representing the rank and file membership, they can turn their own problems over to a representative of their own. In plain language, they have a union that will protect them from their own union employers.

Events in the past decade have definitely pointed out the need of such an association. It just doesn't make sense to protect the job security of others, when your own job security is tied to the whims of our International President and/or his Executive Council.

When Al Hayes as Pres., fired nine West Coast GLRs, they had no union to turn to in protecting their job security. They have had to resort to our Federal Courts in seeking the justice that was denied them. There were many more cases around the country, including the actions of some of the "Special Trial Boards." One of these so called Trial Boards found Bro. Joe Addison, guilty of trumped up charges and he was kicked out of the union. Joe was a fighter that wouldn't take a lot of abuse lying down. After he had gone through all channels open to him in the union, he went to Federal Court and was cleared, plus collecting damages.

Nine GLRs fired right here in our own back yard and the membership accepted this with their usual apathy. The many times that these GLRs had gone to bat for the members, was quickly forgotten. A strong GLR association could have prevented this miscarriage of justice and the buildup of the unrestricted power that could even wreck the career of Roy M. Brown, one of the most labor dedicated IVPs on the Executive Council.

The IAM Representatives Association, will of course be a small organization in regards to total membership, but nevertheless there is no reason why it can't be a very effective one. The representatives with their new found job security, can and should give better representation to the rank and file membership. So, everyone in our great Machinist's organization will gain from this newly formed union.

Credit where credit is due: Franklin Nix, who so ably handled the work of cementing together and forming the new organization, is to be congratulated on winning the election, and thanked for his many hours, weeks and months of hard work leading up to the election. But, let's not neglect to give a great deal of credit where due, the brutal tactics of past Pres. Hayes and past Sec.-Treas. Walker, at least in my estimation, these two were the contributing factors that made the election possible as well as the winning of it.

Morrisey published a four-page tabloid newspaper, the Call for NMU Democracy, to urge delegates to uphold his proposals for democratization of the union. He began to distribute the paper in mid-August. What followed is described by his attorney, Burton H. Hall:

> A few days later, Morrissey's photograph and the photograph of Joseph Padilla (who had helped Morrissey distribute the Call) were posted in the security shacks of the various piers in the ports of Newark and New York, with instructions that they be barred from access to any vessels—and in consequence, Morrissey and Padilla have since been prevented from going on board NMU vessels to distribute the Call.
> On Saturday, August 20, Morrissey went to the General Post Office in Manhattan to pick up mail at the post office box maintained there by him in the name of the Call. He collected the mail, took it to his automobile (parked outside) and opened it.
> One envelope that he picked up and opened turned out to contain a quantity of marijuana. Instead of simply throwing it away, Morrissey immediately took it to the postal inspector and explained to him what had happened. After a bit of fencing, Morrissey learned that on Friday, the post office had received an anonymous letter, composed by pasting words cut out from magazines onto a sheet of paper (i.e., the classic style for ransom notes), which purported to be from the father of a drug addict and complaining that Morrissey's post office box was a narcotics drop. The same day, the same anonymous tip or complaint was made by telephone to the New York Times. And the same day, the envelope containing marijuana arrived. From that moment on Morrissey's box was watched to see what happened. The "tips" seemed suspicious; for one thing, such tips are usually made either to a newspaper or to the authorities, but hardly ever to both; for another, the amount of marijuana in the envelope was ridiculously small; and for another, Morrissey had been checked out and had no record at all with the narcotics bureau. When Morrissey turned the marijuana in, it became clear that the whole thing was merely an attempted frame-up; but if he had kept it on his person, he would have been arrested promptly and would have faced automatic expulsion from the NMU.
> The following Monday (August 22), Morrissey drove to the NMU hall, parked his car outside, went inside to distribute the Call, and later returned to his car. As he opened the door, he was stopped by two policemen. It seems that they had received an anonymous tip that there was a gun concealed in Morrissey's car. A discussion ensued in which Morrissey explained what was going on; the policemen left, apparently satisfied.

A trumped-up marijuana charge could be particularly damaging to Morrisey. According to the NMU constitution, a member convicted of dealing in narcotics is subject to summary discipline.

WASHINGTON PAINTERS CALL FOR INVESTIGATION

Two murders in California and a near-murder in New York have turned the spotlight on a struggle by courageous union reformers for decency and democracy in the painting industry. The story now focuses on Washington, D.C.

In California, the two slain unionists had exposed a collusive racket in the painting of city houses financed in part with federal funds. In New York, Jack Graham, an employer, was beaten almost to death for refusing to join a bid-rigging conspiracy. A Grand Jury heard testimony that implicated crooked employers, union officials, and city inspectors in a scheme for defrauding the city by shoddy work.

And now more of the same in Washington. On August 23, eight members of Painters District Council 51 presented evidence to the General Services Administration that painting contractors had cheated the federal government of more than $75,000 in jobs on federally financed buildings in Gaitersburg, Md., including the National Bureau of Standards atomic reactor and seven offices and laboratories.

The Washington painters group was led by E. B. Mann. He is 58, and has been a union member for 35 years, and has founded the Painters' Cleanup Club, as a reform caucus of some 200 members in DC 51.

Mann said that he had complained to GSA more than fifteen months ago. GSA, which controls vast amounts of government property and is responsible for many construction projects, is in charge of enforcing painting specifications in this case. But Mann charged that its inspectors were incompetent and that the government had paid for three coats of paint but got only one.

GSA officials promised Mann to go promptly with him and inspect the sites of the presumed defective jobs; but when the first week dragged out without the promised trip, some Congressmen became restive. Representative Dante Fascell (Fla.) called for an investigation by the House Subcommittee on Government Operations and its chairman, Jack Brooks (Tex.), agreed. If the Committee starts with the Washington area, there is no reason why it should not look elsewhere.

In April, Mann's Cleanup Club won a federal suit to remove two District officials who had been convicted of felonies. The International's General Executive Board has insisted on keeping them in office. One of them, Robert Lowery, had been convicted of bribery and extortion in 1955. In the District elections in June, Lowry ran for the top job of Secretary Treasurer despite the federal court ruling. The Cleanup Club threw its support to Al Magnum who defeated Lowry in a close vote. Two other candidates were elected Business Agents with the support of reformers: Lou Donaldson and Herschel Slosky.

District Council 51 has a membership of about 1,400 divided into seven locals; five are regular painters locals; two are so-called "autonomous" locals of auxiliary trades.

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE

In June, a citizens group, Committee for an Investigation of the Wilson-Green Murders and Racketeering in the Painting Industry, addressed the letter below to Attorney General Katzenbach. His office replied to this and other letters that the Department of Justice was indeed interested in these matters. The fruits of its investigation, if any, are yet to be revealed.

As you know, two union leaders were murdered in San Francisco in April and May: Dow Wilson, Secretary of Painters Local 4, and Lloyd Green, Secretary of Painters Local 1178. We are gratified that the local police have announced some progress in solving one of these murders. Nevertheless, our Committee, many miles from the scene, addresses an appeal to you, because this is not a matter for San Francisco alone.

We are face to face with an urgent national problem. Here in New York, for example, a grand jury investigation has heard testimony on a racket in city painting involving millions of dollars and has brought in several indictments. In San Francisco, two union men were murdered. In New York, an employer was beaten almost to death and survived by a miracle. Clearly employers and unionists are common victims of racketeers.

This, then is surely not a "business" affair; we do not believe that businessmen stoop to murder for profit. This is surely not a "labor" affair; we do not believe that labor men settle internal union disputes by killings. We are convinced that these are crimes committed by enemies of the labor movement, enemies of business, enemies of ordinary human decency.

We fear that the San Francisco murders, like the beating in New York, may be an expression of a serious infiltration of racketeers into one of our nation's most important industries. The network of gangs and rackets is too far-flung and entrenched to be dealt with adequately by local authorities alone.

We join in the request made by California unionists to urge you to utilize the resources at your command to help track down all the San Francisco killers and to order an investigation into the painting industry with a view to wiping our rackets and crime.

We make this urgent request to protect labor, to protect business, and to defend the community from coldblooded murderers like those who revealed themselves in San Francisco.

The Committee members are: Melvin L. Wulf, Chief Counsel, American Civil Liberties Union; Norman Thomas, Socialist leader; Harvey Swados, author; Clyde W. Summers, Professor of Law, Yale University; Frank Schonfeld, reform leader in Painters' union; Meyer Schapiro, art historian; Bayard Rustin, civil rights leader; Rt. Rev. Msgr. Charles Owen Rice, pastor of Holy Rosary Church of Pittsburgh; Robert Repas, Associate Professor of Industrial Relations, Michigan State University; Morris Milgram, interracial housing developer; James McNamara, labor union official; John M. Mecartney, Sociology Instructor, Albion College; Ernest Mazey, Executive Director, Michigan Civil Liberties Union; Charles Larrowe, Professor of Economics, Michigan State University; Irving Howe, author, and editor of Dissent; Samuel Hirsch, President, Roosevelt Independent Democrats; Michael Harrington, author, The Other America; Burton H. Intimidation?

The members of Local 12 are not intimidated and anyone who says so will be expelled—that appears to be the position taken by the appeals panel. On the other hand, to back up their contrary charge that critics are indeed afraid of retaliation, reformers in Local 12 claim the following:

August, 1957: that Charles M. Inglis was kicked and beaten by paid employees of Local 12 and, charge the reformers, won damages of more than $13,000 for the assault from the Local and from his assailants.

July, 1958: that Jack Davenport, member, was beaten by a Local 12 Business Agent who was convicted in a California court for the offense.

December 11, 1964: that Kevin Walsh, a reform leader, was struck from behind at a membership meeting as he was speaking from the microphone.

January, 1966: that a Business Agent in Bakersfield, California, assaulted a member, Loyd Ottele, who complained that he had not been handling grievances properly (the same Business Agent who beat Inglis).

Premature Death of Tom Deacon

In February, 1963, while deeply engaged in his fight in Local 12, Tom Deacon got a telephone call from a Union Business Agent who said, "I just heard that you were killed in an automobile accident." Deacon wanted to know where the news came from and the B.A. replied that one of the office girls had heard it broadcast over T.V. Deacon wanted to speak to the girl but was told that she no longer worked there; apparently she had quit within ten minutes. He checked every T.V. and radio station to discover that no such report had been made.

His attorney protested to Business Manager Seymour that the incident was a veiled threat to his client and Seymour replied ten days later that a mistake had been made and that actually the reference should have been to a man named Deason (Seymour's friend). This deepened the mystery because, according to Deacon, his near-namesake Deason was quite alive, in good health, not involved in any accident and lived far from Los Angeles.

Deacon, Local 12, and the Los Angeles Police

On March 15, 1965, Deacon wrote to the Los Angeles Chief of Police that his life had been threatened. According to Deacon, Dick Rohr, a member of the Machinists' Union, met a member of Local Union No. 12 in a bar who said that he had orders to kill Deacon and pointed out a pistol and a sawed-off shotgun in his car as the murder tools. Rohr immediately contacted the FBI and informed Deacon who, in turn, made a formal complaint to the FBI and to the police Department in Downey. In his March 15 letter, Deacon reported all these facts to Police Chief William A. Parker and requested police protection at the next Union meeting.

Deacon reported that he had given no one copies of his letter to Parker and yet an exact copy of the letter, complete with typographical errors, turned up in the possession of Local 12's Business Manager who used it to file a libel complaint against Deacon.

The Los Angeles Police Department has not replied to long-standing requests to explain how this private letter might have been detoured into the hands of the attorneys of the Union and Business Manager Seymour, of Local 12.

ing out Deacon. Its reasoning may be summed up in this: Deacon was expelled because he accused the officialdom of intimidating the membership. This action will, of course, convince the membership that it need have no fear.

In February, 1965, Deacon's associates founded the Association for Democratic Procedures. In some respects, this group is unique. Except in the International Typographical Union with its history of permanent internal political organization, most opposition groups storm into being over immediate issues, struggle for power or survival, and pass out of existence. The Association, however, was chartered as a continuing nonprofit corporation to promote democracy in the labor movement and, in particular, "to educate and suggest means and methods for establishing and maintaining democratic methods and procedures within the International Union of Operating Engineers."

The formation of the Association was not the beginning of the group's activities; it was a decision to make them continuous and systematic. At the Appeal Panel sessions, Deacon was interrogated about the Association and he proudly admitted that he was its founder.

A LOOK AT THE BOOKS?

Back in October, 1963, Deacon set out to discover how the Local's money was handled. Its annual income was about $2.5 million; and he wanted to know precisely how and why all this money was spent. He requested permission to inspect the books for 1961, including vouchers, receipts, and cancelled checks. The local officers turned him down. He appealed in vain to the International's General Executive Board. In April, 1964, he filed suit in California court; and by May, the lowest court ordered the local to make the relevant records available to him and his accountant. That first success, two and a half years ago, was only the start of a long ordeal punctuated by the expulsion.

The local went to the state Appellate court; in August, 1965, it lost. The local appealed, then, to the California Supreme Court; it was turned down in September, 1965. It persisted up to the U.S. Supreme Court which rejected its application for a hearing on February 21, 1966. In all this, the union officials were spending out of the union treasury; Deacon and friends were paying out their own money.

Still, Thomas M. Deacon, in quest of the simple right to inspect his union's books had successfully survived through the gamut of U.S. jurisprudence. It was long; it was expensive; it was nerve-wracking. At last, however, justice was done. The U.S. Supreme Court had spoken. The little man had triumphed over a rich and powerful bureaucracy. What a crashing vindication of American justice, rights of the individual, the Judeo-Christian tradition, all we hold sacred!

But not so fast. Deacon had won a court battle, but what about those books and records? Meanwhile, a parallel story was unfolding. Deacon, in all this time, was on trial in the union; and just as the Supreme Court ruled finally in his favor, he was finally expelled. On March 2, 1966, flushed with Supreme Court victory, Deacon asked again to look at the books with his accountant. A week later, he got the bad news. The local informed him that Thomas Deacon, union member, could inspect the books. But please note that you are no longer a member because we threw you out, so kindly go away. With that, complete with new lawyers' fees and court costs, back to the legal defense of our way of life.

The officials were still tapping the treasury for legal fees; Deacon was still paying his own.

Back in court on March 30, 1966, the judge again ordered

the local to make the 1961 records available to Tom Deacon, ex-member, within thirty days. The thirty stretched out to sixty, and sixty to ninety when the union suggested more time to get everything in order; and at last the appointed moment arrived. Deacon appeared at the local office on Friday, June 24, 1966, with a certified public accountant and two lawyers: Don Edgar Burris and Elaine Fischel. They were all dispatched to the union's basement garage to puzzle over a shoebox of ambiguous documents while automobiles came in and out with brakes screeching.

Right at the start there was trouble when James E. Gillett, CPA for Deacon, requested certain routine information from the union's accountant. The union's lawyer intervened and instructed him not to reply. From then on, all questions had to be funneled through the union's lawyer; but whenever he was called away, everything stalled. After a while, Gillett asked for some relevant payroll records; they were not available and everyone had to go home to give the union a chance to find them. That was the end of Friday.

The following Monday, June 27, Accountant Gillett arrived promptly at 9:00 A.M. only to be told that the payroll records had not turned up. He left, not wanting to waste his time and Deacon's money. When he returned at 1:00 P.M. part of the records were there but it did him no good. He couldn't work on them because the local officials refused to permit him to plug his electric adding machine into an outlet.

The day dragged on. Sometimes the union refused to produce records; sometimes it denied that they existed; sometimes it found them after long delay. When a search into a basement vault proved unsuccessful, it was detoured "upstairs." But whenever and wherever the records were stored, it took a long time to produce them.

Abruptly, a photographer appears, points a camera at the Deacon inspection team. They object; a long wrangle while no one admits to knowing who sent the picture man. At a moment when they are off guard, he snaps the picture anyway. Meanwhile, Deacon is busy duplicating certain documents on a photocopying machine which he had to rent himself, having been granted even this small privilege only after extended argument. For two years he had been trying for a job through the union's hiring hall. In all that time, the local apparently couldn't get him a day's work. But now, two years later, while he was in the basement, a call came over the loud speaker. Surprise! At last a job for Tom, but he would have to leave quickly. Deacon passed up his big chance to go on with the inspection.

By Monday, Deacon's team decided to end the farce. The lost two days are recounted in detail in a complaint by attorneys Burrish and Fischel asking a contempt citation against the union. All in all, the performance rivaled Barnum and Bailey. But for Deacon, it was a costly circus. He was paying his own good money for accountant and lawyer: the union officials continued to draw upon the members' money.

The Deacon Odyssey continues.

Elections and Re-Elections

Officers of Local 12 were busy defending the sanctity of its financial records from membership scrutiny; they were promoting harmony by expelling Deacon. They also ran elections, more accurately, re-elections. Between May 29 and June 22, 1964, members voted for local officers. Three major contenders sought the top job of Business Manager: Joseph Seymour, incumbent; R. B. Bronson, a former Manager; and Joseph R. Hurley, the candidate of the reformers, an officer of the Association for Democratic Procedures.

Seymour, in power, naturally had everything going for him. There were some sixty full-time Business Agents and 100 stewards who, we must assume, were sympathetic to his cause; they were all appointed by him. And there were twenty Board members and seven election committee members elected on his slate. He printed up pamphlets, handbills, and cards and mailed them out to the whole membership list. The reformers did as best they could, passing out literature hand to hand. It was impossible for them to reach the list of 22,000. The announced results were: Of 22,000 members, 9,500 cast valid ballots. Seymour was credited with 5,049; Bronson, with 2,037; Hurley was listed with 1,593. But it is difficult for an outside observer to decide what resemblance the official tally bore to reality; for the reformers protested the election; and the Department of Labor went to court to set it aside.

To run for the top job, a candidate must have been in continuous good standing for five years, paying dues promptly every single month, never late. For other top officers, three years. But Local 12 members follow construction jobs and live almost nomadically. Thousands change their residence in three years. Periods of concentrated work are followed by long unemployment. Moving about and paying dues when they are flush, a big majority is automatically disqualified from running for top office. Deacon, Walsh, and their followers charged that the election process was illegal, that the balloting was suspect from start to finish, that ballots mailed to a post box were removed without check by observers, that opposition watchers were kept behind ropes and not allowed close enough to check the official tellers. Their complaint was rejected in the union and they appealed to the Department of Labor.

After investigating, the Department found that the complaint was valid and filed suit in federal court to void the election. It remains to be seen whether this unusual little victory will bring substantial consolation to the embattled reformers. A glance at the calendar of events is disquieting:

June, 1964: Election completed.

July: Reformers complain to their union.

October: Department of Labor begins investigation.

October, 1964—April, 1965: Fall leaves, Winter snow, Spring showers. The Department continues to investigate.

April, 1965: Secretary of Labor files suit in federal court.

October: Pretrial conference. Case set for trial. More leaves, more snow, more showers.

August, 1966: Trial postponed to September.

Total time lapse so far: two years, four months.

As the Department of Labor and the court drift along their meandering course, the officials remain in power and use their authority to expel Deacon. Were they legally installed when Deacon was thrown out? There is another interesting question. Seymour was elected, perhaps illegally, in 1964 for a three-year term which expires in mid-1967. Will the term expire before the Department of Labor gets around to a new election. A hot race rages between the tortoise and the turtle.

Any accurate history of the operating engineers union must record extortion, murder, theft, blacklisting, fraud, and violence against members. But it must record equally the efforts of brave men who fight for decency and democracy motivated by the ideals and principles of the labor movement.

In San Francisco, Dow Wilson and Lloyd Green, painters who fought against corruption and for their members' rights, were murdered. But their fight goes on. Because the labor movement inspires men to demand social justice, there will always be unionists like Wilson and Green and like Tom Deacon. The rights of such men and their physical survival are the responsibility of the whole democratic community.

Findings and Policy

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that the growth in size, scope, and numbers of employee welfare and pension benefit plans in recent years has been rapid and substantial; that the continued well-being and security of millions of employees and their dependents are directly affected by these plans; that they are affected with a national public interest; that they have become an important factor affecting the stability of employment and the successful development of industrial relations; that they have become an important factor in commerce because of the interstate character of their activities, and of the activities of their participants, and the employers, employee organizations, and other entities by which they are established or maintained; that owing to the lack of employee information concerning their operation, it is desirable in the interests of employees and their beneficiaries, and to provide for the general welfare and the free flow of commerce, that disclosure be made with respect to the operation and administration of such plans.

(b) It is hereby declared to be the policy of this Act to protect interstate commerce and the interests of participants in employee welfare and pension benefit plans and their beneficiaries, by requiring the disclosure and reporting to participants and beneficiaries of financial and other information with respect thereto.

SEC. 3.[2] When used in this Act—

(1) The term "employee welfare benefit plan" means any plan, fund, or program which is communicated[3] or its benefits described in writing to the employees, and which was heretofore or is hereafter established by an employer or by an employee organization, or by both, for the purpose of providing for its participants or their beneficiaries, through the purchase of insurance or otherwise, medical, surgical, or hos-

ECONOMIC REVIEW

Vol. I, No. I — January, 1956

NOTICE

This is the first issue of Labor's Economic Review. It will be published monthly by the AFL-CIO Department of Research. This publication will be issued in addition to the other regular monthly publication, the AFL-CIO Collective Bargaining Report. Labor's Economic Review will have two sections: the first 8 pages each month will be devoted to a discussion of one important issue; the last 4 pages will consist of economic notes dealing with important economic trends and developments.

Union Security:

The "Right-to-Work" Controversy

There has been much public discussion in recent years about the closed shop and union shop. There is also a good deal of misunderstanding about the meaning of those terms.

The closed shop and union shop are forms of union security provisions in collective-bargaining agreements. Most of the 125,000 labor-management contracts in the United States contain some type of union security provision. The record shows that the overwhelming majority of American workers in union-organized establishments endorse the idea of union security.

What does union security mean?

Union security refers to a provision in a collective bargaining contract between a union and employer that makes union membership a condition of employment. There are many different varieties and modifications of union-security provisions. In general, they fall into the following categories:

1. Closed Shop—Employees must be members of the union at the time they are hired by the employer and must remain members of the union during the period of their employment.

EDUCATION NEWS and VIEWS

Vol. 3, NO. 2 FEBRUARY, 1958 TWENTY CENTS

Meeting in Miami Beach, Florida, on February 6, 1958, the AFL-CIO Executive Council called upon the Administration and Congress to meet the recent Soviet challenge by moving "boldly and quickly" in education.

AFL-CIO Calls for Adequate Federal Aid for Schools

"The future of our children and the world they inherit is at stake," emphasized the Council.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council also pointed out that:

"While Sputniks have dramatized our failures, the crisis in education has been with us for years. Every day of further neglect puts us further behind. America cannot afford to wait any longer. At every level, our educational system must be strengthened. No child should be deprived of the best possible educational opportunities because of lack of school facilities, because of lack of qualified teachers, because of financial difficulties or because of racial discrimination."

The Council charged that "the President's proposed budget requests $300 million less for all types of educational activities than he requested in his last year's budget—before Sputnik."

"This incredible feat—reducing our educational sights in the face of new Soviet challenges—was accomplished simply by dropping completely any recommendations for a school construction program and by substantially curtailing the ten-year-old program of federal assistance to school districts affected by the impact of United States government installations.

"America, of course, needs more scientists and engineers. But we also need better trained diplomats and social scientists and language experts. The total war against tyranny depends upon our children's grasp of the humanities as well as the sciences. But neither the physical nor the social scientists will come from a vacuum. Their college and post-graduate training must be based upon a sound grounding in fundamentals at the primary and secondary levels. Yet, the Administration has abandoned the school construction program—with the prospect looming of a 500,000 classroom shortage within 5 years."

Five-Page Section On "Right-To-Work"

Five pages of background materials on "right-to-work" appear in this issue of Education News and Views. This supplements the material contained in our December, 1957, issue.

Page 8 highlights some of the ways "right-to-work" groups are pushing to pass laws that the Akron Beacon Journal said on December 26, 1957, "The purpose of these laws is to weaken unions which already exist and to discourage organization efforts."

The Idaho farm article by Ed Emerine, on page 9, is well worth reading. He indicates that a "right-to-work" law will not help farmers but may hurt them by lowering wages for city workers and having that much less spent on farm products.

On page 10 you will find a comparison of hourly pay in "right-to-work" states with hourly pay in a neighboring state that does not have a "right-to-work" law.

Who Passed the Florida RTW?

It was put through by rural voters in the 1947 referendum. The "right-to-work" bill was defeated in the urban areas, but it carried by such a wide margin in the rural areas that it overcame the "no" vote from the cities. (See page 11.)

Included also in this issue is a summary of the ways in which the Washington State labor movement and a wide variety of community organizations worked to defeat RTW in 1952.

Even Republicans Oppose It!

So successful was the campaign in Washington that this year where another attempt is being made to pass a "right-to-work" law, the Washington Republican State Central Committee, meeting in Yakima on February 1, voted 34 to 24 to oppose the measure. The Democratic Party also opposes it.

What's in a Name?

A lot of trickery when the name is "right-to-work." Several states have refused to allow that name to be used on the ballot on the grounds that it is deceptive and misleading. Try calling it the COMPULSORY OPEN SHOP LAW and many more people will know what you're talking about.

You Have a Job to Do

The materials in the two issues of Education News and Views can be used by local union education committees, not only in the local union, but in the community, in educating on the phony "right-to-work" issue.

LABOR'S ECONOMIC REVIEW

PUBLISHED BY AFL-CIO

Vol. 3, No. 6-7 June-July, 1958

In Brief

The vast majority of industries seek areas of growing markets, natural resources and available manpower with the necessary skills—not "right-to-work" laws. The kinds of industry that may be attracted by anti-labor laws are fly-by-night sweatshops and some low-wage, lower priced soft-goods plants that are looking for areas with available unskilled workers. "Right-to-work" laws do not and cannot promote a state's prosperous growth.

"Right-to-Work" Promises—False:

Everyone knows that prosperity goes hand in hand with economic growth. Everyone wants prosperity—for his community, his state, and the nation as a whole.

This normal desire for prosperity has been twisted into a weapon by propagandists for anti-union legislation in the states. Since 1944, eighteen states have adopted laws forbidding labor and management to make union security agreements. Under these misnamed "right-to-work" laws, the union shop, maintenance of membership and other union security provisions are illegal.

Along with other confusing and misleading claims, propagandists for "right-to-work" laws have sought to prove that compulsory open-shop legislation will lead to more prosperous conditions in any state. Such laws, they say, attract new industry and stimulate economic growth.

Common sense economics, however, proves the opposite. Community prosperity, as everyone knows, depends on customers, with money to buy products of flourishing business. Attracting new industry depends on available manpower, on labor skills, on resources—both natural and man-made—on transportation, and on the general living and education standards of people in the area.

Low-wage, anti-union laws cannot create any of these attractions. Instead, such legislation can actually hamper improvements in wages, hours and working conditions by weakening union organization and collective bargaining.

"Right-to-work" laws, it is true, may attract some anti-union low-wage companies in soft-goods industries, such as textile and shoe manufacturing. Such companies look for areas with large numbers of unskilled workers who will work for low wages without union conditions.

"Right to Work" in Practice

FREDERIC MEYERS

The Anti-Union Warmongers

by Thomas E. Harris

The professional warmongers of the class war, the people who make a rich if not a good living out of exacerbating labor-management relations, have chosen Oklahoma as their next battleground. Having lost five of their last six battles, the "right-to-work" crowd has evidently decided that Oklahoma offers them a favorable terrain.

The character of these people can be judged by their choice of the label, "right-to-work." That is a deliberately misleading term. The proposal has nothing to do with the right to work. It doesn't even involve the right to work without joining a union because the right to work is dependent upon finding employers who will offer a job. There is one government which in its constitution provides for the right to work; there is one constitutional provision in fact which uses that term—maybe that's where the right-to-work publicists got it. This provision reads: "Citizens...have the right to work; that is, the right to guaranteed employment." That is Section 118 of the Constitution of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

This sort of guarantee is, of course, not possible unless the government itself undertakes to provide employment; and in Russia it is accompanied by a drawback. Citizens not only have the right to work; they have the duty to work and at whatever job they are told to do. In this country considerable steps have been taken by the government during the last 30 years to encourage full employment. But our government has never undertaken to guarantee work to everyone; and the "right-to-work" crowd would be the last to advocate it.

The real purpose of "right-to-work" laws is not to give people a right to work but that employers alone, without negotiating with a union, shall decide who is to be hired, who is to be fired and what their wages, hours and other conditions of employment shall be.

Their real purpose is to destroy unions and collective bargaining. This is clear when one looks at the question of why workers want and need unions at all.

Chief Justice Hughes, in a famous case, said: "Long ago we stated the reason for labor organizations. We said that they were organized out of the necessities of the situation; that a single employe was helpless in dealing with an employer; that he was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for maintenance of himself and family; that, if the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and resist arbitrary and unfair treatment; that union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on an equality with their employer." [1]

Put less eloquently, workers band together in unions so that by acting together they can increase their bargaining power and get better wages and working conditions and greater personal security and dignity.

THOMAS E. HARRIS is associate general counsel, AFL-CIO. This article is based on an address delivered before the Oklahoma State AFL-CIO convention, held in Tulsa in January.

A union's bargaining strength and its members' hope of securing better wages and working conditions and of being able to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment by employers depend upon all of the workers involved acting together. Any worker who refuses to join the union weakens it and diminishes the likelihood that his fellow workers shall be able to win better wages and working conditions.

A worker who won't join a union is a potential strikebreaker; a scab. Indeed, the term "scab" originally meant simply a worker who would not join a union. The Oxford English Dictionary still defines "scab" as "a workman who refuses to join an organized movement on behalf of his trade." It was only later that the term "scab" came usually to be used as synonymous with "strikebreaker." So, if the epithet "scab" is used in its original sense these laws may accurately be called "right-to-scab" laws. Even if "scab" is used, as it generally now is, as the equivalent of strikebreaker, the label "right-to-scab" law would not be far off since workers who refuse to join the union of their fellow workers are potential scabs.

The strength of a union depends on what proportion of the workers are loyal to it. In some situations it is impossible for a union to maintain itself without some sort of union security; and in all situations union security gives added strength to a union.

In the construction industry, jobs on each project last only a limited period of time. Building tradesmen cannot possibly maintain a union unless they have some sort of union security agreement with the contractors or unless the unions have a voice in hiring. The same thing is true wherever there is a large turnover among workers, as in restaurants, even though the enterprise itself is permanent.

But the need for union security is not limited to these situations. The National Labor Relations Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to hire union men just because they are union men. It forbids an employer to discriminate among applicants on this ground. Twenty years ago I argued in the Supreme Court the case which established this interpretation of the National Labor Relations Act. It was the Phelps Dodge case. This was a great victory or at least we thought it was a great victory at the time. But somehow over the last 20 years there have not been many Board cases implementing that decision. Employers who want to discriminate against union men in filling vacancies seem to have found ways of doing it. In a small town or a rural area the people who run the employment office are apt to know whether applicants are union men. Some employers subscribe to services which supply "information" about job applicants. At the least the job application form will require the listing of past employments and the employer will know whether that employment was at a unionized plant or job.

It may be very difficult to prove that an employer is discriminating against union applicants. Thus after a while, depending on the rate of turnover, an employer can, if there is no union security contract, turn a union majority into an anti-union majority. Then his stooges in the plant petition for decertification.

It is surely not a coincidence that the employers who back "right-to-work" laws are employers who are unwilling to deal with unions at all. Employers who recognize unions, and who expect to keep on recognizing them, show little interest in "right-to-work" agitation. That is one reason I say the real purpose of "right-to-work" laws is to destroy unions and collective bargaining.

There is another reason for saying it. It is that the philosophy of right-to-work laws is basically inconsistent with collective bargaining.

There are a number of different labor relations policies which a nation conceivably might adopt, as to where control is vested over such matters as hiring, firing, wages, hours and working conditions.

One possible solution is to leave these matters to the decision of the employer. That is the system which existed everywhere in this country before workers could legally form unions and in general it still prevails where there are no unions. In theory under this system the employer and the individual worker negotiate the terms of employment; but as Chief Justice Hughes explained, the reality is that the worker must accept the employer's terms.

A second possible national labor relations policy is for the state to fix all of the conditions of employment. That is, of course, the system which is followed in the Soviet Union, where the state is the employer; and it is followed in part in several other countries, even with respect to plants which remain under private ownership. It is even followed to a minor degree in this country, by way of minimum wage, child labor laws, etc.

A third possible system is that which in most respects is followed in this country and in Great Britain; that is the system of collective bargaining. Under that system, if a majority of employes in a plant or other unit choose to bargain collectively—and that normally means through a union—the employer must bargain with them and the agreement reached is binding on all the employes in the unit whether they join the union or not and like the contract or not.

This system developed in this country beginning in the middle part of the 19th century and in this century it was adopted by Congress as the national labor relations policy, first with regard to railway labor in 1926 and with regard to industry generally in 1935. This system has great advantages. It gives the workers, if a majority of them so choose, a voice in negotiating their terms of employment. It not only enables workers to obtain better wages and shorter hours but security on the job and enhanced personal dignity. From the standpoint of the employer, the system preserves private ownership and gives him an equal and normally a more than equal voice in determining wages and working conditions. As many employes see it, the long range choice for them is not between collective bargaining and employer dictation of the terms of employment, but between collective bargaining and state dictation. They prefer collective bargaining.

Even the right-to-work crowd usually profess to believe in collective bargaining; but right-to-work laws are basically and totally inconsistent with it.

Collective bargaining presupposes, and federal law provides, that the bargain made with the employer by the union binds all the employes in the unit. If individual employes, such as those who don't want to join the union or who don't like the particular contract negotiated by the union, are free to make their own deal with the employer that is the end of collective bargaining. If individuals can undercut the union wage to get work, that ends the union wage.

Under a system of collective bargaining, the contract which the union negotiates may determine all the major conditions of the worker's industrial life. It may determine that he gets paid $3.00 an hour instead of $1.25; that he works a 35-hour week instead of a 40-hour week; that he is subject to discharge only for cause, with the right to go to arbitration, instead of subject to discharge at the whim of the foreman; that lay-offs are made according to seniority instead of favoritism; that when he retires he receives a pension instead of being a public charge, etc.

A "right-to-work" law carves out a single exception. Where a "right-to-work" law is in effect, the collective bargaining agreement may control every phase of the worker's industrial life, except that it may not provide that he shall join the union or pay dues to it. As a citizen of the industrial community the worker is still bound by whatever agreement the union negotiates, but the law gives him the option of declining membership and refusing to pay dues. His life as a worker is regulated by the union contract and by law he enjoys whatever benefits the union wins but, like Indians in the old days, he isn't taxed and can't vote.

It is, of course, inconsistent to require that non-members participate equally in whatever gains the union wins, without requiring them to contribute their share of the costs of maintaining the union. That is the so-called "free rider" argument, which persuaded Senator Taft to preserve the union shop in the Taft-Hartley Act. But the inconsistency goes deeper.

As a matter of philosophic consistency, it is not possible to advocate a right-to-work law on the purported ground that compulsory membership violates the freedom of the individual worker and at the same time believe in collective bargaining, which gives the union the power to negotiate a contract regulating every aspect of the worker's industrial life.

A famous employer lawyer, Walter Gordon Merritt, has said that from their standpoint the right-to-work advocates are swallowing the camel and straining at the gnat. The camel is collective bargaining; the gnat is required membership. It is ridiculous, says Mr. Merritt, to vest in the majority of the workers, acting through a union, the power to write a collective bargaining agreement binding on everyone in the plant or on the job and then to say that out of concern for the individual worker's freedom he may not be required to join the union. He is subjected to majority rule as a citizen of the industrial community and it is absurd to exempt him from the responsibilities of citizenship.

Let's approach this from a different angle. The theory of the right-to-work laws is that the individual worker should not be compelled to join a union. But collective bargaining itself puts a worker under compulsion to join the union. The fact that the union will negotiate the contract which regulates the incidents of his industrial life itself puts him under powerful compulsion to join the union, since that is the only way he can have a voice in determining the provisions of the collective agreement. A senior employe who wants the union to forego a wage increase in favor of improved pensions not only has to join the union but to be active in it if he is to have any hope of making his views prevail. That sort of compulsion to join is inherent in collective bargaining.

On approximately that theory the Supreme Court of Louisiana ruled that under the state right-to-work law a collective bargaining agreement could not bind non-members. The court said:

"Would a non-union man's rights be diminished, reduced, curtailed or shortened if a union acted as his agent? We answer that question in the affirmative. There are instances where the union demands higher hourly wages and shorter hours. In order to be gainfully employed to support his family, a non-union man might be willing to make concessions. Liberty of contract is the non-union man's prerogative." [2]

The Louisiana court held, in other words, that the right not to join a union necessarily carries with it the right to seek work by undercutting union standards. The Louisiana legislature has, incidentally, since repealed the right-to-work law. No disaster has resulted. The state of Louisiana continues to attract industry and to grow.

The Attorney General of South Dakota has also ruled that under that state's "right-to-work" law collective bargaining is not permissible. He said: "You will note that the statute relates not only to the right to work, but also to the free exercise of the right to work. To me this can mean that any agreement which infringes upon the right to work in any of its aspects, whether it relate to the securing employment or whether it relate to bargaining after employment, is a violation of our law." [3]

This ruling is still in effect. The Louisiana court and the South Dakota Attorney General may not be on sound ground as a technical legal matter. But they are, I think, right that the basic philosophy of right-to-work laws is repugnant to collective bargaining and that means repugnant to unionism at all. That is why right-to-work laws are an attack on the very existence of unions.

Right-to-work laws are always promoted on the ground that they will attract out-of-state industry. How? By keeping unions weak and thus keeping wages down. Did you ever hear of anyone who believed in keeping wages down who believed in unions? Unions exist to fight for high wages. Did you ever hear of anyone who believed in unions, but in weak unions? People who believe in unions at all want strong unions. The promoters of right-to-work laws don't believe in unions at all, though some of them sometimes pretend to so that they won't seem to be as reactionary as they are.

Who promotes these right-to-work laws? There is a group of people in Washington, calling themselves the National Right-to-Work Committee, which makes a living out of this form of labor baiting. They have their counterparts in many states.

The concern these people avow for the freedom of workers is barefaced hypocrisy. To collect money and make a living for themselves they are willing and in fact eager to sow discord between labor and capital and at a time when national unity was never more needed. As far as these vultures are concerned, right-to-work laws are simply the carcass on which they feed and if Section 14(b) of Taft-Hartley is ever repealed they will find some other so-called cause on which to batten.

Obviously, however, the great bulk of the people who vote for right-to-work laws are not professional anti-unionists and unquestionably many of them are sincere and decent people. Why then do they vote for these laws?

One main reason is they are nostalgic for a simpler form of society, where people are not so dependent on each other, and on government, as they are these days. Many people look back to an earlier day when, supposedly at least, farmers owned their own small farms and marketed their own crops and a shoemaker made shoes and sold them to his neighbors. These stalwart yeomen and sturdy mechanics were dependent on no man or government or union. Maybe this vision of a Grandma Moses America has room for a small iron foundry where the owner even employs a few workers; but if so, he knows the workers by their first names, pays fairly and they don't need a union.

Some of the people who cherish this atavistic vision of the good life are probably themselves farmers who vote for government acreage controls, receive federal payments and market their crops through farm cooperatives, which enjoy special exemption from the anti-trust laws. Maybe they even irrigate with water from a federal dam, but who is consistent? Some of the people who cherish this vision are probably smalltown merchants who have no idea just how much or how little freedom a worker has in a big unorganized plant.

Anyway, there is not much room for unions in their picture of the ideal society. They are under the impression a worker has more freedom if he makes his own deal with an employer than if he is covered by a collective agreement negotiated by a union. To them compulsory union membership sounds like a grave infraction of individual freedom and it is small wonder they fall for right-to-work propaganda.

Whether fortunately or unfortunately, their concept of the ideal society has nothing to do with the realities of life in an industrial society in 20th century America. It was apparent even to a reactionary Supreme Court as early as 1921 that the worker's supposed freedom to make his own contract with an employer was illusory; and was simply the freedom to accept what the employer offered or go without work. As Justice Douglas said, for a unanimous Supreme Court in 1956: "One would have to be blind to history to assert that trade unionism did not enhance and strengthen the right to work." [4]

In 20th century urban industrialized America the alternative is not between unions and collective bargaining or going back to a simpler society of owner-producers and small businesses. Industrialization will continue at an increasing pace and huge corporations will grow huger. The alternatives are between giving the managers of these great enterprises the right unilaterally to decide what they will pay, who they will lay off, whether they will grant pensions, etc., and according a voice in these decisions to workers acting together in a union. Surely the latter alternative is the more democratic and the one which preserves to workers the greater degree of individual freedom.

It should be clear you are not engaged here in any limited war or minor skirmish. The right-to-work law is an attack upon the whole conception of collective bargaining and trade unionism. You are engaged in a total war. You must win it.

Political Memo from COPE

COMMITTEE ON POLITICAL EDUCATION, AFL-CIO
815 16th STREET, N.W.
WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

No. 27-62 December 31, 1962

Part 2: The Men, The Money, The Menace . . .

SCRATCH A RIGHT-WINGER AND YOU COME UP WITH AN RTW SUPPORTER

A listing of the right-wing groups and organizations which support the open shop campaign would approach a complete run-down of ultra-conservative groups. Thus, what follows will be a relatively brief treatment of only those groups which have readily apparent, direct ties to the National Right to Work Committee and its affiliates (see Memo, Dec. 17, 1962).

From NRTWC's first chairman, Edwin Dillard, to its present vice president and director of information, Glenn Green, John Birch Society members have always been prominent in the open shop movement in general and the NRTWC in particular. This is most evident at the state level — which is, after all, where support counts — and the pattern in Kansas, where the law was approved in 1958, is typical.

A Washington Post reporter who studied operation of the John Birch Society in Wichita ("under open colors") wrote that "The leadership of the Birch Society overlaps heavily with the leadership of the organizations that successfully campaigned in 1958 for a right-to-work amendment to the State Constitution." Two of these leaders, Coleman Company attorney Leonard Banowetz and box manufacturer Robert Love, were principal speakers at NRTWC's National Seminar in Chicago in 1961.

TOGETHERNESS

That the open-shop crowd is closely integrated with right-wing extremists was proved conclusively last April. Representatives of the National Right to Work Committee were included at a convention of rightist groups, among them the John Birch Society, National Indignation Convention, Young Americans for Freedom, Liberty Lobby, For America, We the People, the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies.

In terms of the links with employer groups at the local level it is also significant that Banowetz, a JBS field coordinator, is chairman of the Kansas State Chamber of Commerce's Labor Relation's Committee and Love, a member of the JBS National Council, was for five years a director of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Others in the Wichita Birch Society who were active in the open shop fight in Kansas were Rock Island Oil and Refining Co. president Fred Koch, lawyers Kenneth Myers and Thomas Woods, and personnel executive John Jury who, as noted in the last issue of the Memo, is a member of the Chamber of Commerce's Special Committee on Voluntary Unionism.

Still another John Birch Society member who appeared on the platform at NRTWC's 1961 seminar was S. Rayburn Watkins, managing director of the NAM affiliate in Kentucky, Associated Industries of Kentucky. Similarly, for the principal speaker at its 1960 board meeting, NRTWC chose ex-Rep. Wint Smith (R.-Kan.), a 1961 endorser of the John Birch Society.

Other leaders of the John Birch Society who have also been active in state "right-to-work" movements include F. Gano Chance of Missouri (a JBS Council member), James L. Doenges of Indiana (a JBS endorser), and Louis Ruthenberg of Indiana (a JBS Council member).

There are undoubtedly other overlaps with the John Birch Society, especially at the level of state "right-to-work" campaigns, but the above cover known public identifications.

OTHER NRTWC ALLIES: A ROSTER OF REACTION

American Enterprise Association: Organized in 1943 by a group of "industrial leaders" as a "nonpartisan research organization which examines the implications of current and prospective legislative proposals." States as its goal "to preserve the American principles of competitive enterprise and constitutional government."

Labor relations and unions are consistently a subject of AEA attention with a study in the field published at a rate of about one each year. Since 1955 these have included: Three Taft-Hartley Issues by Theodore Iserman, a member of the NAM Center for the Study of Union Power; Involuntary Participation in Unions by Philip Bradley, a contributor to one of the Chamber of Commerce booklets on "right-to-work"; Legal Immunities of Labor Unions by Roscoe Pound, who was formerly affiliated with the right wing Committee of Endorsers and its successor group, the Citizens Foreign Relations Committee; Economic Analysis of Labor Union Power by Edward Chamberlin, which concludes that "union power should be restricted"; Labor Unions and the Concept of Public Service by Roscoe Pound; and Unionism Reappraised by Goetz Briefs.

NRTWC reprinted excerpts from the last in pamphlet form. In addition to Iserman, four of the six "professor" members of the NAM's new Center for the Study of Union Power—Gottfried Haberler, James McKie, William Peterson and David McCord Wright—have all written at least one study for the American Enterprise Association.

Christian Crusade: Rev. Billy James Hargis, leader of this organization, has expressed himself clearly on the open shop issue, "The question involved in 'Right to Work Laws' is very simple and basic. It is the question as to whether or not an American citizen has a right to work at a job upon which he and his employer agree without being forced to join a union and pay tribute to union bosses to whom he is morally opposed."

As noted previously, NRTWC board member Frederick C. Fowler has been a featured member of the Hargis "faculty" on at least two occasions this year. In addition, Hargis' National Advisory Committee includes F. Gano Chance, Fred Koch and former Rep. Wint Smith, all mentioned earlier in connection with NRTWC's ties to the John Birch Society.

Christian Freedom Foundation: Howard Kershner's organization, which publishes Christian Economics, counts two current NRTWC board members and one former board member among its directors. At least two more of Christian Freedom Foundation's directors are affiliated with state right-to-work organizations: Rev. Vernelle Dyer of Maine Citizens for Right to Work and Rev. William S. Wise of Pennsylvanians for the Right to Work.

Committee for Constitutional Government: A 1961 issue of CCG's Spotlight carried an article by Reed Larson, NRTWC executive VP, urging support of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which authorizes state scab laws. (See Political Memo Dec. 17, 1962.)

Kent and Phoebe Courtney: The Courtneys, who publish the extremist The Independent American and run the way-out Conservative Society of America, have featured NRTWC leadership at their national meeting in both 1959 (President William T. Harrison) and 1961 (Vice-President L. A. Hooser). At the 1959 meeting, Kent Courtney presided over a panel discussion made up of Harrison, J. C. Laney, Wells T. Lovett and Robert Love, all representing NRTWC. The tape recording of the discussion ran to two hours in length and was offered for sale by The Independent American for $14. David Molthrop, who has been extremely active in the open shop movement at the state level, has been a regular feature of Courtney meetings.

De Mille Foundation for Political Freedom: Operations of this organization in "support of state right-to-work campaigns" have been referred to by NRTWC's former President Harrison in his book. Cecil B. De Mille, late film producer, was an active RTW promoter.

Heritage Foundation: In addition to publishing The Case for Right-to-Work Laws, by former NRTWC board member Fr. Edward Keller, Heritage Foundation in Chicago has published three pamphlets by Birch Society endorser Fr. Ferdinand Falque, one titled "The True Purpose of Right-to-Work Laws." The Heritage Foundation is now located in Independence Hall of Chicago, the office building of Cook County Federal Savings, the president of which, Sidney L. DeLove, is author of The Quiet Betrayal, an attack on our schools as having "forced Americanism out of the classroom to make way for temporary trivialities" and having accepted "the pagan philosophy of an all-powerful State whose citizens . . . are mere chattels. . . ."

Human Events: NRTWC board member Fr. John E. Coogan is a frequent contributor to Human Events, including a full-page article in their recent special issue on "The Labor Monopoly." Another NRTWC staff member who has written for Human Events is former associate counsel Warren Richardson. NRTWC President Duke Cadwallader and Executive Vice-President Reed Larson were both "early registrants" for this year's Human Events Political Action Conference.

Labor Policy Association: Organized in 1957 to "make and to encourage researches and studies pertaining to government policies affecting labor and labor relations." Labor Policy Association is headed by William Ingles, who was previously associated with the Organization for the Repeal of Federal Income Taxes. The Labor Policy Association published (1958) Ingles' book, "The Right-to-Work Handbook," which cites various NRTWC publications with approval.

Manion Forum: While NRTWC and Manion Forum are to some extent "competitors" in the open shop movement—each seeking financial support to carry on the battle—they sometimes cooperate. NRTWC figures who have appeared on the Manion Forum broadcasts include Donald R. Richberg (1957), Rev. Edward Greenfield (1958), Edwin S. Dillard (1959) and Reed Larson (1962). Other "right-to-work" figures who have appeared include former Senator William F. Knowland, former Indiana Governor Harold W. Handley, Wisconsin manufacturer Herbert Kohler and Fr. Ferdinand Falque. As indicated earlier, two NRTWC directors—Edwin Dillard and Eugene Germany—are also endorsers of the Manion Forum.

National Labor-Management Foundation: Its founder, Maurice Franks, is a former director of NRTWC. In addition, eight other directors or former directors of NRTWC have been affiliated with the Franks organization, including former President William T. Harrison.

National Right-to-Work Federation: Organized in 1946 by a group which included Florida Attorney-General Tom Watson and Norman Zolezzi of Indianapolis, Ind., editor and publisher since 1927 of a monthly called Labor Digest. After Watson's death, national headquarters of the Federation was moved to Indianapolis and Labor Digest became its official publication. After Norman Zolezzi's death in February 1959, editorship of Labor Digest was taken over by the former associate editor, Allston Calhoun.

In addition to the monthly newspaper, a radio program titled "Americanism Preferred" features Mr. Calhoun and is evidently carried primarily in southern states. Despite the close similarity in names there is no readily apparent connection between NRTWC and the Federation. However, a recent issue of Labor Digest does carry two items—one on the survey by Opinion Research Corp. for NRTWC and one on the activities of Pennsylvanians for the Right to Work—which are taken verbatim from the NRTWC Newsletter (but without credit).

Young Americans for Freedom: In addition to former NRTWC board member Fr. Edward Keller, YAF, the Goldwater "student" group organized by William Buckley and Marvin Liebman, has on its national advisory board such "right-to-work" proponents as V. Raymond Edman, Herbert V. Kohler, Reginald Lang, and E. Merrill Root. It is also noteworthy that an article in YAF's magazine, New Guard, by its managing editor, Carol Bauman, utilized information provided by NRTWC.

THAT OLD GANG OF MINE

Defeated ultra-conservative Rep. John Rousselot (Calif.) found a job right away. From just plain representative, he's jumped to governor now . . . district governor, that is, for the John Birch Society in six western states.

Repeal Would 'Injure' Negro

ROBERTSON ON 14B

By JOHN I. BROOKS

By Virginian-Pilot Washington Writer

WASHINGTON—Sen. A. Willis Robertson, D-Va., struck a chord not heard before from a Virginian during his turn on the Senate floor Thursday in the filibuster against repeal of section 14B of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Repeal, he said, would weaken the position of Negro workers.

Robertson charged that many unions long have discriminated against Negroes. Repeal of 14B, which permits states to enact right-to-work laws banning the closed shop, would permit these unions to close job opportunities to Negroes by denying them union membership, he said.

Virginia is one of 19 states which have right-to-work laws. In states having no such laws, unions may negotiate contracts requiring employes to be union members.

The 14B filibuster began shortly after the Senate convened. Robertson has spoken twice against repeal. Tuesday the Senate will vote on a motion by Majority Leader Mike Mansfield to invoke cloture (shut off debate) on the issue. Mansfield's motion needs a two-thirds majority to carry.

Robertson's assault on repeal as injurious to Negro workers comes in a year when he faces primary and general election opposition in his bid for re-election. The large and growing Negro vote in the state will be in full force in both elections, because the 24th Amendment to the Constitution bans the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting for federal offices.

Discrimination in labor unions, particularly in the construction trades, is "commonplace," Robertson said in his speech last week.

The senator quoted from a 1961 Civil Rights Commission report which stated that craft unions, when they discriminate against Negroes, "do so primarily by membership restrictions or other internal practices." Some industrial unions also practice discrimination, the commission said, through collective bargaining which in effect prevents Negroes from achieving equal employment opportunity.

Congress tried to remedy the situation with Title 7 of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, Robertson said, but a dispute over its application "threatens to emasculate" this provision of the law.

Sen. Robertson

Robertson said that while the labor-management relations act prohibits an employer from firing a worker in a closed-shop plant if he has reason to believe that union membership was denied the employe on a discriminatory basis, it is hard for an employer to determine why any individual worker has been refused admission to a union.

The senator concluded his review of recent legislation with the observation that its effectiveness in preventing discrimination "remains undemonstrated."

"Only in the 19 states having right-to-work laws is the Negro worker free from agreements and practices entered into between unions and employers to prevent him from achieving equal opportunity in employment," the Virginian declared.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 89th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

The Repeal of Section 14(b)—Fact or Fiction?

SPEECH

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, January 28, 1966

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, before I proceed with the speech on the substantive merits of the bill for the repeal of section 14(b), as I see them, I wish to say that I know very well that the substantive issue is not before the Senate, but rather the procedural issue of whether the bill should be taken up as the pending business of the Senate is before the Senate.

Yet for the past several days the opponents of the bill have been making their speeches setting forth their objections to the bill so far as the substance is concerned.

For the most part, the only thing that has been going out to the country has been attacks upon the bill by its opponents. For a time the position of the supporters of the repeal bill was that we should not be making any speeches in support of the repeal until it was made the pending business of the Senate. That was also based upon a preliminary assumption that the bill might get before the Senate at an early date. That, of course, has vanished in thin parliamentary air.

Yesterday I was called into conference with representatives of the proponents of the bill and representatives of the administration. It was decided at that conference that at least one speech ought to be made this week that would express some of the major arguments of the proponents of the repealer bill.

I proceed now to make that speech, which presents in part some of the reasons of the administration supporting the repeal and some reasons why the majority—and I am sure we are a majority in the Senate—support the repeal.

Therefore, I wish to present today to the Senate the real story, as I see it—the demonstrable facts, as I see them, a story which in recent years has been distorted, misrepresented, and lied about in the public press, on the television and radio, and in almost every forum where citizens gather to discuss the repeal of section 14(b).

THE REPEAL OF SECTION 14(B)—FACT OR FICTION?

What is being said and written about the proposal to repeal section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act—including some of the mail from my own constituents—calls to mind what Macbeth called a horrible shadow and an unreal mockery.

In these remarks, Mr. President, I hope to be more successful than Macbeth, for the horrible shadow, the unreal mockery, conjured up by the opponents of 14(b) repeal has far less relation to reality than Banquo's ghost; and more importantly, in this case the weight of conscience is reversed.

Let me begin with a simple, positive statement describing what the repeal of section 14(b) will actually do—what changes will take place in the law, in the process of collective bargaining, and in the obligation of workers to become union members.

The repeal of 14(b) will apply the Federal law governing union security agreements, which authorizes the union shop, to all 50 States, instead of to 31 of them. It will negate—though it will not repeal—so-called right-to-work laws that now exist, under authorization granted by section 14(b), in the other 19 States. As a result, in those 19 States, union-organized workers will have the legal right to ask for a union shop if they want to, to negotiate with their employer on the subject, and sign such a contract if the employer agrees to it.

In other words, workers, unions, and employers in those 19 States will then have the same rights and the same option that their counterparts now enjoy in the rest of the country. Their freedom will be greater, not less. The obligation of workers to become union members will be increased, in these 19 States, only to the extent that the workers themselves, by their collective decision, choose to increase it, subject to the agreement of their employer.

That is all there is to it; that is the substance from which these spectral shadows have been fabricated. Note that this simple enactment will have no effect upon labor-management relations or union membership in the State of Oregon, nor will it have such an effect in the State of the distinguished minority leader, the junior Senator from Illinois—even though he is leading the defense of 14(b) with his unequaled parliamentary skill, his matchless eloquence, and his unflagging determination.

In only 19 States, then, will the repeal of section 14(b) have any direct effect, and in those 19—with one minor exception—the effect will be nothing more than the restoration of the freedom of all concerned to make their own choices, to come to their own, voluntary agreements, the same freedom that is now enjoyed in Oregon, in Illinois, and in 29 other States of the Union.

I said there was a minor exception. It is indeed minor, and I mention it only to make sure that the case I am presenting will be totally secure from attack on factual grounds. The exception applies to certain contracts negotiated with nationwide companies by nationwide unions, which provide for a union shop in every State where the union shop is presently legal, and which further provides that organized units of the company in other States, where the union shop is now outlawed, shall come under the union shop clause as soon as it is legally possible. For example, the General Motors Corp. has such a master contract with the United Automobile Workers; and when section 14(b) is repealed, any General Motors workers in organized plants in the 19 right-to-work States who, until then, accepted union benefits as free riders, will be required to pay the same dues as their fellow workers. In these few instances there will be instant compulsion; but I shall deal with that whole concept later in these remarks.

However, with this exception, repeal itself will enforce union membership on no one.

Those are the facts, Mr. President, but they are shamelessly perverted by the enemies of labor into the horrible shadow and the unreal mockery of a society dominated by some sinister conspiracy of trade union autocrats. The concept is laughable by any reasonable judgment; but we cannot afford to laugh at it, for it is believed by too many good souls who are both credulous and uninformed.

MISCONCEPTIONS ABOUT REPEAL OF 14(b)

Let us look at just a few of these perversions, these horrible shadows which are mockeries of the truth.

The most innocent of them, perhaps, is the charge that the repeal of section 14(b) would "legalize the union shop and make compulsory unionism the law of the land." You can find this one in newspapers whose own employees have been covered by union shop agreements for two generations or more, and who would not have it any other way. Their own editors and publishers have voluntarily entered into union shop agreements because they have decided that such agreements would provide them with a better labor force.

The sober truth is that union membership has been a condition of employment in some trades for more years than any of us have been alive; and that the union shop, a very modest form of union security, was specifically authorized by the Taft-Hartley Act itself, at the instance of our late colleague, Senator Taft of Ohio.

The extirpation of section 14(b) cannot legalize what is already legal; it will simply extend the legalization to all States, not merely 31 of them.

Now the nightmares become more fevered. Repeal of section 14(b), we are told, will "force millions of workers into unions they do not want." This apparition, like the amoeba, divides into a number of parts.

There is the implication that workers do not really want to be a part of a union, but are somehow tricked or bullied into the clutches of the union, from which they yearn to be liberated. Many Senators may remember, Mr. President, that this view was widely held by sincere Members of Congress at the time that the Taft-Hartley Act was under consideration. Indeed, it was so widely held that the Taft-Hartley Act, as originally enacted, included a requirement that a special election had to be conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, with all the ceremony and safeguards of other board elections, before a union could so much as ask for union shop in the bargaining that was impending.

From August 1947, to October 1951, the NLRB conducted 46,119 of these elections, in which the only question was whether or not the workers wanted a union shop. In 44,795 of these elections—97.1 percent—the union shop was authorized. Some 6 million votes were cast in the elections; more than 5½ million workers, or 91 percent, favored the union shop.

This was highly embarrassing to those who had talked about "captive members." It was even more embarrassing, at times, to employers who had resisted the union shop, who did not want to grant the union shop, but were faced with a vote—which spokesmen for the union naturally emphasized—showing that the workers themselves, in overwhelming numbers, wanted a union shop.

The combination of these twin embarrassments led to the quiet repeal of union shop authorization elections. The truth was too hard to take. In one sense, Mr. President, it might be argued that the elimination of this provision was unfortunate, even though I am not suggesting that it should be reinstated. I voted for its elimination. It was costly, and it was wasteful. It demonstrated, however, by its results that democratic processes prevailed in the labor movement, and that the workers themselves, by an overwhelming majority—91-plus percent—voted for the union shop. The elimination was unfortunate because the provision, while it lasted, exposed as a mammoth fraud the proposition that millions of union members were aching for an opportunity to escape.

That proposition is further refuted when we examine the fate of so-called right-to-work laws when they have been placed before the voters as a whole. Since 1958 there have been seven statewide referendums on this question. In six of the seven States—California, Colorado, Idaho, Ohio, Oklahoma, and Washington—right-to-work was defeated. In only one, Kansas, did it narrowly prevail.

Even more significant, it seems to me, is that so-called right-to-work has flourished most where union members are fewest. If these all-powerful unions we hear about have dragooned so many workers into membership against their will, so that they feel hopeless and friendless and afraid, why do they not stage a revolt at the polls?

The answer is simple enough to anyone who is not so blinded by his own preconceptions that he is unable to recognize the truth.

Just last week, on January 19, the U.S. Department of Labor released a new report on union membership by States. It showed, among other things, that the percentage of union membership in right-to-work States was about half the rate in the other States. To put it another way, the so-called liberation movement for organized workers is most popular where there are the fewest organized workers to be liberated.

But the propagandists for section 14(b) go far beyond concern for the organized. They would have the public believe that repeal would mean the enforcement of a union shop on every worker in every enterprise everywhere in America.

Such a contention is completely baseless. It is false. Any suggestion that repeal of section 14(b) would clap a union shop on every enterprise is just that: it is false; it is pure fabrication.

First, as to technicalities. The repeal of section 14(b) will leave undisturbed any right-to-work law in its application to intrastate commerce, or its application to enterprises in those gray areas of interstate commerce where the NLRB does not take jurisdiction. I stress this point because I understand that many of my distinguished colleagues have been receiving letters from Main Street merchants, expressing concern at the prospect of repeal. No genuinely small business will in any way be affected, except for the possibility that their customers may have more money to spend. The shoeshine stand, the "mom and pop" store, are exempt from coverage under the National Labor Relations Act, whether section 14(b) is in it or not.

I stress that the application would be only to interstate commerce business. If business X fell within the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, it would be covered, and it should be covered. As I shall point out later in this speech, as a matter of constitutional policy every worker and every employer from coast to coast should have the same application of the Constitution of the United States to his business and to his work as is applied elsewhere.

As the Senate knows, for 20 years I have stood in this body in opposition to a segmentizing of the Constitution. I do not believe in having Congress delegate Federal powers to the States, because such delegation results in a lack of uniformity in the application of the Constitution to all citizens who fall under the same sets of operative facts.

Those who are now objecting to the repeal of section 14(b) are also seeking to continue a segmentizing of the interstate commerce clause. The labor leaders of America recognize that we must have this repeal if we are to have a uniform application of the Constitution of this country to all workers and all employers from east to west and from north to south.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the argument I have just made, for it is basic to the approach of the senior Senator from Oregon to labor legislation. I believe in uniform application of the law, not special treatment. I do not believe in discriminatory practices, nor in throwing to State courts and State legislatures the rights of free men and women in this country which are protected by the Federal interstate commerce clause.

The controlling, operative fact in this situation involves the question: "Is this shop, this plant, this employment, in interstate commerce?" If it is, in my judgment the answer is clear. There must not be one rule for the workers in that plant and another rule for the workers in another interstate commerce plant.

Therefore I say that the argument for retaining 14(b), made by the proponents, that it would result in the imposition of a union shop on a "mom's" or "pop's" popcorn stand, or a shoeshine parlor, or on any other business engaged in intrastate commerce is not so. The opponents of repeal cannot make it so by repeating the misstatement over and over again. They may fool some people by repeating it, but the repetition of a misstatement, no matter how many times it is made, does not turn it into the truth.

Second, and vastly more important, the simple repeal of this one deviation in the otherwise uniform Federal labor-management statute will not force a union shop—or union organization—upon any enterprise. In order for there to be a union at all, the workers must first want one, and confirm their desire through a secret ballot election or such other device, equally even handed, as the labor board may prescribe. If the union prevails and is certified as bargaining agent for all the workers, the members must next decide whether they want a union shop. If they do, they must obtain agreement from the employer to that effect.

But even then, having achieved the ultimate that is possible under the law, what do they really have? They have a contract which says that every present employee, and all new employees, must become members of the union within a given period, usually 60 days. Yet this is not really so; for the union cannot cause the dismissal of any worker who refuses to join the union, as long as he is willing to pay the initiation fee and dues—which by law must be uniform and reasonable—that are paid by members. In short, all a union can demand from any worker is that he pay his fair share of the costs of the union which, by law, is required to represent him and defend his interests.

THE CONSCIENCE AMENDMENT

Even here there is another exception. The pending bill includes my amendment providing a further exemption from bona fide religious objectors—those whose genuine religious convictions or scruples are a barrier, not only to membership in a secular organization, but to making contributions to its support. They may instead make equal contributions to a bona fide charity designated by the union.

The Senate knows that I worked out a Morse amendment in subcommittee and then in full committee, and that the Morse amendment comes to the floor of the Senate with a unanimous report from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, Republicans and Democrats alike.

These charities are charities that are covered by the internal revenue laws, and are recognized by our Federal tax laws to be charities that permit tax deductions to be properly taken. Also I was very careful to insist that religious charities be excluded. For the internal revenue law, as we all know, includes a good many religious charities. I took the position that I did not think any justification could be given for the selection of a religious charity; that I thought that the charity designated by the union would have to be a nonreligious charity.

My amendment provides further that in case some difference of opinion develops between the conscientious objector and the union, an opportunity should be afforded to negotiate an agreement whereby the equivalent of the dues and the initiation fee shall be paid to some other organization.

But it does mean, Mr. President, that the union shall have the final word in determining to what charity the dues and initiation fees shall be paid. Why not? Do not forget that it is the union that pays the cost of the collective bargaining agreement. Do not forget that it is the union, in the negotiations with the employer, which brings forth the agreement enjoyed by all the workers, insofar as benefits are concerned, in respect to wages, hours, and conditions of employment.

Mr. President, no one has to work in shop X, but if one is going to work in shop X, he certainly should not be exempt from paying his fair share of the cost of negotiating the collective agreement covering shop X. In other words, my amendment would eliminate the free rider; and I am surprised at the attitude of some who think that a worker is entitled to take a free ride at the expense of the union. Mr. President, he can work elsewhere if he does not wish to carry his fair share of the burden of paying for the cost of obtaining the collective-bargaining agreement.

Do not overlook the safeguards that workers have under the procedures of the Federal law, starting with the National Labor Relations Board, if unfair labor practices are engaged in by the officials of the union. It is foolish to assume that the workers are at the mercy of the union, without any legal protections whatsoever. A list of cases as long as my arm shows that workers, when they have a case of unfair labor practices, can be protected against such practices.

As I have said, this is by no means the end of the line. Workers who are covered by a union shop contract can change their minds. There is an established labor board procedure under which a petition can be filed for an election to deauthorize the union shop; if a majority so votes, the union shop is voided, leaving other terms of the contract undisturbed. Thus it is entirely possible for workers who are now in a union shop, who want to retain the benefits of union conditions, but who want to abolish the membership requirement, to do exactly that, through the mechanics of the National Labor Relations Board. This is in addition to the parallel process, better known but also ignored by the mythmakers, under which workers can decertify the union itself, if they so desire. In practice, the first of these procedures is seldom invoked, and the second is a rarity; for as demonstrated by the evidence I have already presented, workers employed under union shop contracts like it that way.

These workers are unaware that they are in the clutches of power-hungry labor bosses, as my opponents are so prone to allege, who are supposed to order them around like so many puppets, denying them the right to control their own affairs. They are unaware of this because it is not so; it is another horrible shadow, another unreal mockery, summoned from the depths of distorted imagination. I do not maintain, Mr. President, that there are not occasional abuses of the democratic process within the labor movement, just as there are in business and in elections to public office; but they are few, and they are subject to many—and effective—remedies.

I speak as one who has written majority opinions calling to task labor leaders who have sought to follow routes of abuse. When I was on the National War Labor Board, there were a few such cases, and we never hesitated to correct the wrongs. I say to the everlasting credit of the National Labor Relations Board that it has a fine record of proceeding to the defense of workers who are, on any basis whatever, wronged by their union leaders. But those cases are few, Mr. President, when we consider the thousands of collective bargaining agreements in which dedicated union officials have sought to carry out necessary protection to the legitimate rights of their fellow union members, through the process of free collective bargaining.

Nearly all national unions have established detailed regulations to insure free, democratic elections, with an appeals procedure, sometimes terminating in review by an outside umpire. All AFL-CIO unions, and they make up the overwhelming majority, are governed by the federation's ethical practices codes, which include a comprehensive statement of the democratic processes which each affiliated organization must follow. And for those cynics who question that the words of these trade union laws are followed in good faith, there is the Landrum-Griffin Act, which makes union democracy a matter of law, enforceable in the courts.

I want to emphasize, Mr. President, that all these dark and dire imputations about democracy in unions come with ill grace from those whose own democratic credentials are far from impressive. I have been a close observer of the American labor movement for several decades as a mediator, as a member of the War Labor Board, as a public official, and as an arbitrator, and as an interested citizen. And I say that there is no comparable segment of American economic life in which integrity, idealism, devotion to principle and concern for the tenets of democracy is so paramount—not only in the words of ethical practices codes, which are unmatched by any business organization either in what they say or the diligence with which they are enforced, but also in sincere dedication to the concepts those codes express. I am tired of the incessant harangues about union bosses, with all their implication of dictatorship, when in truth the supposed bosses are in nearly every case honorable men, freely elected to leadership by the workers they represent.

There are many more myths that need exposure, many more horrible shadows to exorcise, but I shall deal with only one more—one which has aroused public expressions of concern from some of my able colleagues who have consistently sought to place further restraints on unions, to render them powerless or eliminate them entirely. This is the myth about the gigantic political slush fund that will accrue to unions when section 14(b) is repealed. I have seen one editorial which arrived at a monthly figure for this fund by multiplying the number of unorganized workers by $5.

As I have already pointed out at some length, the repeal of section 14(b) will not enforce union organization upon any establishment or any group of workers. But beyond that, the mythmakers totally ignore the legal limitations to the use of union funds for political purposes; and they ignore the further fact that the great bulk of union income—a sum which is itself vastly exaggerated—must by necessity be spent on conducting the affairs of the union. The gigantic political slush fund argument is simply without foundation.

QUESTION OF COMPULSION

Now let me return to the matter of compulsion; for it is unquestionably true that the union shop does compel some unwilling workers to pay reasonable initiation fees and dues, perhaps against their will, in order to hold their jobs. It is probably true that the number will increase when the union shop is extended to the 19 States that now prohibit it, even though this will remain a matter of voluntary agreement between unions and employers.

This, we are told by the opponents of repeal, is an un-American infringement upon individual rights; no one, we are told, should have to pay tribute to a union in order to keep a job; and even the issue of civil rights is raised in this connection.

Mr. President, I yield to no one in this Chamber, or outside it, in my devotion to the rights of the individual, to the civil rights of all Americans, and to individualism itself. If the union shop threatened these basic rights, I would oppose it, but it does not.

It must be understood that contrary to the shadow world concocted by the mythmakers, the genesis of any union is the desire of the workers to join together for purposes of collective bargaining, to increase their ability to deal with their employer, to obtain better wages and working conditions, to win security against arbitrary discipline or dismissal, to enhance their opportunities for advancement. The desire must be there, and it must be confirmed by a secret-ballot vote, or in a few instances a comparable procedure, conducted under the auspices of the Federal Government.

If a majority of the workers vote for union organization, the union is certified by the Government as bargaining agent—not merely for its supporters, not merely for those who voluntarily enroll, but for every worker in the unit in which the vote was taken. Thus, the Federal Government places upon the union a responsibility, which cannot be evaded and which can be enforced, if necessary, by the National Labor Relations Board and by the courts.

Under these circumstances, it is not unreasonable to expect that the majority of the workers, who created the union, should want all who benefit from the union to pay their fair share of the costs, which is all that a union shop requires. Yes, this is compulsion; but it is the kind of compulsion each of us takes for granted in many aspects of our lives, the kind of compulsion that is essential to the conduct of a free society, for the alternative is anarchy. All of us must pay taxes to support programs we personally do not need, and some we do not want; not only Federal taxes, but State and local taxes as well. The pacifist must pay to support the war, the childless must pay to support the schools—the examples are endless. Perhaps the closest analogy, though it is not an original one, is the householder who opposes a paid fire department. He has to pay his share of the cost, and the fire department must protect him whether he likes it or not.

It is argued that no private oganization—no union—should have the power to tax, or its equivalent. But this private organization, this union, is carrying out a function specifically assigned to it by government, and surely has a right to establish a reasonable way of raising the funds it requires to carry on that function, to fulfill that assignment.

Nor is this so-called right to tax extended only to unions of wage earners. In many States, many States that now forbid the union shop, no lawyer can practice unless he is a member in good standing in the bar association which is, of course, naught but a union shop.

In actual operation, a worker's involvement with the union is much broader than any of the examples I have mentioned. The union contract governs every aspect of his working life, and affects much of his outside life as well. The contract determines his holidays and vacations; it provides how much insurance protection he and his family get; it establishes how much pension he can expect on his retirement; it provides union handling of his grievances, his on-the-job difficulties, and much more. In a sense, the worker is a citizen of the union as he is a citizen of the Nation, entitled to the equal enjoyment of its benefits and the equal protection of its laws. All a union shop provides is that each union citizen should be a taxpayer, too.

No, Mr. President, the compulsion argument does not hold up; it does not hold up in itself, and it wholly vanishes in the light of the many precautions which assure the rights of workers under union shop contracts—deauthorization, decertification and the guarantee of democratic procedures.

EVILS OF RIGHT-TO-WORK STATUTES

Mr. President, up to now, I have sought to demonstrate that the union shop is wholly consistent with American principles, and that the arguments of those who oppose its extension to the 19 States which now forbid it are completely specious appeals to ignorance and suspicion. I should now like to present the other side of the coin—the positive evils that result from so-called right-to-work laws in these 19 States.

The first of these has been stressed by President Johnson, and is a matter of record—that right-to-work laws, and attempts to enact them, cause continuing friction within the States, provoke quarrels between labor and management, and thus conflict with the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, one of which is to promote labor stability. Further than this, right-to-work laws promote conflicts between States, conflicts of the most regressive kind, since they involve competition on the basis of which a State can offer an opportunistic manufacturer the lowest wages and the greatest guarantees that no union will be organized to raise them.

I can see no possible way in which the national interest is served when a factory in one State, operating under union contract and paying good wages, moves to another State in order to pay low wages. This is not only bad for the Nation as a whole, it is bad for the supposedly victorious State, for an increase in industrialization based upon factories paying substandard wages is not the road to prosperity; it is a charter for chronic poverty. Neither is it the road to labor stability. It is the road to labor unrest.

The figures are clear enough, and I would like to take note of a few of them. Much more than wage rates are involved here, for wage rates are inseparable from, and indeed are the major factor in, the whole economic and social structure of the State.

Consider now the contrast between my own State of Oregon and the 19 right-to-work States as a whole. Let us look at the figures furnished, in part, by the States themselves, and compiled by various agencies of the U.S. Government.

First, there is per capita personal income—an excellent gage of a State's annual wealth acquirement. In 1964, the 10 Southern States having right-to-work laws had an average per capita personal income of $1,889. For this same period, Oregon had per capita personal income of $2,606. Here is a per capita advantage of $717.

Then there is wages. In manufacturing establishments in these same 10 States, the average wage was $1.98 an hour in 1964, while in the State of Oregon the average hourly wage was $2.85. At the end of the week, the difference in the average pay envelope is nearly $35.

What does this mean to the families, to the children, to the elderly, and to the marginal workers in States with these low incomes and low wages? Let us look at all the 19 States having right-to-work laws. In these States, as a group, fully 32.2 percent of the families were in the poverty category in the 1960 census. Virtually one-third of the entire population of these 19 States was living in poverty. In Oregon, there was, of course, poverty, and too much of it, in my opinion, but in Oregon the number of families with poverty-level incomes was 17.1 percent, only about half as many as in the right-to-work States.

There are other significant facts; minimum wage laws, for example. Only 6 of the 19 right-to-work States have minimum wage laws, weak as most State laws are in this category. Only 7 of the 19 States have fair employment practices laws of any sort; only 4 have equal pay laws for women and only 5 meet basic standards for child labor laws. Oregon, I can report, has laws in every one of these categories, and better laws than most.

The wage, hour, and worker protective laws of a State not only affect the environment and living conditions of a worker, they are an important influence on the development of good citizens. And so, to an even greater extent, is education. The 19 right-to-work States spent an average of $395 per pupil in 1964. In Oregon the expenditure was $569.

Today we are reaping the harvest of our educational investments in our young, but the harvest is a disturbing one. As the youngsters come of age and are examined for selective service, the rejection rate in the mental examinations is exceedingly high. In the 19 right-to-work States, the rejection rate on mental tests is 38.4 percent. In Oregon, the rate is 8.7 percent. At this critcial moment in our history I do not have to remind anyone how serious a loss this is to the security of our Nation.

I have used my own great State for purposes of making these comparisons, but virtually the same comparisons could be made between the 30 other States where the union shop is legal, and the 19 States where it is not.

I am not implying that these differentials were created solely by the so-called right-to-work laws. As a group, the 19 States with these laws have long been at the bottom of the economic roster of American States, for varying reasons; their misfortunes have long been recognized as a matter of national concern, and huge sums have been spent from the general revenues, and are being spent today, on efforts to raise their economies to the national average. But I do say that right-to-work laws, and the philosophy they represent, the philosophy of low wages and hostility to unions, to collective bargaining, and to organized labor, helps to keep these States at the bottom, helps to perpetuate these difficulties, and increases the drain they impose on the Federal Treasury. The ban on the union shop in these 19 States is not only bad for them, but very expensive for the rest of us.

Let me cite another example which, I submit, pinpoints the impact of so-called right-to-work statutes. These laws were once in force in every seaboard State from Virginia to Texas. But a number of years ago, one State—Louisiana—repealed its right-to-work law, except for a very minor application in agriculture. The union shop returned to Louisiana, and this year, Louisiana took the lead, among the Southern States in average wages paid in manufacturing. The average in Louisiana is now $109.14 a week, or $4.14 a week higher than that of the previous leader, Texas. There are many among the right-to-work advocates, I am sure, who view high wages with dismay, but I take the opposite view; I congratulate Louisiana.

I know that the expansion of our economy is always dependent upon high purchasing power upon the part of the consumers of America. Once again, as I have so many times stated from the floor in my 20 years in the Senate, I plead with the American people to remember that their free economy is dependent for its perpetuation upon the high purchasing power of all the consumers of America. Here is one Senator who is not going to support a regression in our economy. Here is one who is not going to vote to keep 14(b) on the statute books when the evidence is overwhelming that it is regressive in nature so far as its effect on our economy is concerned.

Just as low wages are the cause of the depressing lag in the right-to-work States as a whole, small and weak unions are a basic cause of low wages. On January 19 the Department of Labor issued a report on union membership by States, which showed a national average of about 30 percent; that is, of all employees in nonagricultural establishments in the United States, about 3 in 10 are union members. But the percentage in the 31 States without antiunion shop laws was 34 percent, as against a little under 15 percent in the 19 right-to-work States. This, of course, is just what the 19 States intended when they adopted these laws; this was their purpose; they planned it that way.

But they are paying a high price for their success, and so is the Nation as a whole, not just in dollars, but in the ignorance, ill health, and squalor bred by poverty. I do not offer a blanket endorsement to every action of every union, but as one with some experience both in economics and in labor-management affairs, I say that union organization is the sound way to insure individual justice and industrial peace; and that union-negotiated wage increases, which reflect the needs of the workers and their increasing productivity, are essential to an expanding economy and the prosperity of all of us. A State that deliberately undertakes to cripple its labor movement is crippling itself as well.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

Now, Mr. President, I should like to turn to another point, a point of constitutional law, which in itself should be enough to bring about the repeal of section 14(b). The Constitution empowers the Congress to regulate commerce among the several States. The jurisdiction of the Federal Government over labor relations, problems, and disputes flows from the interstate commerce clause primarily. It was under this power that Congress undertook to legislate in the field of labor relations.

Mr. President, all the statutes in the field of labor relations on the books of the Federal Government stem from the interstate commerce clause.

Congress took jurisdiction, and it established rules governing enterprises engaged in interstate commerce.

My basic disagreement with those who are opposed to the repeal of 14(b) involves an irreconcilable difference of point of view over the application of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. I am opposed to delegating to the States any Federal power in respect to the uniform application of constitutional rights throughout the Nation. The so-called right-to-work laws constitute, in fact, a delegation to the States of a degree of jurisdiction of the Federal Government over interstate commerce matters that stem from the interstate commerce clause.

In my judgment, every worker and every employer in the United States, no matter what State he lives in, should have exactly the same rights under the interstate commerce clause that a worker or employer in any other State has. As I have said in many debates on this subject matter in the Senate, we cannot segmentize the Constitution of the United States by delegating Federal jurisdiction over any section of the Constitution to the States and end up with a uniform application of constitutional guarantees to all people in the United States, irrespective of the State in which they have be living at a given time.

I repeat, many Americans, probably most Americans, have never recognized the constitutional law issue that is involved in the 14(b) issue. The jurisdiction of the Federal Government in the matter of industrial relations involving labor-management relationship stems 100 percent from the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. Without the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, the Federal Government would have no jurisdiction in respect to labor relations.

Mr. President, this involves an abstraction. It is always difficult to persuade people to think in terms of an abstract principle which affects their relationship with their government.

However, I would have the American people remember that their very freedoms and liberties are dependent upon the application of such abstract principles of government to their daily lives. Our system of government by law, instead of by men, is founded upon abstract principles of government which we often call our constitutional system of government.

Congress delegated to the States, as it has the power to do, a limited authority over interstate commerce. That limited authority is set forth in the right-to-work law. It provides that a State shall have the right to pass a law to outlaw the union shop. There is nothing illegal about a union shop in the absence of a right-to-work law. The union shop exists in 31 States. It exists in my own State.

Mr. President, I have dealt at some length in my speech in support of my argument that the repeal of section 14(b) would not impose a compulsory union shop upon anyone. It would make it possible for the majority in a shop, under democratic processes, to vote on whether they wish to be governed, in their economic relations with their employer, by a collective-bargaining agreement which includes a union shop provision. It guarantees to the employer another constitutional right, about which I shall have something more to say later in my speech, and that is the right to participate in freedom of contract. This is a precious constitutional right.

Let us face it, Mr. President. What the proponents of the right-to-work laws do not like to hear is that a right-to-work is, in fact, a law which seeks to make compulsory an open shop in a right-to-work States.

What they do not like to hear is that the right-to-work law is one of the devices that can be used for union "busting" in America.

They do not like to have it pointed out. The facts speak for themselves as to what the attitude is in most of these States in regard to collective bargaining through unions.

When we are asking for the repeal of section 14(b) we are asking not for a provision that will impose on a compulsory basis either open shop or union shop, but one which will give to the workers and their employers the right to engage in free collective bargaining as an expression of their constitutional guarantee of freedom of contract in this country.

When we outlaw the union shop, we take away from the employers, as well as the unions, a precious constitutional right, the right of freedom of contract under which an employer and a union can voluntarily, without any coercion—enter into an agreement in which the employer says, "For the considerations afforded by the contract, I wish to hire all the men in my plant from your union hall." That is a very precious freedom, the freedom of contract.

For many years in the maritime industry I was the Pacific coast arbitrator between the longshoremen and the steamship companies. The steamship companies in their contract agreed to take their workers from a union hiring hall so long as the union could supply them with the workers who met the qualifications under the contract.

At first, the hiring hall was opposed by a substantial number of the steamship companies. We all know the great unrest that plagued the west coast for many years in the maritime industry.

But I am proud to stand before the Senate to say that the parties agreed to an arbitration clause in the maritime contract. Interestingly enough, the adoption of that arbitration clause led to the arbitration of almost every section of the contract.

It was my task and privilege to be the arbitrator when the record was made by the parties that led to a collective bargaining agreement based on the arbitration award I handed down.

I am proud to say that, even as I stand on the floor of the Senate today, that master contract still prevails on the west coast. It has been modified only by the results of collective bargaining at times for those revisions which the parties themselves have negotiated occasioned by changing conditions on the west coast. There have been changes in regard to wages negotiated between the parties, and with respect to working conditions.

Within the framework of that contract they arrived at true arbitration which still stands. That contract provided for the union hiring hall.

It was not very long after the contract was agreed to that the shipowners became the most ardent supporters of the hiring hall. One could no more get them to do away now with the union hiring hall than one could get them to decide to go out of business. It brought stability. It gave them a grievance procedure. It put upon the union the obligation of discipline. It gave management an appeal procedure if the union violated the commitments in the contract.

In decision after decision it was my duty to impose on the union opinion after opinion when I found it in violation of the contract.

It also became my duty to impose on shipowners opinion after opinion which required them to live up to their hiring commitment.

When there are employers who voluntarily enter into union shop agreements almost all of them find that it brings labor stability to their industry. They enter into the agreement because they want the agreement.

I will not be one who would vote to deny management the constitutional right of freedom of contract to enter into a good faith contract with the labor union whereby the employer says, "I want my workers from your union."

That is what is involved in the union shop. I do not propose to support a proposal that would take that freedom of contract away from employers.

That is why, in 1947, standing on the other side of the aisle, I led the fight against the Taft-Hartley bill. One of my major arguments, as the record will show, was the same constitutional argument I am making today. I do not believe in segmentizing the Constitution of the United States. I shall be no part of it.

The same is true of shipowners, contractors, builders in the building trades, and part of every industry in the country, in which there are many who prefer nationwide union shop contracts, and who cannot exercise this precious right of freedom of contract as the law now stands.

One of the major issues involved in this debate, that American management is against the union shop, in my judgment is not so. Many thousands of employers in this country want section 14 (b) repealed. Industry after industry recognizes the unfair competition that low labor standards in the 19 right-to-work States impose upon them.

My State is a good example, for its lumber industry already is suffering great losses in competition with right-to-work States, States in which low wages and low labor standards are allowed to prevail, because the workers are subject to State laws, not to Federal law.

Employers should be allowed to exercise the right of freedom of contract. They should be allowed to enter into union shop agreements. That is why I say in this speech that when we outlaw the union shop, we take away from the employers as well as the unions a precious constitutional right of freedom of contract, under which an employer and a union can voluntarily, without any coercion, enter into an agreement in which the employer says, "For the considerations afforded by the contract, I wish to hire all the men in my plant from your union hall." The freedom of contract is a very precious freedom.

When Congress delegated congressional control over interstate commerce to this limited extent in regard to these right-to-work laws, it followed a course of action of discriminating, in my judgment, against those who want to exercise the previous right of freedom of contract.

I opposed such action in 1947 at the time of Taft-Hartley, and I oppose it now because it has led to many abuses. Because of the passage of the right-to-work laws, we turned these workers over to the jurisdiction and the control of State laws. That is what has happened under the right-to-work law.

I have had experiences with this problem. I was appointed by President Kennedy and later by President Johnson to try to help settle the very costly east coast and gulf longshore strike in 1962 and 1964. We were able to reach agreements in States in which the right-to-work laws did not exist. However, the interesting fact is that our trouble—and it cost the American people hundreds of millions of dollars before the strike was settled—was in the right-to-work States along the gulf, States which are accustomed to exploit Negro longshoremen as well as white longshoremen.

We were finally able, with the cooperation of farseeing industrial statesmen among the shipowners of America, to obtain application of the agreement that we had worked out around the coast and into the Gulf States.

There is no question that, on the basis of my experience in working in the settling of disputes, right-to-work laws give rise to many abuses. One of the abuses is the unfair competitive advantage which the law gives to low-paying employers and the employers who do not believe in high labor standards. Thus, employers in the non-right-to-work States, such as the employers in my own State, in large numbers are protesting the section 14(b) provision of the Taft-Hartley law.

Take the lumber industry of my State—to which I have referred—placed at a competitive disadvantage by the low standard lumber areas of the South in which the right-to-work laws prevail, making it possible that workers will be subjected to low wages, rule by State injunctions, firing without cause, and a loss of their precious freedom of collective bargaining. Let us face it, the right-to-work-law States have a sordid record of antiunionism. In those States labor exploiters still look upon workers as a commodity to be purchased for the lowest price possible.

Summarizing my objections on constitutional grounds to the retention of section 14(b), I wish to review my arguments as follows:

In 1947, I led the fight in this body against segmentizing the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. That is exactly what Congress did when it passed the Taft-Hartley law including a delegating to the States of certain powers reserved to the Federal Government under the interstate commerce clause. What is involved in this issue is whether there shall be a uniform application of the interstate commerce clause among the 50 States, or whether 19 States shall be permitted to take advantage of an unfortunate delegation of power to the State by Congress under that clause. Such a delegation of interstate commerce authority to the States permits them to maintain the shocking low labor conditions that they maintain under the right-to-work laws to the competitive disadvantage of employers in high-labor-standard States.

But in section 14(b), Congress ceded a part of that power back to the States. It authorized the States to legislate for themselves on one matter, and one only—the matter of union security, provided only that the State laws were more restrictive than the Federal law.

This is a constitutional monstrosity. As the late and fondly remembered Senator Barkley said, when he joined me and the then Senator PEPPER, of Florida, in opposing this section, it is like amending a Federal law against counterfeiting to allow the States to permit counterfeiting if they choose. Or, to relate to a measure this body will soon be considering, it is like increasing the Federal minimum wage, with a proviso that a State can establish a lower figure if it so desires; and I might say, parenthetically, that a majority of the right-to-work States would take that course if they could. But they cannot do so under the minimum wage law, and they should not be allowed to breach, in a similar way, the National Labor Relations Act.

By every standard of law and equity, a Federal policy should be exactly that—Federal, applying equally among all the States, so that all operate under the same Federal code in the same way.

There is one final point I would like to treat, Mr. President, before I conclude. The opponents of repeal tell us that they are on the popular side, that they reflect the majority opinion of the Nation, in opposing the uniform legality of the union shop. They point to the editorials in newspapers and other media; they point to the public opinion polls; and they point to their own mail. Let me take them in order.

The attitude of the press toward the labor movement is historically one of unremitting hostility; and I suppose it will always be, unless automation progresses to such an extent that publishers no longer need any employees at all, and therefore have no unions with which they must bargain. There are newspapers that take a rather progressive position on other social and economic issues, even supporting Democrats on special occasions; yet these same newspapers will inveigh against the efforts of workers in a local factory to organize, and turn livid at every strike. Newspapers are against labor as consistently as they are against sin, since publishers tend to equate the two, so I think their views can be discounted.

Public opinion polls have been showing a majority vote against a question as to whether a worker should be forced to join a union to keep his job. But opinion polling is an elusive art, and I wonder what the response would be to a question as to whether a worker whose benefits derive from a union contract, who is by law under the protection of the union, should be allowed to escape paying dues.

The opponents of the repeal of section 14(b) are supporting in reality free riders. They are perfectly willing to have a collective-bargaining contract negotiated if the employer must have a contract with the union; but they want to scuttle that contract, in effect, by taking the position that all who enjoy the benefits of the wages, hours, and conditions of employment should not be expected or required to pay their fair share of the cost of the agreement. That is what labor means when it says that the opponents of repeal are supporting the free rider. The free rider position violates all the rules of equity and fairness.

Rather than rely upon the imponderables of the polls, I prefer to look at the election results, in which all the people expressed themselves—in the State referendums, in the contests for congressional seats, and yes, in the presidential contests in which section 14(b) has been a head-on issue. It seems to me that these are more persuasive; for indeed, there was a majority in the other House, and there is a majority in this Chamber, favoring the repeal of section 14(b); and there is a President in the White House who also favors it.

To my fellow Democrats in the Senate, I say that there is also the Democratic Party platform, adopted in 1964 and approved, by the voters, in a sense, in the election of a Democratic President and a large majority of Democrats to Congress.

I have a little word of advice to the Democrats in Congress. We have a duty to support the party platform.

I have the further advice to the Democrats in Congress that we, as a party, have made a commitment for the repeal of section 14(b). Some Democrats are going to find themselves, and they should find themselves, in 1966 and 1968, subject to the charge in those elections: "If you do not repeal section 14(b), you will not be keeping your word."

Mr. President, if there were a justification on the merits for taking before American employers and American labor a case in opposition to repeal of section 14(b), I would join in taking it before them. However, it is not the merits that have thus far defeated the repeal of section 14(b) in the Senate, but politics.

It is not the senior Senator from Oregon who takes it to the political platform. The issue is there. My warning to the Democratic majority in the Senate and the House is that many of them will stay at home in 1966, and they should stay home if they are unwilling to keep the commitments of the party.

The repeal of section 14(b) is right on the merits; and so far as the senior Senator from Oregon is concerned, those who do not want to keep the party commitment on the issue should stay at home. I have no doubt that many of them will be left at home when the voters get through with them in 1966 and 1968.

It seems to me that these arguments are more persuasive; for indeed, there was a majority in the other House, and there is a majority in this Chamber, favoring the repeal of section 14(b); and there is a President in the White House who also favors it.

That places upon us, as the majority party, the obligation of breaking this filibuster. The proponents of repeal across this Nation should focus their eyes on the Democratic majority and hold the Democratic majority politically responsible if the filibuster is not broken.

The senior Senator from Oregon cannot be more clear. There will be no misunderstanding of that language on the part of the voters of this country.

I would have the leaders of my party take note; for all I can do is express my sincere forewarnings, and my sincere forewarning is, You cannot sweep it under the political rug. The issue of the repeal of section 14(b) cannot be swept under the political rug. The Democratic Party must be held to an accounting, and will be held to an accounting if it does not keep the commitment of the 1964 platform.

As for the argument as to what the mail shows, let me answer that for myself. I receive many letters on this issue, most of them from businessmen in the States having right-to-work laws. I understand their personal interest and I am glad to hear from them, but their self-interest can hardly be equated with the national interest.

Mr. President, I have spoken at moderate length on this question, yet I have touched no more than the highlights. My conviction is clear and unwavering that section 14(b) should be repealed; but my remarks have been directed, not so much toward the persuasion of those who disagree with me, but rather toward exposing the fraudulence of the horrible shadows conjured up by the 14(b) propagandists. This is basically a simple issue, which should be considered on its merits, with the mature judgment and calm reason for which this body is so justly famed.

Those who attempt to becloud the issue are seeking only to disrupt its calm and factual consideration; and I say they are using these methods because they know their cause is otherwise lost, and deserves to be. Let us look to the truth, and let us act on it.

Mr. President, let us recognize what section 14(b) really is. It is a device to impose a compulsory open shop on the workers in the so-called right-to-work States.

The section should be repealed in the interest of common fair play and constitutional justice in respect to the constitutional right of workers and employers everywhere in the United States.

SOUND FAMILIAR?

The Buzzer buzzes and the clock-watchers punch their time cards and charge down the aisle in a half-walk, half-run, elbows pumping, determined to be first to the parking lot.

The tide of bodies spreads over the parking lot like the first trickles of flood waters over bottom land, and the first to his car is the leader of the pack and avoids the rush behind.

Those left behind complete the flooding of the lot, enter their cars and start the motors, and then, sit, burning up gasoline, and breathing exhaust fumes.

They pull out of their places, drive perhaps the length of a car, crowding in front of someone else, who glances murderous looks, and grit their teeth, and mutter obscene and blasphemous invectives about road hogs and other impolite people, resolving not to let that happen again, thereby becoming as hoggish and impolite as those they condemn.

On it goes, crowding, jockeying for position, cursing, pulling up, stopping, and pulling up again, until, at last, with one more impolite crowding-in, the "through lane" is entered and the open road attained and, free as a bird, the rest of the herd is left behind.

"A HEARTFELT THANKS"

Words are just not available to me to express enough, my thanks to you who helped me in my time of great need. Where there is sickness, it seems that everything is against us, but it does give us a great warm feeling for the brothers and sisters of Local 783 who came to my aid when it was so greatly needed. You just don't know how much it was appreciated.

Thanks from the bottom of my heart:

WHERE HAVE ALL THE PEOPLE GONE?

Driving past G.E. is somewhat reminiscent of the last scene of "On The Beach". The wind sweeps across the vast, empty parking lot, carrying old newspapers with it; rolling empty beer cans like tumbleweeds; blowing through the wire fence with a low, mournful whistle. Grass and weeds, ground down for months by countless tires and shoes, encouraged by a lot of rain and sunshine, poke up through cracks in the asphalt, little realizing that they are pre-doomed to grinding destruction. Rabbits hop cautiously further and further out on the lot, and field mice scurry across, pausing only to sniff the air, and to flick their ears around, wondering, "Where the heck is all the people at?" (very illiteratemice, you see).

We G.E. employees, for two weeks, enjoyed a paid vacation which was bargained for by our union, Local 783. During the same period we also enjoyed a paid holiday, as we already have four times this year and will again four more times this year. A grand total of nine, all bargained for and won by Local 783.

ATTEND YOUR UNION MEETINGS . . .
THEY ARE SO IMPORTANT . . .

There are those among us who turn up their collective noses at these accomplishments and comment that the company would have provided these benefits anyway, without any bargaining. That type of thinking is so ridiculous that it is hardly worth comment.

Why is it then, to go ahead and comment on ridiculous thinking anyway, why is it that the company has never provided any paid holiday in the middle of a contract period? And why didn't G.E. provide a paid two-week vacation for two-year employees before the last contract was negotiated?

Well, be that as it may, we hope that each and every one of you enjoyed your vacation to the utmost.

And, if you find it extremely hard to go back to work, just wait around fifty weeks. There are two weeks more, waiting.

Labor Law — Right to Work

Selected Years Per Capita Income In Compulsory Open-Shop States

ALABAMA Passed the law in 1953. In that year the per capita income was $680 below the national average. In 1967 it was $996 below—a loss of $316.

ARIZONA Passed the law in 1948. In that year the per capita income was $156 below the national average. In 1967 it was $439 below—a loss of $283.

ARKANSAS Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $555 below the national average. In 1967 it was $1,060 below—a loss of $505.

FLORIDA Passed the law in 1944. In 1948 the per capita income was $250 below the national average. In 1967 it was $306 below—a loss of $56.

GEORGIA Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $462 below the national average. In 1967 it was $618 below—a loss of $156.

IOWA (a) Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $159 above the national average. In 1967 it was $50 below—a loss of $209.

KANSAS (a) Passed the law in 1958. In 1958 the per capita income was $5 above the national average. In 1967 it was $99 below—a loss of $104.

MISSISSIPPI Passed the law in 1954. In 1954 the per capita income was $877 below the national average. In 1967 it was $1,263 below—a loss of $386.

NEBRASKA (a) Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $79 above the national average. In 1967 it was $78 below—a loss of $157.

NEVADA (a) (b) Passed the law in 1951. In 1951 the per capita income was $598 above the national average. In 1967 it was $424 above—a loss of $174.
(This is the only RTW state consistently above the national average, but it has lost ground.)

N. CAROLINA Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $457 below the national average. In 1967 it was $720 below—a loss of $263.

N. DAKOTA (c) Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $28 below the national average. In 1967 it was $672 below—a loss of $644.

S. CAROLINA Passed the law in 1954. In 1954 the per capita income was $666 below the national average. In 1967 it was $946 below—a loss of $280.

S. DAKOTA (a) Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $67 above the national average. In 1967 it was $569 below—a loss of $636.

TENNESSEE Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $486 below the national average. In 1967 it was $765 below—a loss of $279.

TEXAS Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $231 below the national average. In 1967 it was $415 below—a loss of $184.

UTAH Passed the law in 1955. In 1955 the per capita income was $251 below the national average. In 1967 it was $555 below—a loss of $304.

VIRGINIA Passed the law in 1947. In 1948 the per capita income was $300 below the national average. In 1967 it was $355 below—a loss of $55

WYOMING (a) Passed the law in 1963. In 1962 the per capita income was $18 above the national average. In 1967 it was $157 below—a loss of $175.

SOURCE: U. S. Dept. of Commerce, SURVEY OF CURRENT BUSINESS, August 1968.

(a) States above national average at time RTW was passed.

(c) When North Dakota passed the law in 1947, it was $130 above the national average. The next year it was $28.00 below. In 1966 it was $579.00 below. In 1967 it was $652.00 below—a loss of $782.

Per capita income is the clearest measure of a state's economic health. In this important economic indicator the facts demonstrate dramatically that so-called "right to work" states lag badly behind free collective bargaining states. Despite some growth in per capita income in RTW states during the vast national economic expansion of the past two decades, their growth has been slower than other states.

The result—today five states which were above the national per capita income before they passed the so-called "right to work" now are below it. One other state—Nevada—which was above the national average when they passed the law, is stil above, but has lost ground. This state is not as far above as when they enacted an RTW law.

IT ISN'T THE UNION IT'S YOU

If you want to have the kind of a Union
Like the kind of a Union you like,
You needn't stand on the corner and talk
And forever and ever gripe.

Come out to the Union on meeting night,
For there's plenty of work to do.
It's a knock at yourself when you knock your Union—
It isn't the Union—it's YOU!

When you hear a rumor that things are wrong
And trouble somewhere is brewing,
It's time for us all to quit our talk
And stop our fretting and stewing.

Just take a look at yourself and say—
"What is there that I can do?"
Are you doing your bit to make things hit?
It isn't the UNION—It's YOU!

GRAPE STRIKERS ARE HAILED, BOYCOTT AGAINST TABLE GRAPES IS PRESSED

The need for total support of the United Farm Workers is greater than ever before, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared in calling on every affiliate, every officer and every union member "to accept this struggle as a struggle of all trade unionists."

"More than anything else, this support of the boycott against table grapes," the council said in a statement reviewing the career of "this, the youngest member" of the AFL-CIO family.

The statement noted that "after almost four long and trying years of striking and boycotting" to build their union, the stamina and courage of UFWOC officers and members "continues to amaze America and to inspire trade unionists throughout the nation."

The reward for this effort has been the winning of 11 contracts "and the establishment therein of levels of dignity and security for field laborers never before attained."

Yet that segment of the industry which produces fresh table grapes in California and Arizona vineyards "continues to pursue its backward policies and to bitterly oppose the workers' organizational efforts," the statement asserted.

Many growers were discovered by the Labor Dept. recently to have sponsored and financed an artificial "union" to discredit and destroy the legitimate union led by Cesar Chavez, the council said. In addition they engaged two nationally prominent public relation-advertising agencies "to promote their image and destroy the UFWOC." It added:

"The Great Cause"

"The great cause of the farm workers . . . remains among the most just and meritorious in the history of American labor.

"These workers and this crusade have stirred the conscience and aroused the sympathy of decent-thinking people throughout the world.

"AFL-CIO takes pride in having pioneered in this effort and in having continued as a strong and constant supporter of the farm worker. Never has there been an issue so universally joined in by the family of AFL-CIO."

Forego Differences

The statement related that even labor organizations outside the AFL-CIO "find the 'common cause' character of this struggle so overwhelming that they are able to forego other differences" to assist the struggling union.

The federation is "appreciative of every effort in the national community, both within and outside the ranks of organized labor, for all acts . . . which aid the AFL-CIO Farm Workers," the statement declared.

While some UFWOC members walk boycott picket lines, the council pointed out that "others are walking the highway from Coachella, Calif., to Calexico, on the Mexican-U.S. border, in a demonstration designed to enlist the sympathy and support of the 'green card' commuters who have broken previous strikes." The cross-border commuters are being used by grape growers, who refuse to recognize the union, as strikebreakers.

Study Shows 'Right to Work' Laws Have Only Slight Effect

So much more heat than light is generated over the "right to work" laws that when illumination is cast on the issue it is welcome.

In the present instance the illumination comes from Frederic Meyers, a former economics professor at the University of Texas who now teaches at the University of California at Los Angeles. In a report for the Fund for the Republic entitled "Right to Work in Practice," he declares:

"My considered conclusion, based on 10 years of close observation of labor relations in Texas, is that the 'right to work' statute, taken by itself, has had a minimal direct effect."

The law has not borne out the expectations of its advocates or opponents, says Meyers. It has not guaranteed the individual freedom of workers and has not destroyed the labor unions. It has, however, made unions less responsible by making them more responsive to extreme demands of vocal minorities.

"Right to work" laws are in effect now in 18 states besides Texas. They prohibit labor contracts that make union membership a condition of holding a job. Usually this refers to the union shop provision that requires a worker to join a union within a fixed period after employment, customarily 30 days, and remain a member or be fired.

Wisconsin does not have a "right to work" law. It does, though, impose restrictions. Labor union contracts containing union security provisions must be approved by two-thirds of those voting in a referendum conducted by the state labor board, and the two-thirds must represent a majority of employes in the bargaining unit.

There have been flurries of activity here in behalf of "right to work," but none of sizable proportion. The conclusion of Prof. Meyers, which is convincingly supported by information obtained in extensive interviews in Texas, suggests that Wisconsin has been wise in avoiding a "right to work" law or a struggle over the issue.

Meyers views the Texas law as primarily a symbol—to management standing for the political power it has held and hopes to retain, and to labor representing another disappointment in state legislation. But the real problems of how to achieve freedom in a complex industrial society remain unsolved.

It is to these problems that Wisconsin might better address itself, than by expending energy and creating animosity with a "right to work" campaign.

WHAT DO YOU THINK OF THE PROPOSED "RIGHT-TO-WORK" LAW?

This question was asked of various individuals in Wisconsin Rapids by a member of the Retail Clerks International Association. These are the answers to the question:

1. "I guess it's alright - save paying union dues and we could get in more overtime and bpy, I could use an extra fifth bucks or so every two weeks".

   - Union mill employee

2. "I don't know - I never heard about it".

   - Mill employee

3. "I don't know much about it, but guess it's OK".

   - Union mill employee

4. "I don't know - never heard of it".

   - Female clerk, union

5. "Right-to-work" law - what's that?"

   - Male union worker

6. "I don't know too much about it but I guess it would be awful for the union and I figure I'm pretty strong union so I'm against it".

   - Female clerk, union

7. "I don't know but I don't believe in the union shop so if it's for doing away with that, I'm for it".

   - Canned goods salesman

8. "My God, no! We can't let that happen here. I was down South and some of those guys are working 60 hours a week for 65¢ an hour".

   - Mill employee

9. "I don't think we should have that here, it's against all union principles. But maybe like in New York for the dock workers where the unions are corrupt they need something like this".

   - Bread salesman

10. "I don't understand or know much about it, but I'm against it and don't know why the working man keeps putting people into office that do want that kind of thing".

    - Union man

11. "Right-to-work Law - what's that?"

    - Union clerk

12. "I don't know. I never heard of it".

- Union clerk

13. "Oh, I guess it would be OK - a person could advance faster".

- Mill employee

14. "Whoever dreamed that deal up should be hung and that goes for the damn fools who voted it in some places".

- Mill employee

15. "I think it would bring more industry into Wisconsin and make for more efficient workers because it would eliminate seniority and you wouldn't have to keep non-efficient or older workers. Also people would advance faster on their own merit".

- Mill employee

16. "Don't know nothing about it".

- Mill employee

17. "I don't want it here. I don't want to work with a bunch of Negroes.

- Mill employee

18. "What's it all about - never heard of it".

- Union clerk

19. "Yes, I think it would be a good thing. The unions have tied us down so we can't make a decent profit".

- Dept. Manager in Dept. store

20. "I don't know anything about it. Never heard of it".

- Dentist

21. "Iread a little about it but it doesn't really concern me so I don't care either way".

- Small business man (3 workers)

22. "I can't understand why it wasn't passed before. The unions have grown too strong and arrogant. They need to be knocked down a peg or two".

- Dept. manager in Dept. store

23. "I don't belong to a union anymore, but they're benefitting me all the time. When they get a raise, I do too, and when a law jeopardizes unions, I'm against it".

Some Empirical Estimates of the Market Value of the Right-to-Work[1]

THOMAS H. NAYLOR AND WILLIAM H. WALLACE

Duke University

INTRODUCTION

IN recent months the debate over the bill before the Congress of the United States (HR 77) to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which gives states the right to pass so-called Right-to-Work laws banning the "union shop" has raised a number of heretofore unanswered questions. Among these are included: How much is it "worth" to an employer to locate his firm in a state which has no such law? How much is it "worth" to an employee to locate in a state which has a Right-to-Work law as compared to a state which has no Right-to-Work law? What is the "market value" of the Right-to-Work?

It would appear that some sort of empirical estimate of the "value" of the Right-to-Work would be vital to the arguments of corporate managers and industrialists who seem to favour Right-to-Work laws, union leaders who vigorously oppose Right-to-Work laws, and governmental policy makers on the federal, state, and local level. In this paper we discuss four alternative empirical estimates of the "imputed value" or "opportunity cost" of the Right-to-Work.

ANALYSIS

The doctrine of "imputed value" or "opportunity cost" has a long history in the development of economic thought which can be traced back to the work of the Austrians in the late nineteenth century. The opportunity cost of any particular course of action is the amount of gain, which is sacrificed by pursuing that course of action rather than the next most desirable alternative.[2] Armed with the notion of imputation, economists have shown little reluctance over the years to imputing values to such intangibles as the "right of property", "patent right", "copyrights", etc.[3] Therefore, it seems reasonable to assume that it may be possible to obtain estimates of the imputed value of the Right-to-Work.

We propose to estimate the imputed value of the Right-to-Work by estimating the average differences in (1) per capita personal income, (2) average weekly wages in manufacturing, (3) unemployment insurance maximum weekly benefits, and (4) minimum hourly wages between the States which have Right-to-Work laws and states which do not. We will also present discounted present values of the differences which result from the analysis in (2) for several different periods of employment and at selected rates of discount.

In order to obtain estimates of the imputed value of the Right-to-Work, we make use of the following simple econometric model:

$$Y_i = a_i + b_i X + u_i \qquad (i = 1, 2, 3, 4)$$

where,

Y_1 = per capita personal income in dollars by state for 1964,

Y_2 = average weekly wages in manufacturing in dollars by state for 1964,

Y_3 = unemployment insurance maximum weekly benefits in dollars by state as of January 1, 1965,

Y_4 = minimum hourly wage in dollars by state as of July 1, 1965,

X = a "dummy variable" which takes on the value "1" if a state has a Right-to-Work law and the value "0" if the state does not, effective July 1, 1965, u_i = a disturbance term,

a_i = a parameter to be estimated, and b_i = a parameter to be estimated.

The data for our model are listed in Table 1 for all 50 states and the District of Columbia. Per capita income and average wages in manufacturing for 1964 were obtained respectively from the usual Department of Commerce and Department of Labor sources. The figures on unemployment insurance represent the statutory maximum weekly unemployment insurance benefits being paid by states as of January 1, 1965. The information contained in the column in Table 1 indicating whether or not a state has a Right-to-Work law was obtained from Department of Labor sources, as well as directly from the statutes of the respective states as of July 1, 1965.

The figures in the "Minimum Wage" column of Table 1 require special attention. Although the federal wage-hour law has set the minimum wage at $1.25 per hour, many different categories of workers are not covered by the federal law. As a result, 34 states have enacted their own minimum wage laws which have the effect of supplementing the federal minimum wage law by bringing certain groups of workers who are not covered by the federal law under the coverage of state laws. There are, however, wide ranges of differences between state minimum wage laws in terms of the categories of workers covered by these laws. In order to make use of the available information on state minimum wage rates, we have found it necessary to standardize the data as much as possible. Although no two states have identical minimum wage laws, two distinct patterns are observable among the states. On the one hand, some states have a statutory minimum wage which applies to all classifications of workers in the state except those specifically exempted from coverage by the statute itself. On the other hand, some states have no statutory minimum wage, but do have what are known as wage orders, i.e., minimum wage rates which are applicable only to specific industries, age groups, sexes, etc.

In listing the minimum wage rates of the various states in Table 1, we have taken the following approach. If a state has a statutory minimum wage rate (regardless of the number of exemptions permitted) then that wage rate as of July 1, 1965, has been listed in the "Minimum Wage" column of Table 1. If a state has no statutory minimum wage, but has wage orders applicable to certain industries, then we have selected the maximum minimum wage rate in effect for the industries in that particular state to which wage orders apply. However, in Colorado and New Jersey, we have made an exception to this rule, for in both of these states the minimum wage for "beauty culture" is the highest in the state—$1.00 an hour in Colorado, and $1.50 an hour in New Jersey. Therefore, in both of these states, we decided to select the second highest minimum wage rate applicable to a particular industry ($.80 in Colorado, and $1.25 in New Jersey), rather than biasing the results upward by the inclusion of the "beauty culture" minimum wage.

Results

The statistical estimates resulting from application of the four regression equations mentioned in the previous section to the data in Table 1, are presented in Table 2.

There is no attempt in the analysis to assert causal relationships. The information presented in Table 2 is intended merely to show differences, on the average, in Right-to-Work states vis-a-vis non-Right-to-Work states, with respect to each individual Y_i. The a_i, the constant term of each regression equation, shown in the second column of Table 2, is the average value of each Y_i for non-Right-to-Work states, and is shown again in the final column of Table 3.

Of primary importance in Table 2 is the b_i column, containing the least-squares regression coefficients, relating the dummy independent variable to each dependent Y_i. Each of the b_i's as well as the simple

Table 3 presents a comparison of mean values of Y_i's for all 50 states and the District of Columbia, with mean values of those variables computed separately for Right-to-Work and non-Right-to-Work states. The differences between columns 2 and 3 of Table 3 are, of course, the b_i's.

The analyses shown in these tables lead to certain significant observations. Per capita personal income is, on the average, $490.87 per annum lower in Right-to-Work states than in non-Right-to-Work states. It is $308 per annum lower than the average of all states. Considering average weekly wages in manufacturing, Right-to-Work states are $11.18 per week lower than non-Right-to-Work states, and $7.02 per week lower than the average of all states. In the case of the maximum weekly benefit from unemployment insurance, Right-to-Work states are $7.30 per week lower than non-Right-to-Work states, and $4.58 per week lower than the average of all states. The minimum wage in Right-to-Work states is 53.6c per hour lower than non-Right-to-Work states, and 34c per hour lower than the average of all states.

To the extent, therefore, that the four variables used are appropriate measures of economic well-being, it must be concluded that states which have Right-to-Work laws are not as prosperous, generally, as states which do not have such laws. This analysis does not purport to attribute the differences to the existence of Right-to-Work laws. It simply points out that such differences are revealed when states are classified according to this criterion, and the difference in each case between the two groups is significant.

From the point of view of the manufacturing employee, the difference which exists between the two groups of states in average weekly wages in manufacturing can be shown to assume major proportions, depending upon the length of time a worker is employed in a manufacturing occupation. Table 4 presents these figures. Similar analyses could be made with respect to the other Y_i's. For example, if current differences were to persist in average weekly wages between the two groups of states, the average worker in the average Right-to-Work state, who spends ten years in manufacturing employment, would expect to earn $5,813.60 less during that period of time than if he were employed similarly in the average non-Right-to-Work state. Table 4 also shows that this amount would have an immediate discounted present value, at 3%, of $4,959.12.

One might interpret this figure to mean that, if current differences persist, the privilege of ten years of employment in an non-Right-to-Work state is worth that amount to the average worker at the present time. Theoretically, if the appropriate rate of interest is 3%, the average worker in manufacturing should be willing to pay up to $4,959.12 for the privilege of ten years of employment in a state which does not have a Right-to-Work law. If the prospective period of employment is 40 years, as opposed to ten, the present value of this privilege increases, at the 3% rate, to $13,438. Table 4 shows similar comparisons at other rates of interest.

It is perhaps unreasonable to assume that current differences in average weekly wages or the other variables used in this study will continue to exist, since there are many forces at work to narrow the differences. However, looking at the figures which are most current, one is inescapably led to the conclusion that for the average worker there is a negative value associated with the Right-to-Work.

There is a long-standing tradition in economics to use expected future incomes for the purpose of estimating present values.[4] The economic value of the Right-to-Work is therefore quantifiable only in terms of the observable differences in those economic variables with which its existence is so closely associated, and the expected future effects of these differences.

Seniority—Fair Play On the Job

Collective Bargaining REPORT

Prepared by Department of Research
Reprinted from September 1961
AFL-CIO AMERICAN FEDERATIONIST

The importance of seniority has grown considerably in the postwar years. Increasingly, a worker's length of service with an employer decides how much p[illegible]e has over others and how much he receives [illegible]in benefits.

Years a[illegible]itter disputes raged over the "seniority issue," the question of whether management should give preference to workers with longer service or to those with greater "merit."

Differences of principle on this issue now have been pretty well resolved. Both unions and employers quite widely accept length of service as the controlling or at least a key factor in deciding relative status of employes and in other aspects of employment.

Seniority disagreements still arise frequently but essentially only on the drafting of detailed rules and the application of seniority systems rather than on the basic principle of preference by seniority.

This change is part of a gradual shift in attitudes on workers' rights. No longer is management wholly free, where workers are organized, to pick and choose among employes solely as it wishes, to fire, lay off, promote or transfer whomever it wants on whatever basis.

Slowly but definitely, under steady prodding from unions, recognition has grown that workers too, and not employers alone, have rights in an employment relationship. Mere payment of wages does not meet all an employer's responsibilities to workers. Moreover, the view has grown that certain worker rights, particularly the right to continued employment, should increase in proportion to length of service with the employer.

The longer a worker works for an employer, the more closely his life becomes invested in that employment. Where he lives, his friends, his habits, his sleeping and eating times, his entire physical and emotional wellbeing and other aspects of his and his family's life are each greatly influenced by his job.

Worker rights in return for this "investment" now reasonably include some assurance of job security, some opportunity for advancement and additional benefits accruing with longer service. These are not absolute rights. They are contingent upon ability to perform the work competently and on the availability of work, but they are not subject to disregard at the whim of the employer.

In a sense, such rights flowing from continued service are coming to be regarded as property rights, especially if set forth specifically in a labor agreement and may not be taken away from the worker except in specified circumstances and, even then, often only upon adequate compensation for their loss.

The growth of worker rights is reflected not only in seniority practices but also in changing concepts of what constitutes "fair play" in discharge and discipline and in the increase in severance pay arrangements to compensate for the loss of valuable rights earned during employment.[1]

Why Seniority Practices Have Grown

The pressures of unions and generally favorable experience with seniority practices are the major forces which have created increased observance of seniority principles.

Seniority was of course often observed before unions appeared on the scene. Its virtues also lead to its observance today in many non-union establishments.

But it is only because of union action that the weight given to seniority has spread so widely and has been formalized, increased and made enforceable. In non-union situations, consideration given to seniority may be limited or erratic. Even if a non-union company announces a seniority policy, it can in the absence of a union freely change or depart from seniority standards, regardless of its employes' wishes.

It should be remembered that although most unions press for seniority rights there is no universal or binding union policy on seniority observance. Commentators on labor-management relations sometimes are unaware or forget that each union shapes its own bargaining policies according to needs and desires of its own members and the practicalities of its own industry or trade.

Where a union's members believe, for example, that it is fair and practical to rely on factors other than seniority, they do not pursue a seniority policy. Screen actors, for example, do not insist on seniority in selection for movie roles. Similarly, length of service is not significant for job security purposes in certain construction and seasonal activities where lack of work is handled through work sharing rather than layoffs of selected individuals.

But while unions do not adhere blindly or invariably to the seniority principle, for most types of employment they have found that, from the standpoint of both workers and management, it makes good sense or at least better sense than alternative practices.

One advantage of a seniority system is that it provides greater security for older workers. It provides assurance that, while long-service workers are still capable of working efficiently, they will not be cast aside or bypassed merely to make room for newer workers.

This is usually a union objective, both because of awareness that older workers have the most difficulty in finding other work after a layoff and because a sense of fairness endorses the idea of providing more security and greater benefits to those who have been in employment longest.

Another basic reason unions seek seniority protection is to prevent or limit abuses which arise under other methods of selection among employes. Unlike other bases for selection, length of service has the advantage of being readily measurable and objective.

This article is not intended as a guide for local negotiators in details of seniority arrangements. It does not deal with such important bargaining matters as appropriate seniority units, effects of interruptions of employment on seniority or types of exceptions to seniority rules. Instead, it simply presents a broad background for negotiators on the following:

- Types of rights and benefits usually linked to length of service.
- Advantages of preference by seniority.
- Effect of seniority on efficiency. Does seniority reduce incentive and efficiency?
- Effect of seniority on labor mobility. Does seniority in effect tie a man to his job, so desirable shifts from one company or industry to another are prevented?

Rights Based on Length of Service

Seniority is used for two broad purposes. One is to determine priority whenever a choice must be made between employes. Thus, it is the basis, or a basis, for choosing who is retained when layoffs are necessary, the order of rehiring and who gets first crack at a promotion or other desirable assignment. The other use of length of service is to determine eligibility for, and size of, various benefits.

Selection for layoffs and for recalls to employment after layoff is probably the most important application, for here basic job security is involved. It is now customary for length of service to be the governing factor in selecting employes for layoff and determining the order of rehiring.

A Labor Department Survey of major agreements in 1954-55 found almost 70 percent of layoff and recall provisions expressly made seniority the controlling factor in layoffs, although often stating specifically the senior employe must be able to do the available work. The other layoff provisions either stated seniority applied where ability was equal or that seniority was one of the factors considered, but it was likely that under many of these seniority usually prevailed in practice even though not technically required by contract language.

Actually, the degree of security for the senior worker depends not merely on whether seniority is made the controlling factor but on how widely the seniority may be exercised. Can seniority be applied only within an occupation or a department or can it be applied in a broader unit, say the plant or the entire company? Can an employe use his seniority to "bump" or displace a junior man in another job or unit?

The types of seniority units agreed on and how they are woven together vary greatly from company to company and industry to industry, depending a good deal on the degree of job interchangeability or how readily workers in some occupations can handle the duties in others.

In general, unions seek the broadest units and rights to bump junior workers in order to provide the greatest job security for longest-service workers. The object is to prevent situations in which a long-service worker in one department may be laid off when there is a shortage of work for that department while a junior employe is retained elsewhere in the plant on a job the senior man could perform.

Management often wants to limit the amount of bumping to avoid "excessive" shifting about of workers with accompanying disruption and loss of efficiency. Unions usually argue that disruption accompanying bumping at layoff time is a worthwhile cost in return for the value of keeping longer-service workers. They often point also to the side benefits of bumping in the form of diversified experience and increased versatility gained in movement from job to job.

Another important use of seniority is in determining preference for advancement. Promotions and transfers used to be largely at management discretion, with management's selection challenged by unions only on grounds of favoritism.

But in recent years, union efforts have upgraded the weight given to length of service in filling desirable openings. In many companies length of service is

Seniority Rights in Plant Relations

Two recent court rulings serve notice that management may no longer be able to lightly deprive workers of job rights by moving their plants. The rulings hold that companies shutting down plants to move to new locations are obligated to recognize seniority rights of their old employes in manning the new plants.

In one case, a company transferred operations from New York to Pennsylvania after its union agreement expired. Several workers laid off from the old plant claimed rehiring rights with full seniority in the new plant, but were turned down by the company (Glidden's Durkee Famous Foods Division) on grounds their seniority rights were good only in the old plant and only while the agreement had been in effect.

The workers went to court, charging they were being deprived of employment and valuable accumulated pension and other benefits. The U. S. Appeals Court agreed with them.

The court drew an analogy to pensions, pointing out retired workers on a pension have a right to continued pensions after an agreement runs out or a plant closes. It ruled seniority is a vested right "earned" by employes, constitutes "valuable unemployment insurance" and, while such rights might be bargained away, they could not be unilaterally annulled by the company. The court held the workers were entitled to employment at the new plant with seniority and reemployment rights they had acquired at the old one.

In a second case, a District Court similarly ruled that employes in an abandoned plant have reemployment rights in a new plant. The company (Gemmer Division of Ross Gear and Tool Co.) was moving from Detroit to Tennessee. The laid-off employes asked that, under their contract clause giving rehiring rights after layoff, they be put to work in the new Tennessee plant with full seniority.

The court ruled in their favor, stating "the rights and benefits that have accrued to the individual employes persist and cannot be unilaterally denied by the employer without the employes' consent. Among these rights and benefits would be included the right of seniority or, as more specifically involved in this case, the right to be rehired after a layoff, as stated in the contract."

This company also argued that the agreement recognized the union only for the Detroit plant and so was inapplicable in the new plant. The court said the recognition clause was significant only for purposes of union recognition and did not limit the benefits and rights individual employes had been given by the agreement.

now the principal consideration, particularly where there is a fairly clear line of progression in which experience on one type of job prepares a worker reasonably for a step-up to a higher job.

Reliance on seniority in promotions does not mean the senior worker gets a job for which he lacks ability. It does mean the senior man gets first crack at a job opening and is then entitled to the job if he has the ability to perform it or to learn to handle it competently in a reasonable break-in period.

Even where seniority is not the foremost consideration in promotion, there has been a general increase of its importance. In some instances where the union agreement may state that seniority shall be one consideration or that ability governs, with seniority becoming decisive only where abilities are about equal, management may in practice actually rely on seniority except where there is a quite evident and generally recognized difference in abilities.

There are also many other areas in which a worker's rights often depend on his length of service. Among the most common are (1) order of choice of vacation period, (2) prior opportunity in selection of hours of work (days off or shift assignment are the most important), (3) first choice at overtime work and (4) preference for desirable work location, parking space, locker assignment, etc.

In the field of benefits, a certain minimum period of service is usually required for eligibility for almost all kinds of benefits. For some benefits, completion of the minimum period—ordinarily 30 days or less, but sometimes as long as a year—entitles the employe to the same level of benefits as the longest-service worker. This is typical of paid holidays and medical and life insurance protection, for example.

But for other benefits, the longer-service worker usually gets more liberal treatment. Vacations and pensions are prime examples. It is customary for longer-service workers to get longer vacations. The right to a pension on retirement for age or disability is contingent on completion of a specified number of years of service and often the size of the pension is in direct ratio to years of service. Other benefits often scaled upward according to service include paid sick leave allowances, severance pay and various types of bonuses.

Wage adjustments are also sometimes geared to service, with workers qualifying for automatic increases upon completion of specified periods of service on the particular job or with the company.

Advantages of the Seniority System

Is it desirable to base job retention and promotion rights and superior benefits on length of service?

On the question of benefits, there is little serious management-labor dispute on rewarding longer service with certain additional benefits. There are differences on particular benefits and on how sharply benefits should be graduated with service, but there is general agreement that more liberal benefits are warranted.

In selection for layoff, unions ordinarily want length of service to be the decisive criterion and management typically is now disposed to agree, although it often seeks to limit its application through restrictions on the scope of the seniority unit and through various exceptions.

On promotions, management is more inclined to balk on a decisive role for length of service. Some unions are less insistent on seniority for promotions, but in most unions' judgment a seniority standard for promotion makes more sense than such alternative yardsticks as "ability" or "merit."

The length-of-service rule has been criticized by some in management on grounds that, by favoring the older worker merely because he has longer service, it discourages incentive and encourages complacency, downrates ability and hampers efficiency by not making full use of newer, more efficient workers.

The validity of such criticism varies with the type of job and work force involved. The criticism also must be measured against the shortcomings of alternative methods of selection to determine whether, even if seniority rules do have certain flaws, they nevertheless work better than other bases for selection.

Under a seniority system, each employe knows where he stands in relation to other employes. Selection does not depend on the judgment or whim of a particular supervisor. Because length of service is easily measurable, it is a consistent and definite yardstick.

Seniority also is ordinarily better accepted by employes as a fairer basis for layoff selection than any other criterion and is therefore best for the morale of the worker group as a whole.

By contrast, efforts to base the order of selection on "ability," "merit" or some other subjective standard run into difficult problems of measurement and potential abuse. Indeed, under such systems age is often held against a worker; a long-service employe may be laid off or skipped over for promotion merely because of his age, even if he is equally or more able than younger men.

The "merit" criterion leads some employes to curry favor with supervisors and otherwise seek undeserved preferential treatment. The way is open to discrimination, to favoritism, to arbitrary selection under the guise of measuring "ability" or "merit."

This is true even where an employer may not consciously practice discrimination. The judgment of individual supervisors may be open to influence. Workers who are good self-advertisers are likely to fare best under such a system.

This type of situation normally encourages insecurity and dissatisfaction among most workers, often with more damaging effects on efficiency than flow from any seniority system.

Much criticism of seniority has been unwarranted for another reason. Problems arise not really because of seniority rules but simply because there are layoffs. It is the fact of layoffs, rather than the criteria used for selection, which is the troublemaker.

As long as some workers are dropped and others retained, there will be complaints against the criteria used for selection, whatever the criteria. Seniority, whatever its shortcomings, has gradually come to be recognized as the criterion which makes for the least criticism and dissatisfaction, which serves as a more clearcut, orderly and equitable means for layoff selection than any alternative method.

Seniority Rules and Efficiency

In any event, how true is it that reliance on seniority hurts initiative and efficiency? Obviously, the answer varies with the type of work involved and with whether contributions of seniority to efficiency offset any losses of efficiency.

For many jobs which call for specific duties with fixed time limits, particularly work on a machine-paced assembly line, differences in ability are not significant.

Seniority Effects on Labor Mobility

"There are fashions in problems as well as hats; and when any given problem is solved, an equal and opposite problem generally emerges. The matter of labor mobility is a good case in point. A generation ago, 'wasteful and destructive turnover' was seen as a primary evil. Today it is feared that workers have become badly immobilized. While 'turnover' may still be an ugly word, 'mobility' has taken on a favorable connotation, something like 'alkilinity;' and while 'stabilization' is still a virtue, 'immobilization' is a vice.

"It is said that seniority systems, health and welfare plans and negotiated pensions have chained the worker to his job; that the adaptability and flexibility of the labor force are being sacrificed; and that a new industrial feudalism is being built . . .

"Actually it is not very likely that these negotiated benefits (seniority status, pension credits) have had much effect on the quit rate. Most workers who quit their jobs are young in years and low in service. They do not have enough seniority to keep them from changing jobs; they have typically not reached an age where retirement is a real element in their thinking; and they have plenty of time to accumulate work credits after coming to rest. The older worker, on the other hand, is disinclined to change employment for a good many reasons even in the absence of seniority and fringe benefits—particularly the difficulty of securing another job, the probable loss of economic status and his settled way of life generally."—Professor Arthur M. Ross in American Economic Review, December 1958.

As long as such duties are performed competently, plant productivity is little affected by whether one worker has potentially more ability than another.

For types of work in which differences in ability may be important, seniority is often largely synonymous with efficiency. The longest-service employes generally are the most experienced, ablest and most reliable persons for the job.

Some years ago, Professor James J. Healey of Harvard University investigated 58 situations in which an arbitrator had set aside management's decision to promote a junior employe, on grounds of superior ability, over a senior employe.

He inquired of each of the companies involved, in each case at least three years after the arbitrator awarded the job to the senior man, to find out how the senior man made out on the job which management had not wanted to give him.

It might be assumed the companies would tend to justify their original choice of the junior man, but the large majority of the replies to Healey reported the senior employe proved himself able on the new job either immediately or in a short period.

Even more significant was a frank statement in most of these cases that management now doubted whether the junior employe it originally favored would have done any better on the job. Also, in half the cases the senior employe had already advanced since the disputed promotion to still higher-rated jobs.

In less than a quarter of the replies did management say it still thought promotion of the senior man was unsound.

Healey pointed out several reasons why the senior man worked out so well. Management may have been correct in judging the junior employe more able, but the extra ability may have had little to do with the job involved. Also, the fact of promotion may have stimulated the senior man to good performance. In addition, some companies pointed out the problem of determining relative abilities; the appraisal of abilities of the senior and junior employes depended a good deal on the particular supervisor.

One major point often overlooked is the constructive influence of seniority on workers' attitudes to technological change. Seniority systems assure the older, more stable part of a firm's work force it will not be laid off unless the layoff is a severe one cutting deeply into the work force and that it will get first opportunity at new or changed jobs.

They thereby help moderate or eliminate fear and opposition of the key part of the work force to introduction of new technology which may have labor-displacement effects. In the broad sense, this contribution that seniority makes to worker acceptance and cooperation in technological innovation has a decided plus effect on productivity.

If a company lays off its senior workers and retains junior men, it casts into the labor market the workers who probably are less adaptable and less mobile. Wholly apart from questions of equity, of human effects and of practical difficulties older workers have in getting new jobs, it is likely that laid-off older workers will contribute less to national efficiency than if retained in familiar work in which they have accumulated long service and experience.

Seniority and Mobility

Another criticism sometimes made of seniority is that it reduces labor mobility and in that way undesirably limits efficiency of the economy as a whole.

The economy functions best, this argument says, if labor is mobile, if workers respond to employment needs and higher wages in expanding industries or areas. But the older experienced workers are reluctant to change jobs even in response to offers of higher wages, it is contended, because they do not want to give up the security and benefits of accumulated seniority rights. Thus, the argument concludes, seniority practices in effect tie men to their employers and hamper worker movement needed for a flexible, expanding economy.

It is to some extent true that development of seniority rights has reduced the willingness of many long-service workers to give up their jobs to start on new ones. But it is questionable whether long-service employes ever had much willingness to move.

And curtailment of mobility is by no means automatically evil. The benefits of a stable work force and reductions in costs of turnover are considerable advantages, usually more than balancing economic losses from decreased mobility.

Wholly apart from the question of how much and what types of mobility are desirable, it does seem clear the effects of seniority on mobility have often been exaggerated. Long-service workers indeed may be reluctant to change jobs and risk starting anew in a different line of work or location. But, in the main, this is so whether or not they have seniority rights. The same factors which lead workers to stay with one employer for a long time tend to keep them there. Seniority rights may intensify their reluctance to leave, but rarely account for it in the first place.

Most mobility always has been concentrated among younger workers. Many young workers often shift from one job to another, not because they lack seniority but because they have not yet decided what they would like to do or have to do. At some point, they tend to stick to a job, develop family responsibilities and become settled in the community. At that point their mobility diminishes greatly, wholly apart from the question of seniority rights.

Professor Arthur Ross of the University of California, in examining decline in labor turnover rates in recent decades, concluded seniority has played a minor role in reducing labor mobility. His investigation found quit rates had always been low among employes with more than a few years of service—as far back as pre-World War I years when seniority rights were not a factor—and that declines in recent years have been due to curtailment of turnover among junior rather than senior employes.

STATE LEGISLATION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS-- BRIEF SUMMARY OF MEDIATION LAWS

The overall trend in recent years in State mediation programs has been toward better staffed, better supported, and more effective mediation agencies. One of the reasons for this continued growth in mediation services is the essential nature of mediation itself--its character as a supplement to, but not a substitute for, collective bargaining. This has, for the most part, made it acceptable to employers and employees alike.

The first permanent State mediation agencies were established in Massachusetts and New York, as early as 1886, and by 1900 a total of 17 States had laws providing for administration of conciliation and arbitration laws through permanent State boards. By 1915 practically all of the States had some provision in their laws for a mediation program. However, this legislation, except in a few of the industrial States, lay largely dormant on the statute books until the past 15 or 20 years.

The most rapid growth in utilizing the powers granted under the laws has come since 1947. This is due largely to the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, requiring a party to a collective bargaining agreement wishing to modify or terminate such agreement to notify not only the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service but also "any State * * * agency established to mediate and conciliate disputes within the State."

Extent

Forty-six States, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia now offer some degree of mediation assistance, but there is wide variation in the laws, programs, and staffing of the mediation services available. Some States, notably those that have had long experience in industrialization, such as California, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, and Pennsylvania, have built up well-staffed agencies and highly active programs. Many other States, however, have almost no staff or program for assisting employers and workers.

The laws under which the State agencies operate also vary. They range from provisions that simply authorize the labor department "to promote the voluntary arbitration, mediation, and conciliation of disputes between employers and employees," to long and comprehensive laws that establish a permanent board of mediation and set forth in detail its functions, powers, and duties. The Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service is the agency for the District of Columbia.

The four States that have no labor mediation service for disputes in industry generally are Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, and Texas.

Authorization

In most States the mediation program is founded on a statutory authorization, but in six of the States--Iowa, New Mexico, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming--the program has grown up informally as a matter of custom or administrative practice on the assumption that the general powers granted by statute to the labor department are broad enough to include such authority. In West Virginia mediation is offered by the department of labor by order of the Governor.

In most States the department of labor is the agency which by law is directly responsible for mediation activities. Generally the grant of such authority is made directly to the labor commissioner but in 14 States and Puerto Rico, a separate and distinct board of mediation is placed in the department, and made subject to its jurisdiction, either by law or by administrative action. In a few States the mediating agency is either a completely independent agency, or mediating functions are placed in some agency other than that administering the main body of labor laws.

Participation

Most of the State mediation agencies take an active role in offering services to the parties as soon as they have knowledge of a dispute. Others, however, are required by law, or prefer in practice, to wait until one or both parties make a request for assistance.

About half of the States with mediation programs authorize or require the use of the technique popularly known as "fact finding," if mediation fails. Under such authority the mediation agency, or a specially appointed board of inquiry makes a thorough and objective study of the dispute and reports on it and makes recommendations. In some States the law specifically provides for assigning responsibility for failure to reach an agreement. In most of these States the results of the fact-finding inquiry are required by law to be made public.

Almost all the State mediation laws authorize the mediation agency to provide facilities for arbitration if mediation fails. The State agency is often directed to "promote" arbitration in such cases, act as an arbitration board, or name arbitrators if the parties so desire. Any submission to arbitration is voluntary, but if the parties agree to arbitrate, the laws will usually make the arbitration award binding and enforceable for at least a year unless it is rescinded by mutual consent of the parties themselves.

Public Utilities

Thirteen States have laws establishing procedures for mediation and arbitration of labor disputes in public utilities. These procedures generally start with mediation, and provide for fact finding or the establishment of special boards to help the parties find a mutually acceptable ground of settlement.

During the period of State intervention, strikes or lockouts are generally prohibited. If none of the voluntary procedures are successful, the laws of five of these States (Florida, Indiana, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin) require submission of the dispute to arbitration, and those of four others (Massachusetts, Missouri, New Jersey, and Virginia) authorize the Governor to seize the facility threatened by a work stoppage. The Michigan law provides for voluntary arbitration, while the Hawaii, Illinois, and Minnesota laws rely on finding the facts and making them public if mediation fails. However, in a test of the Wisconsin law providing for compulsory arbitration, the United States Supreme Court ruled against the validity of this type of law on the ground that it conflicts with the Labor Management Relations Act. On the basis of this decision the laws in some of the other States have also been declared by the State courts to be inoperative in industries engaged in interstate commerce.

FACT-FINDING IN LABOR DISPUTES: THE STATES' EXPERIENCE

HERBERT R. NORTHRUP

A PERSISTENT proposal to avoid costly strikes would have unions and management submit their disputes to impartial "fact-finding" by responsible third parties; if the disputants do not agree, the fact-finding may become compulsory, or be converted into an "investigation." In either case, the idea is that when the facts are known, agreement will be induced on the basis of the facts made apparent to unions and management, or if either or both remain obtuse to the facts, by public opinion forcing them to see the light.

Fact-finding has had its most complete exposure under the Railway Labor Act. Most observers agree that it has not worked in either the railroad or airline industry as the theory dictates.[1] In the first place, the facts are rarely in doubt—the interpretation thereof, however, is usually not only in doubt, but also in controversy, and not subject to objective determination (What is a fair wage? What pertinence is a contract provision in another industry?). In the second place, public opinion has not risen to enforce fact-finding recommendations. Rather, they have been ignored with impunity. And finally, instead of strengthening, or supplementing collective bargaining, fact-finding has tended to supplant it in the railway and airline industries. The parties no longer prepare to bargain; rather, they prepare for a fact-finding proceeding. Bargaining, if it occurs, is more likely after the fact finders report. Then if no agreement is reached, the fact-finding procedure is not available—it has been used up as part of the tactics of the parties.

Is this experience indigenous to the Railway Labor Act, or the railway or airline industries, or is it inevitable under fact-finding procedure? The question is significant because fact-finding remains a popular political remedy. Greater use of it in so-called emergency strikes has been suggested recently by

Fact-finding, as one of the traditional tools of government to adjust labor disputes, is evaluated in this study on the basis of a survey and analysis of the experience of the states. It is concluded that the device, if sparingly employed, may be useful to its purpose but can easily become a hindrance to effective collective bargaining if invoked indiscriminately and with too much frequency.

the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policies, and by the Governor of Oregon, among others. Opponents regularly refer to the Railway Labor Act experience.

Besides the Railway Labor Act, considerable experience exists with fact-finding at the state level. The variety of state laws and diverse conditions provides good additional bases for determining how fact-finding might work under different conditions, and what pitfalls may develop in its administration.

DEFINITION

Fact-finding involves an investigation by a public body aimed primarily at discovering the issues, and usually making recommendations for their settlement. Finding areas of agreement is a primary duty of the fact finders.

Usually under fact-finding procedure, strikes and lockouts are forbidden, and the status quo is maintained until a period of ten to thirty days, after a report is made. Then the parties are freed of legal restraint.

A SUMMARY OF STATE LEGISLATION

The laws of twenty-eight states (Table 1) provide for some form of official investigation or fact-finding or both, where labor disputes remain unsettled or threaten to upset, inconvenience, or imperil a community; or where one party to the dispute simply requests "investigation." Under these laws, fact-finding has a variety of interpretations, some narrow, some broad. California, for example, with its well-developed and manned mediation staff, follows a narrowly restricted definition of "investigation"...an assignment to develop information as to the nature of a dispute and the possible consequences of a work stoppage. This investigation is made preliminary to a decision to proffer or not to proffer the facilities of the [State Conciliation] Service in a labor dispute.[2]

On the other hand, statutes in Massachusetts and New Hampshire require their state mediation agencies to investigate a dispute and to issue a public report assigning responsibility for its continuance after mediation has not settled the dispute and one or both of the parties have refused the agency's proposal that the case be arbitrated.

In Michigan, Minnesota, and New York, fact-finding involves the traditional concept of holding hearings, and writing a report and recommendations. In other states, fact-finding is largely mediation in another form, with the "fact finders" actually a mediation panel.

The procedure, the method, and the experiences vary from state to state even where laws are written in similar language. The coverage of the laws also varies. In some states, the laws may be involved in any dispute. In others, only public utilities are within the jurisdiction of the fact finders. And in still others, the jurisdiction covers utilities plus "industries affected with a public interest." Wherever the covered industry lies within the jurisdiction of the Labor-Management Relations (Taft-Hartley) Act, the constitutionality of state fact-finding or investigation is in doubt.[3]

Besides the fact-finding provisions of state laws, there are many cases where state governors or mayors of large cities have appointed fact-finding commissions as a means of trying to resolve disputes which have seemed of serious consequence to the local citizenry. Such ad hoc fact-finding usually has no legal basis, but depends for its success upon the

Maine	Board of inquiry may be set up if mediation is declined and if one of parties or interested persons affected request. Report can be made public.	Fact-finding and report	Inactive
Maryland	Commission of Labor may investigate dispute, determine which party is mainly blameworthy or responsible, and publish report in some daily newspaper assigning responsibility or blame.	Investigation and assignment of responsibility	Inactive (note: Maryland also has a seizure law affecting utilities which has been invoked only once).
Massachusetts	Tripartite Board of Conciliation and Arbitration, where no settlement is agreeable and parties will not arbitrate, shall investigate dispute and publish a report.	Investigation and assignment of responsibility	Active until found inapplicable to interstate commerce in General Electric v. Callahan, 294 F. 2d 60 (1962) (note: Massachusetts also has a "choice of procedures" law affecting utilities).
Michigan	Fact-finding by board composed of three disinterested persons and two nonvoting members, one from labor and one from industry. Findings not binding, but made public. Law applies to public utilities, hospitals, and government employees.	Fact-finding with recommendations	Law extensively used for hospital and government employees. Found inapplicable to utilities in interstate commerce in Grand Rapids City Coach Lines v. Howlett, 137 F. Supp. 667 (1955).
Minnesota	Fact-finding by three-man, tripartite commission where public interest, life, safety, or health involved.	Fact-finding with recommendations	Most active of state fact-finding agencies (note: Minnesota also has a compulsory arbitration statute applicable to hospitals only).

prestige of the public official and the willingness of the parties to cooperate. For example, a citizens' panel appointed by the Mayor of Philadelphia in early 1962 resulted, with considerable pressure from both the Mayor and the Governor of Pennsylvania, in a settlement of the six months' strike between Yale and Towne Manufacturing Company and the International Association of Machinists. Here, mediation had clearly failed and no end to the dispute appeared in sight before the special panel led to settlement. On the other hand, those ad hoc interventions too often appear either politically inspired to bail out a faltering union strike or they are bumbling efforts on the part of well-meaning but ineffectual citizens who do not understand the issues and whose efforts may actually prolong, rather than help to solve, the dispute.

Many of the state fact-finding laws are virtually unused in practice and represent little more than a chance idea which was enacted by the state legislature without consideration of the law's role in dispute settlement and which is all but forgotten by the state administrator. For example, in Texas, one of the few states which has no mediation law or agency, the Governor is authorized, when a labor dispute arises, to appoint an "Industrial Commission" to hold hearings and to make a public report on the dispute. In Alabama, where the state does virtually no mediation, the Governor is authorized to appoint, or even to sit upon, a tripartite fact-finding agency. In neither of these states do we have any record of such provisions being utilized. In Rhode Island, the Director of the Department of Labor may, subject to the approval of the Governor, appoint a board "for the consideration and settlement" of disputes not terminated by mediation. This law which was enacted in 1919, has been invoked only twice, but in neither case was a board actually appointed.

COMPULSORY INVESTIGATION IN COLORADO

The pioneer state fact-finding law passed in the United States was the Colorado Compulsory Investigation Act of 1915, which was modeled on a prior Canadian law. Under the Colorado act, employers and employees are required to give each other and a tripartite Industrial Commission thirty-days' written notice of any desired change in the terms and conditions of employment, and all such changes are prohibited until after the Industrial Commission has investigated, held a hearing, or by consent of the parties, arbitrated the dispute. After that the parties are free to strike, or to lock out, or to alter terms of employment. In 1943, Colorado enacted its Labor Peace Act, a comprehensive labor relations law, but the essential features of the compulsory investigation law were not changed.

Under the Colorado law, the Industrial Commission has jurisdiction over all labor disputes within the state. In addition, the commission administers all other state labor, social insurance, and welfare programs. Its reports cover a wide variety of functions, but do not provide much detail for most years on its activities in the labor relations field.

A study of the first eleven years of the Colorado act's history questioned the commission's effectiveness in major controversies and found that it was most successful where unions were weak and afraid to test their economic strength—the usual situation of the weaker party seeking government help. The authors of this study found the commission's records confused and incomplete, and doubted that the commission's claim of handling 1,157 cases between 1915 and 1924, with only 73 strikes or lockouts occurring, was an accurate reflection of its work. Very little fact-finding was done, and no effort was made to inform the public. Most investigations were perfunctory and mediation rather than fact-finding was usually attempted, if the investigation went beyond the initial stage.[4]

Later studies largely agree, concluding that the Industrial Commission actually did little fact-finding. Most of the cases were docketed pro forma, being in effect merely acknowledgment of notices of an impending desire to change an agreement or a notation that a dispute was no longer pending. Mediation was actually the principal dispute activity of the commission between two World Wars.[5]

Following World War II, the Industrial Commission's labor relations activity increased markedly with the temper of the times and the growth of industry in the state. But although the commission received over 4,000 notices of impending contract changes between 1946 and 1952—almost triple both the previ-

Case Reports—Colorado Industrial Commission.

Case 4343. Amalgamated Association of Street, Electric Railway and Motor Coach Employees No. 1142 vs. Continental Bus System. Negotiations in this case were carried on outside of Colorado. The file consists of information designed to comply with Colorado laws.

Case 4344. Produce Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union No. 452 vs. General Outdoor Advertising Co., Inc. Notice was received in this case but further information regarding the situation was not procured. We, therefore, closed our file at the end of the statutory period.

Case 4345. Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen No. 634 vs. Safeway Stores, Inc., Cut-a-Corner Market, Colorado Springs Food Store and Piggly Wiggly Stores (Colorado Springs). Negotiations in this case resulted in a mutually satisfactory agreement.

Case 4346. Drivers vs. Zone Cab Company. A wildcat strike of short duration occurred. No notices were given but the file contains information concerning the situation.

Case 4347. Painters, Paperhangers and Decorators Local Union No. 284 vs. Boulder Contractors. Notice under the Industrial Commission law was received in this case. Subsequent information was not forthcoming. We, therefore, closed our file in the case when the laws had been observed.

Case 4348. Hod Carriers, Building and Construction Laborers Local Union No. 354 vs. Pueblo Contractors. This case turned out to be the same matter discussed in Case No. 4339.

Case 4349. Bakery Drivers and Salesmen's Union No. 219 vs. Merchants Biscuit Company. Negotiations in this case effected an agreement which is on file here. There was no dispute involved which could not be settled by the parties concerned.

Case 4350. International Ass'n of Machinists Lodge No. 86 vs. Illinois-California Express Company. This case was settled by representatives of the union and the company. No notice was served on the commission except by the Employers' Council.

Case 4351. Teamsters Union No. 17 vs. West Coast Fast Freight. Notices under the Industrial Commission law and the Colorado Labor Peace Act were regularly filed in this case. There being no request for a hearing or for mediation services, the case was closed at the end of the statutory period.

The clerical nature of the Industrial Commission's activity, the insignificant cases which come to its attention, and its lack of concern as to whether the provisions of the compulsory investigation law are flouted are all clear from these cases. Apparently, it has not been the policy of the commission to concern itself with the last point unless a complaint is made.

Between 1915 and 1937, when a complaint of violation was made, the Industrial Commission had authority to request an injunction from a state district court in order to restrain illegal strikes, boycotts, picketing, or lockouts. A few of the commission's orders were concerned with such prohibitions. Then in 1937, the state courts ruled that the Colorado "Little Norris–La Guardia Act," passed in 1933, withdrew this authority from the commission.[6] Ten years later, this authority was revived by the passage of the Colorado Labor Peace Act.

The Colorado Labor Peace Act also charged the Industrial Commission with preventing unfair labor practices of both unions and employers, and with conducting representation and union-shop elections. Since then, the commission's principal labor relations activity has been the holding of elections. In fact, there has been no indication of any fact-finding in the biennial reports since 1950. It appears that Colorado's pioneer law is quite inactive in its most widely heralded sphere.[7]

FACT-FINDING IN MINNESOTA

The late 1930's saw young Republican leadership in Minnesota under Harold Stassen come to power, ousting an avowedly prolabor, farmer-labor administration. Among the factors which aided the Stassen candidacy were a series of violent trucking strikes in Minneapolis and St. Paul, and the feeling of many independent voters that the state government was unduly sensitive to union desires. Mr. Stassen's program, therefore, included "a better method" of handling labor disputes. In practice, this meant the enactment of the Minnesota Labor Relations Act of 1939—a law designed to eliminate antisocial activities of labor and management, and to provide an orderly settlement of labor disputes.

The Minnesota law, as amended several times, includes guarantees of free organization by employees and employers, unfair labor practice prevention aimed at both employers and unions, prohibitions against boycotts and jurisdictional strikes, a special compulsory arbitration procedure covering charitable hospitals,[8] an apparently never used law to insure democratic unionism, and the subject of this article, a procedure for mediation and fact-finding of labor disputes.

THE MINNESOTA FACT-FINDING PROCEDURE

The Minnesota Act established a Division of Conciliation supervised by a Labor Conciliator who, with his staff, is charged with mediating labor disputes. Until the law was changed in 1955 as a result of an adverse court decision,[9] the parties were required to notify the Conciliator if a strike or lockout impended and to maintain the status quo for ten days thereafter. At present the parties may merely petition for conciliation. If the Conciliator is unable to settle the dispute by mediation, he suggests arbitration. If this suggestion is not accepted and if the dispute is in an industry "affected with the public interest," which includes, but is not restricted to, any industry, business or institution engaged in supplying the necessities of life, safety, or health, so that a temporary suspension of its operation would endanger the life, safety, health or well being of a substantial number of people of any community, the Conciliator must notify the Governor who may appoint a tripartite commission "to conduct a hearing and make a report on the issues involved and the merits of the respective contentions of the parties to the dispute."

[7]These statements are based on a careful analysis of the biennial reports of the Colorado Industrial Commission between 1936 and 1960. This analysis is also confirmed by H. Seligson and G. Bardwell, Labor-Management Relations in Colorado (Denver: Alan Swallow, 1961) who report "one of the functions of the Commission is to engage in preventive investigation and mediation; little of this has been done, although the 1915 law creating the Commission emphasized this function," p. 151. My analysis of the commission's records does, however, find support for more mediation and unfair labor practice activity on the part of the commission than did these authors.

[8]For a discussion of this arbitration law, see H. R. Northrup and Richard L. Rowan, "Arbitration and Collective Bargaining: An Analysis of State Experience," Labor Law Journal, Vol. 14, February 1963, pp. 184, 189.

The commission's report must be submitted to the Governor after twenty-five days and may be publicized by him. Strikes and lockouts are prohibited for thirty days after the Governor is notified of the existence of a "public interest" dispute, in order to give the commission time to report. If the Governor does not appoint a commission, strikes and lockouts are permitted five days after he is notified, instead of thirty.

This procedure is, of course, very similar to that of the Railway Labor Act, which was enjoying its unearned reputation as a "model law" when the Minnesota legislation was first enacted. An examination of the Minnesota experience indicates some of the same ills which befell its prototype on the railroads—overutilization, inhibition of collective bargaining, lack of the parties' respect for fact-finding recommendations, and lack of public interest in supporting those recommendations.

The Minnesota law began at a difficult time because, soon after its enactment, came the defense program, and then World War II. Early in this emergency period the Conciliator adopted a policy of considering any industry "affected with the public interest" where the employer was materially engaged in the production of defense items. Between 1940 and 1945, 167 commissions were appointed—70 between July 1, 1941 and June 30, 1942. If the commission's recommendations were not accepted, the case might be referred to the National War Labor Board. In any case, the war period provides no real guides to the act's effects.[10]

After World War II, an overeagerness to permit Minnesota's unions and employers to utilize the act persisted for several years. Table 2 shows that an annual average of 43 commissions were appointed between 1946 and 1949. Hotels and restaurants, manufacturing of every description, laundries, optical firms were found to be "affected with the public interest." After analyzing the first decade of the Minnesota law (including the war years), Professor Stieber found "considerable evidence . . . to indicate that factfinding procedure, as practiced in Minnesota, has hindered free collective bargaining." He found a tendency for the same unions and employers to appear before fact-finding commissions each year; for a high percentage of rejection of fact-finding commission reports; and for the Conciliator or the Governor, or both, then to step in and usually effectuate a settlement by compromise between what the commissions recommended and what the party holding out would take.[11]

Stieber's analysis, of course, is quite consistent with the findings, already noted, of most observers who have carefully studied the Railway Labor Act. If the parties learn to expect that a fact-finding board or commission will be appointed, they soon toss everything into the commission's lap rather than settle anything in collective bargaining. The fear is that anything conceded in bargaining or mediation will be used as a spring board for further concessions before the commission. If, however, the commission poorly gauges the relative strength of the parties, or otherwise turns in a report which is rejected by either or both parties, the real emergency occurs. For then, both collective bargaining and the emergency procedure have been exhausted and nothing has been settled.

If, at this stage, a Conciliator or Governor or other public official is available to seek a settlement by putting pressure on one party to make further concessions, the tendency of the party seeking additional concessions to reject a recommendation of a fact-finding commission is further encouraged. Between 1946 and 1949 (Table 2), 45 percent of the cases for which fact-finding commissions were appointed pursuant to the Minnesota law, were settled on the basis of "modification by further conciliation," whereas only 23 percent were settled on the basis of the commissions' reports.

By 1950, the administrators of the Minnesota law were determined to improve the effectiveness of the fact-finding commission procedure by giving "a more strict interpretation of the legislative intent."[12] The following year the Conciliator pointed with pride to the fact that "there has been a continued decrease in the number of disputes referred to fact-finding commissions. This section of the law has been given a more strict interpretation in an attempt to make it more effective."[13]

Table 2 shows that since 1950, there has been a steady decline in the use of fact-finding commissions. There are several reasons for this; one is the new policy of the law's administrators. Certainly, they are correct in stating that the more commissions appointed, the weaker their effectiveness. During the first ten years of the act, public opinion did not rise to support commission recommendations nor did strikes decrease as compared with other areas or states.[14] If the fact-finding commission is to be of even limited service, it must be used most sparingly.

Another reason for the declining use of fact-finding commissions in Minnesota since 1950 has been the general lack of serious strike situations. The most important stoppages in Minnesota since then have been steel or mine strikes under national bargaining, in which the state has been helpless to intervene. The 1950's were a decade of relative labor peace in Minnesota as in the rest of the United States.

Finally, like most states with strike control laws which have not been ultimately tested in the courts, Minnesota is loath to bring about a final test of constitutionality by forcing the issue through the appointment of fact-finding commissions which are unacceptable to the parties. Most appointments in recent years have not been opposed by the parties. In such instances, of course, with compulsion lacking, fact-finding has its greatest opportunity to achieve—actually through a sort of intensified mediation—an acceptable settlement. This is a far cry from the traditional theory of fact-finding which assumes that an impartial commission can, by discovering the facts and publicizing them, induce the parties to agree to a rational settlement.[15]

FACT-FINDING IN NEW YORK

Fact-finding in New York State dates back to 1887 under a law providing for mediation, arbitration, and "investigation" of labor disputes. This authority was later placed in the hands of the State Industrial Commissioner, who is empowered to "inquire into and report on the causes of all strikes, lockouts, and other industrial controversies and labor disputes, and may appoint boards of inquiry for that purpose." In 1941, the law was amended to provide that boards of inquiry may be appointed by the Industrial Commissioner only after the State Board of Mediation certifies "that its efforts to effect a voluntary settlement of the dispute have been unsuccessful."[16]

New York has generally made restrained use of fact-finding. In most cases boards have been appointed because of strikes heavily affecting a particular community, or because a strike involved a problem which was especially difficult to resolve (see Table 3). By contrast, Minnesota has appointed more fact-finding commissions in some months than New York has appointed in twenty-five years.

New York has not had the same experience in having the recommendations of fact finders rejected, which has been a recurring problem in Minnesota over the years. There are several reasons for this. In the first place, because New York has appointed so few boards of inquiry, they have not become commonplace; therefore, when they are appointed, their importance and the consequences of rejecting their recommendations have been dramatized quite vividly. An additional result of such infrequent use has been that the parties have been unable to feel sufficiently assured that a fact-finding board will be appointed, so they have not tended to substitute the fact-finding procedure for collective bargaining.

Another reason why New York boards of inquiry have been relatively successful, at least in terms of achieving settlement on the basis of the fact finders' recommendations, is that they have usually been appointed at that period of time in a dispute when the parties themselves were looking for a way out. Fact-finding in New York has actually been used more as a final mediation procedure than as a formal method of investigating and reporting the facts.

With this interesting record, it is unfortunate that New York State chose to interfere in the Long Island Railroad case in the summer of 1960, for this intervention raised the question of jurisdiction in a manner which may imperil the future usefulness of the New York procedure. Under long-standing federal law, all railroads are within the sole jurisdiction of the Railway Labor Act. An emergency board had reported on this dispute, after which the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen had rejected the report and had instituted a strike which closed the railroad. The strike had been in effect for several weeks with resulting inconvenience but with surprisingly little serious difficulty for the thousands of commuters who seemed somehow to reach their jobs by other means of transportation.

As a tactic, the National Mediation Board announced it was discontinuing its efforts to try to settle the strike, undoubtedly in the hope that this would help bring the parties to agreement. Instead, New York State leaped into the fray; the Board of Mediation entered the case and, on the same day, certified that it could not settle the dispute by mediation. The State Industrial Commissioner then appointed a board of inquiry.

Quite likely, either the railroad or the union could have obtained an injunction precluding the state from proceeding with its inquiry.[17] Instead, they both attempted to cooperate with the state as well as with the federal government. The latter promptly reentered the dispute, in which it had never really released, and actually could not release, jurisdiction. The state fact finders issued a quick report and recommendation which was promptly turned down by the union membership.

As A. H. Raskin of the New York Times pointed out in a cogent analysis that this competitive fact-finding served to hinder rather than help settle the dispute:

In the eight months since the controversy over a shorter workweek began, everyone from President Eisenhower to the Supervisor of the Town of Babylon has tried his hand at settling it. The overlapping peace efforts are suspected of having been a major factor in fortifying the "all-for-nothing" position taken by the two Long Island lodges of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

The union based its strategy on an expectation that one politician or another among those who moved into the picture would put sufficient heat on the railroad to force a quick capitulation. However, the relative ease with which subways, buses and car pools swallowed up the displaced commuters was credited with causing a falling-off in the anxiety felt by state, city, and county officials....

The lack of liaison among the would-be peacemakers proved particularly costly in the make-or-break developments of the last two weeks. And the man both sides considered best qualified to effect an accord [the Chairman of the National Mediation Board] found himself repeatedly pushed off-stage by Governor Rockefeller and other officials.[18]

INVESTIGATION AND ASSIGNMENT OF RESPONSIBILITY IN MASSACHUSETTS

Massachusetts typifies a special type of fact-finding. When mediation fails and the parties cannot agree on other means of settlement, the mediation agency may make an investigation and may publish a report assigning the blame or the responsibility for the existence or the continuance of the controversy. The theory is that either the threat of such public censure or such censure itself by a governmental agency will have the effect of inducing a recalcitrant party to move toward settlement. The results do not seem to bear out the theory.

Public opinion to influence a settlement is difficult to mold. Experience under the Railway Labor Act, the Taft-Hartley Act, and various state laws would seem to indicate that unless the public is made to feel directly and dramatically involved, appeals to "public opinion" are not likely to produce results. Moreover, frequent use, or use for minor disputes, soon causes the public to lose interest and to regard the whole procedure as commonplace even when a major dispute does occur.

The following is a typical Massachusetts assignment of responsibility notice:

After a thorough investigation, followed by a public hearing at the Town Hall in Clinton...for the purpose of determining which party is to blame for the continuance of the strike at the Colonial Press, Inc., and after listening for three hours to testimony from all persons desiring to be heard, and carefully weighing every bit of evidence that could be deduced from that testimony together with the facts established by our investigation, the Board is forced to place the blame on the Colonial Press, Inc.[19]

It would seem too much to expect the public to become excited over a pronouncement of this character, which tells nothing of the history, the issues, or even the parties involved. As an opinion mobilizer, such an investigation notice is not likely to have much effect.

In addition to its failure to mobilize public opinion effectively in favor of dispute settlement, the administration of the Massachusetts law has raised considerable question as to the general appropriateness of an investigation provision. For by its very nature, such investigation demands a very high measure of expertise and impartiality. To assess responsibility for the continuance of a strike demands that one make a value judgment on a very great number of issues where there is no question of right or wrong, but rather the question of whose views shall prevail. For example, if the union desires to limit the employer's right to subcontract work and the employer feels that to yield would threaten the profit margin he regards as necessary to operate the business, the fact that other labor agreements in the area may or may not have a provision on this subject is a bench mark but no criterion on which one can "blame" either party for not yielding. There are hundreds of such issues involved in labor negotiations. And neither the Massachusetts Board of Arbitration and Conciliation nor any other agency or person has ever defined a "fair wage" satisfactorily to a party who desired to disagree.

[18]New York Times, July 19, 1960.

[19]Quoted by Kaltenborn, op. cit., p. 191.

The fact of the matter is that investigation and assignment of responsibility open the door to all sorts of partiality and political pressure and chicanery. To avoid such abuse, appointments to an agency of the highest caliber and professionalism are obviously required. Whether Massachusetts meets this qualification is debatable. As a tripartite agency, the Massachusetts Board is composed of a majority of partisans, each of whom is very unlikely to blame the group he represents for the continuance of a dispute. Consequently, assignment of responsibility has become a matter of pressure on the chairman, with the merits of the case subordinated to union, management, and political pressures. Moreover, the appointment of a number of political personages, not necessarily skilled in industrial relations, to the Massachusetts Board in recent years has not generated confidence in its decisions. In any case, a recent court decision will probably have the effect of doing away with the use of the investigation function of the Massachusetts and similar state laws, except in purely local situations.[20]

MEDIATION PANELS IN NORTH DAKOTA—PRIVATE AND PUBLIC

In 1953, North Dakota adopted a law providing for investigation of labor disputes by the Head of the Labor Division of the Department of Agriculture and Labor. Such investigation usually involves an attempt to mediate the dispute. If mediation fails, the Head of the Labor Division may certify the cases to the Governor for the appointment of a panel to mediate such disputes, or otherwise attempt to resolve them.

The Governor's mediation panels handled approximately fifteen disputes between 1953 and 1960, most of which involved small intrastate situations.[21] In such situations, fact-finding is actually an adjunct of mediation. The mediation panels supplement the Labor Division Head who is the one-man state mediation staff. They perform further mediation work when he feels unable to effectuate a settlement. Whether parties will "save something" for panel mediators and thus render ordinary mediation ineffective remains to be seen.

North Dakota's law also applies to all public employment under state jurisdiction, including municipal employment. It provides for the appointment of tripartite "mediation boards," whose job it is to find facts and make recommendations for the settlement of such disputes. The law also contains a strong prohibition against public administrators' interfering with the right of employees to organize and to bargain collectively. This portion of the law does not appear to have been invoked much, if at all.

FACT-FINDING IN MICHIGAN: HOSPITALS AND PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT

In both the hospital and the public employment fields, Michigan has had the most extensive fact-finding experience. Procedures to handle disputes in both these areas have been largely ignored by both the federal and state governments until recently. Hospital employee relations have been especially unattended. Section (2) of the Taft-Hartley Act specifically excludes from its jurisdiction nonprofit hospitals. In its decisions, the National Labor Relations Board has declined jurisdiction over proprietary hospitals unless they are vital to national defense, located in the District of Columbia where the NLRB acts as a local agency, or operated in connection with an interstate business.[22] And, of course, government-owned hospitals are excluded from NLRB coverage by the general exclusion of all government employment from the act.

Michigan is one of the four states[23] to step actively into this vacuum, which with the growth of hospital care has become a significant part of our economy, with 6,786 hospitals controlling $15 billion in assets and employing 1,460,000 persons.[24] Under the Michigan statute, non-governmental controlled hospitals are handled under one procedure; state- or municipal-owned hospitals under another. Federally operated hospitals are, of course, outside the pale of the Michigan law.

Insofar as non-governmental hospitals are concerned, the Michigan law establishes a Railway Labor Act—like procedure which requires prior notice of proposed contract changes or threatened strikes, urges the parties to settle disputes by bargaining, provides for mediation by the Michigan Labor Mediation Board or its staff where bargaining does not succeed, and directs that the mediators must urge arbitration if the dispute is not settled by mediation. If either party refuses arbitration, the Michigan Board so reports to the Governor who is required to set up a fact-finding commission composed of three public representatives and the parties may each add a non-voting member. No strikes or lockouts are permitted until thirty days after the report and recommendations of the commission.

Table 4 shows that the number of Michigan fact-finding commissions appointed in hospital cases has risen since 1958. This trend may well continue because hospital employees remain one of the largest and lowest paid groups in the country among which union organization is slight.[25] Moreover, Michigan fact-finding commissions for hospital cases are likely to increase in number because, if the hospital does not consent to a representation election, the only way a union of hospital employees in Michigan may achieve legal recognition as bargaining agent is to threaten to strike, achieve through this means the appointment of a fact-finding commission, and then if the hospital refuses a representation election, again threaten to strike. At this point, the Michigan Board must take a strike vote which the Michigan courts have construed as a representation election also because the issue on the ballot is stated in terms of desiring a strike because of the hospital's refusal to recognize the union.[26]

Where state or municipally owned hospitals are concerned, the procedure in Michigan follows the one generally applicable to state employee relations. The Hutchinson Act of Michigan of 1947 strictly forbids work stoppages for employees of the state or its subdivisions, but provides a means whereby such employees may secure mediation or fact-finding of their disputes. Moreover, if the majority of the groups of state government employees petition the Michigan Labor Mediation Board to mediate their grievances, the public employer must attend the mediation hearing and must discuss the issues with the employees or their representative. The employee representative is, of course, usually a union. The public body, as the employer, need not sign a union contract, although some have done so. Typically, the public body issues a statement embodying the results of the discussion with the union and/or employees.[27]

In 1954, the Michigan Labor Mediation Act was amended to provide a fact-finding procedure for government employees. When mediation fails to resolve a dispute, either the public body or the employees may petition the Labor Mediation Board for fact-finding. The Board may then require the parties to present their case to one of its hearing officers in a formal hearing. The hearing officer's report goes to the parties and to the Labor Mediation Board. The parties then have ten days to file written comments with the Board, which reviews the entire record and issues findings of fact and recommendations. Although such recommendations are not binding, and although the union cannot strike, the employer is usually a municipal public body advised by a state agency as to what it should do to settle its labor problem. The experience has been that such recommendations are persuasive.

Since 1956 an amendment provides that public-employee disputes may go to tripartite mediation panels instead of to the more formal hearing officer system. This procedure, however, requires prior agreement of the public employer and this has not been usual.

Table 4 shows a marked increase in Michigan fact-finding reports involving public employees commencing in 1960. The financial crisis in Michigan has perhaps made the settlement of such disputes difficult, but by providing a reasonable method of settlement Michigan has undoubtedly eased a difficult period. It remains to be seen whether fact-finding in Michigan will assist hospitals, public bodies, and their employees to settle disputes, or whether it will become the method of settlement. If the latter turns out to be the case, would the finality of arbitration be preferable?

CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES

In 1951 the United States Supreme Court ruled that the Wisconsin Public Utility Arbitration Act was inoperative in interstate commerce because the Congress, through the Taft-Hartley Act, had preempted the field.[28] In two significant judicial decisions, as well as in an opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, this same reasoning has been applied to state fact-finding legislation.

On the basis of the Wisconsin decision, the Attorney General of the United States ruled in 1952 that Hawaii, then a territory, could not apply its public utility fact-finding law in industries covered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Then, in a significant case, the Michigan Labor Mediation Board was enjoined from asserting fact-finding jurisdiction over state public utility businesses which are within the jurisdiction of the Taft-Hartley Act. A federal district court ruled that the fact-finding function of the Michigan Board was the same as the Wisconsin arbitration procedure except that the results were not binding; that a utility would be subject to considerable pressure to settle on the basis of a fact-finding report, but that under federal law, it was entitled to a settlement after "free and unfettered collective bargaining." Hence the conflict between state and federal provisions ruled out jurisdiction of the state.[29] The case was not appealed, and henceforth Michigan confined its fact-finding activities to areas outside the purview of Taft-Hartley, that is in hospitals and state and municipal employment.

A similar federal-state conflict caused the Massachusetts investigation law to be enjoined from applying to activity in interstate commerce. This case involved an action in 1960 by the then Governor of Massachusetts, who at the request of the American Federation of Technical Employees, asked the Massachusetts Board of Conciliation and Arbitration to investigate a dispute between this union and the General Electric Company's Lynn, Mass., plant and to assess responsibility for its continuance. General Electric appealed to the courts, which found a clear federal-state conflict. Said the court of appeals, first circuit:

The obvious statutory purpose is to coerce agreement by invoking official action to mold public opinion with respect to a labor dispute to the end of bringing the pressure of public opinion to bear to force a settlement. This is quite contrary to the national policy not to compel agreement but instead only to encourage voluntary agreements, freely arrived at after "good faith" bargaining between the parties. The conflict between state and federal policy is obvious.[30]

On June 10, 1963, the Supreme Court invalidated Missouri's "King-Thompson Act," which, as noted in Table 1, provides for a fact-finding procedure involving public utilities, and then permits the state to seize the utility if the Governor believes that the dispute will tend to create an emergency. The court found that the seizure was merely of token variety and that the net effect was to deprive public utilities employees of the right to strike which was guaranteed by the Taft-Hartley Act.

The net effect of the decision is to narrow once more the area of allowable state action in public interest disputes. This would seem to indicate that the already cited lower court decisions invalidating state fact-finding legislation in jurisdictions covered by the Taft-Hartley Act would probably find a favorable reception in the United States Supreme Court.[31]

It would thus appear that unless Congress enacts enabling legislation, or unless the above cases are reversed, state experimentation in fact-finding must be confined to local disputes or to special areas such as hospital or government employment. This appears unfortunate.

CONCLUDING EVALUATION

State experience in fact-finding legislation adds considerably to our knowledge of this technique. The value, first of all, appears greatest where its use is most limited. When it becomes commonplace, as it was at first used in Minnesota, it is more crisis-creating than crisis-solving, for the knowledge that a fact-finding board will be named is an invitation to refuse to settle, or even to bargain, until after the fact-finding report has been made. It is so much easier to refuse to settle if the result of such refusal is not a strike but only the appointment of a fact-finding board. Then a dissatisfied or aggressive party can use the fact finder's report as a springboard for more. Fact-finding, under such circumstances, may actually be of negative value, for it can induce crises, instead of avoiding them.

On the other hand, if the administrators use restraint, fact-finding can be a useful tool when parties are looking for a means of restoring their relationships. Usually this is where a strike has occurred and the will to settle is present, but mediation has been unable to find the mechanism for settlement. Here, fact-finding, adroitly handled, can provide the means, the face saving, or the persuasion to end a dispute. But here again, too much use can perpetuate strikes by calling for fact-finding when its utility is questionable. With headlines screaming and inconveniences irritating the public, such calls are difficult to resist. Yet, dimishing returns set in fast. A governor or administrator who automatically pushes the panic button or who yields to every pressure to appoint fact finders is likely to find that he has created a monster which in time will bring him more headaches than glory.

Where fact-finding is used, as in North Dakota, merely as additional mediation, it has merit because it provides staff help to situations where mediation facilities are in relatively short supply. On the other hand, too great a dependence on panels of this sort for mediation can make the regular mediator's job pro forma, with the parties holding back for settlement until the final mediators have an opportunity to hold their sessions. As in more traditional fact-finding situations, this type of fact-finding, if overutilized, may induce one party to refuse to reduce its demands in the hope of obtaining more—and without fear of losing anything—and another to refuse to grant minor concessions in order to save something for the final mediators or fact finders. The cumulative effects of these attitudes can soon make a mockery of collective bargaining.

Perhaps a cardinal weakness of fact-finding is that the facts are rarely in doubt. The parties are usually reasonably aware of the issues, but their interpretations and their ideas concerning the effects of these facts on the future are not only likely to be divergent but also not subject to a factual test. To assume that the facts of a case, if known, will settle a dispute is quite naïve. Pressure and mediation are more likely the ingredients for obtaining settlement, especially if used at the right time and place, by the right person in the right way. This is why mediation by fact finders is often the most effective use of the fact-finding technique.

It would seem that the shortcomings of competitive fact-finding boards and of investigating in order to cast blame are too obvious to require additional comment. Constitutional restrictions have apparently solved these problems where administrative overeagerness, glory hunting, or political manipulation replaced reasonable restraint and concern. On the other hand, constitutional restrictions now limit valuable experimentation to a degree which appears undesirable.

The activity of the Michigan Labor Mediation Board in the hospital and public employee field is likely to increase because unions in these areas either are too weak or are under such legal restraint as to render them dependent upon government machinery for growth or even existence. To what extent the government should foster union growth in these areas remains an unanswered question, which, in turn, begs the question of the extent to which fact-finding in Michigan does aid union growth. Certainly, it does seem that if strikes are banned, as they are by Michigan's Hutchinson Act for public employees, or if at least emotionally they are almost intolerable, as they are in hospitals, a substitute method of settling disputes is appropriate. In these situations, collective bargaining may become, as it often does, seriously inhibited by the existence of the governmental fact-finding machinery. In such instances, however, there is no reason why we should expect the parties, who in practical terms do not have the rights of private parties, to act as we expect labor and management in private industry to behave. In short, the differences of public and hospital employment from private employment may be such that collective bargaining, as we know it in private industry, cannot work in the hospital and public field, anyway. Therefore, the Michigan experience is likely to prove both interesting and helpful.

Joint study groups and human relations committees created by unions and employers have stirred interest as a new development in collective bargaining. As an innovation to meet changing problems, this approach reflects a vitality and flexibility in collective bargaining. But also because of this very newness and the magnitude of the problems involved, the new approaches still must meet the hard test of experience.

Nevertheless, the joint study approach is far enough along to consider several questions: Why do they come into being? What are their functions and powers? How are they working out?

First of all, the approach is not new. One of the most successful joint labor-management committees dates back to the 1920s. But the idea of the joint study approach has been spreading rapidly since 1959. These committees now function in the steel, meat-packing, auto, rubber, electrical manufacturing, construction and machinery industries. Other industries are exploring the idea.

If there is anything common to the various joint study groups, it is that they are created as a pragmatic response to real and urgent problems.

In many cases, automation and technological change confront negotiators with problems so complex and overwhelming as to be almost unsolvable under the usual bargaining pressures and procedures. In such situations, it becomes logical to remove such formidable problems from the atmosphere of deadlines and refer them to joint committees. Away from the tension of negotiations, union and employer representatives can freely discuss and better define these longer-term problems and shape possible solutions.

But if the joint approach is evidence of a common interest on the part of the union and the employer, it also represents a recognition that conflicts of interest exist.

To the employer, automation promises sharply reduced costs, greater operating efficiency and rising profits. And he would wish to introduce cost-cutting techniques as rapidly as possible.

To the workers and their union, however, automation in some cases has proven devastating. In general, it threatens production standards and job security. The worker's concern is over layoffs, plant closings, changes in job content, loss of skill, loss of income, reduced opportunities and even the permanent loss of his job.

However, both the union and the employer usually recognize the limitations of the joint study groups. They are aware it is not a cure-all nor will it create miracles overnight.

It is obvious that the high-level unemployment over the past six years has been defeating the best efforts of labor and management to stabilize employment. Government policies have failed so far to create the kind of economic growth which would expand job opportunities—a vital pre-requisite to ease the harsh impact of change on individuals. Effective solutions to the basic problems thus would seem to be beyond the capabilities of individual unions and employers.

Put in this perspective, there are basic problems which must be met by legislation and national policies and there are other problems which may be within the influence of joint study groups.

The joint study groups vary greatly in their functions and powers and in their effectiveness. Because of this diversity, an examination of a few of the major study groups, with some amount of experience behind them, may be more fruitful than any attempt to generalize.

The Kaiser Steel Plan

The Kaiser Steel Co. and the Steelworkers established a tripartite committee in 1960 whose function was to determine how the benefits of technological change would be shared. The company and the union were also anxious to seek a new method of approaching their problems, a way that would avoid the rigidity of contract deadlines as well as frozen positions.

The committee is made up of nine members—three company, three union and three public members. In addition to their study committee roles, the public members also are authorized to participate in the bargaining during the last 30 days preceding the contract deadline. Their role is to review the status of negotiations and aid the parties through mediation.

The 1962 contract embodies a major suggestion of the joint committee—a long-range savings sharing plan. It provides that workers share in savings from increased productivity and further guarantees them protection against loss of income or of jobs due to technological changes.

Under the new agreement, no employe will be laid off because of changes in work practices, methods or technology. Not covered are situations where layoffs are due to lower production or a change in product. Protection already is provided in these situations under the existing supplementary unemployment benefit plan and the seniority and pension contract clauses.

Employes displaced by technology will replace those people who leave the company or such displaced workers will fill new jobs created by increased production demands. If the new job taken by the worker is a lower-paid job, the worker receives a pay differential. His pay is guaranteed to equal his former rate for a maximum of 52 weeks, provided the job-change can be attributed to technological change.

Employes get 32.5 percent of the savings brought about through increased efficiency. This is based on the past ratio of labor costs to total manufacturing costs at Kaiser Steel.

Manufacturing costs include all variable labor and material costs and certain non-variable labor and material and supply costs in the maintenance of plant and equipment. Basically, it includes all costs relating to the employes covered by this agreement.

Excluded from manufacturing costs are such items as selling, administrative and general expenses, depreciation and depletion, loss of profits on sale of property, plant or equipment, interest, taxes and profits.

The employes' share will be used basically in two ways: (1) part will be distributed each month as a bonus and (2) part will be set aside as a reserve for any general wage or fringe benefit increases adopted by the rest of the industry or other benefits the employes choose.

Though the plan does not cover employes under wage incentives, these employes may choose to go off incentive and come under the plan. Certain safeguards and inducements are established. No one is forced off incentives, but those who vote it out are assured of greater earnings.

The plan is in effect for a 4-year period, subject to annual review and revision. After this term, either party can terminate the plan on four months' notice.

Each month, a bonus is paid to the workers based on their share of the savings. During the first six months of the plan's operation, distributions to the workers averaged 49.5 cents an hour. An additional $90,000 was placed in a wage-fringe reserve fund. These shares are 32.5 percent of the company's savings in the first six months of the plan's operation.

American Motors—UAW Conference

The 1961 contract between American Motors and the Auto Workers provided for a joint committee known as the American Motors-UAW Conference. The six-man committee is composed of three union representatives and three company representatives.

The conference was set up by the parties to discuss "their philosophies, needs and common responsibilities to the community," away from the bargaining table. The conference has no collective bargaining responsibilities with respect to either contract negotiations or administration. Its purpose is to improve communication and understanding. It is concerned with questions of community facilities, including housing, education, health facilities and recreation.

The 1961 contract also provided for the American Motors Progress Sharing Plan which is essentially a profit-sharing arrangement. It is funded by a 15 percent allocation from profits, after a return of 10 percent has been set aside for the stockholders. One-third of the employes' amount is used to purchase company stock for the workers. The other two-thirds of the employes' share is used primarily for the pension, insurance and supplemental unemployment benefit program, as provided in the contract. The fund is managed by a board of trustees, equally representative of labor and management.

During the first year's experience, an average of 7.3 shares were set aside in trust for each employe. This benefit had a current market value of $129.

Steel: The Human Relations Committee

The Human Relations Committee was created by the Steelworkers and 11 major companies in basic steel in the aftermath of the 116-day strike in 1959. The postwar period had counted many strikes in the industry. With the 1959 strike, both sides recognized the need to explore fresh approaches.

The purpose of the committee was to examine jointly, away from the pressures of contract deadlines, serious problems which held potential for disputes. The agreed-on ground rules were that issues would be mutually chosen, no record would be kept and opinions could be freely expressed.

On the 10-member committee are four members representing the 11 companies and six representatives of the Steelworkers. These top members, who ordinarily would be found on each side's bargaining team, in turn supervise the work of technicians assigned to specific subcommittees.

Subcommittees of the parent group normally run from eight to ten members, usually with a half and half representation. These subcommittees study a wide variety of jointly-selected problems: seniority; grievance procedure and arbitration; economic guides; medical care; job classification; incentives; training needs; income and job security; contracting-out; overtime; supervisors doing bargaining unit work; scheduling and duration of vacations; subsidiaries.

One of the notable contributions of the Human Relations Committee was the sabbatical or extended vacation plan. This plan entitled workers in the top half of the seniority roster a 13-weeks' vacation every five years.

Four "experimental" provisions written into the contract deal specifically with the use of outside contractors on maintenance repair and installation work; the use of supervisors on work normally done by steelworkers; preserving the scope of the bargaining unit where certain jobs are combined; and the scheduling of overtime when laid-off employes might be recalled temporarily.

The pact on these four provisions went into effect August 1, 1963, and continues to December 31, 1964, unless both parties agree on an extension.

Armour Automation Committee

Plant closings and the resulting layoffs of workers led the Packinghouse Workers and the Meatcutters to establish an automation committee with the Armour Co. in 1959.

The committee was tripartite, composed of four representatives of the company, two from each of the unions, an impartial chairman and an impartial executive director.

The committee was to study the problems resulting from the company's modernization program and to recommend solutions. Decentralizing production, closing old plants, introducing new techniques and equipment meant major re-adjustments for the company and the workers.

Financing of the committee was by a company contribution of one cent for each hundred pounds of total tonnage shipped from plants covered by agreements with the two unions, until a total fund of $500,000 had been accumulated.

The original emphasis was on research rather than providing employe benefits as such. In its initial phase, the fund was used for four major purposes: (1) joint discussion meetings; (2) research study; (3) pilot retraining program and (4) pilot transfer program.

A pilot retraining program was undertaken after the closing of one of the company's plants in Oklahoma City. It had been hoped the program would enable the laid-off workers to secure jobs. However, only 12 percent of the displaced workers were retrained. Further, these discharged workers had serious difficulties finding jobs because of high unemployment in the area. Even when those who were retrained did find new jobs, they received less pay than they had earned under their Armour contract.

Based on the studies and findings of the automation committee, the parties incorporated a number of specific changes in the 1961 contracts. The new features included: advance notice; transfer of seniority rights; relocation costs; technological adjustment pay; improved severance pay and early retirement at age 55 at 1½ times full retirement pay.

The company must give 90 days' advance notice of the closing of a department or plant and must guarantee 90 days of work or equivalent wages from the date of the shutdown notice.

In terms of transfer rights, the new contract specified conditions which guaranteed that any employe in a listed bargaining unit could displace a junior employe, hired after August 7, 1961, at any other listed bargaining unit. He could do this provided he was permanently separated due to plant closing and provided he was physically fit and provided he was under age 60 and qualified. The transferred employe would be credited with continuous service rights, previously accumulated, and his seniority at the new plant would be from August 7, 1961, or from his continuous service date, if it was after that date.

Workers who transferred would be entitled to receive moving expenses according to a schedule established by the automation fund committee. The costs of the relocation would be paid by the fund, unless there was insufficient money in the fund, in which case the company would be obligated. If the new plant were less than 25 miles away from the old plant, no relocation allowances would be paid. The benefits varied from $40 for a single employe moving at least 100 miles up to $500 for a married employe moving a thousand or more miles.

Technological adjustment pay is available to a worker under age 60 with five or more years of seniority who loses his job as a result of the closing of a department or plant, provided he registered for transfer to another department or plan. The benefits are $65 per week, less unemployment insurance or other earnings for 26 to 39 weeks, depending upon the worker's seniority.

Severance pay was increased for those employes who were unable to transfer or who did not wish to transfer. The new schedule provides for one week of pay for each year of service up to 10 years, an additional one and three-quarter weeks' pay for each year of service from 11 to 20 years and an additional two weeks' pay for each year of service over 20 years.

Early retirement pay at age 55 is available to an employe with 20 years' service who was displaced because of the closing of a major department or plant. An employe retiring early under these conditions receives one and one-half times the regular retirement pay until he is eligible for social security at age 62, at which time the pension payment reverts to the regular retirement pay.

Joint Committees in the Rubber Industry

Complicated questions raised in the 1963 negotiations led the Rubber Workers to provide for joint study committees in their new contracts with the four major rubber producers—Goodyear, Goodrich, Firestone and U.S. Rubber. These committees vary slightly from company to company, but in general they are given broad functions.

The joint study committees are to "study, explore and make recommendations to the parties during the term of the agreement concerning labor relations problems referred to the committee by the parties." They are not restricted to any specific areas, but will be free to investigate all types of problems and questions of concern to the company and the union. They are to develop approaches and possible solutions to problems.

The committees have no authority to bargain for the parties on any issue or to determine disposition of any grievances. The authority is limited to discussion, exploration and study of the subjects referred to it by the parties. Recommendations to the parties are on a confidential basis.

Auto Workers' Committees

In the automobile and agricultural implement industries, the UAW has established joint study committees with each major firm. These committees have begun to function over a year in advance of the 1964 negotiation of new contracts.

The joint committees are to study matters that may later become subject to bargaining. However, the committees have no bargaining authority nor are they concerned with the determination of policy matters. The committees will make no recommendations.

The subjects for study and the schedule of meetings are set by mutual agreement. The subjects and the proceedings of the committees are to be kept confidential. This is to ensure that the discussions of the committees do not become indicators or determinators for collective bargaining. The statements of the parties in the joint study committees cannot be cited as part of any bargaining demand or position of the other party.

The committees are made up of company and union representatives. There are no outside parties as members. Committees and subcommittees have an equal number of company and union representatives.

Council on Industrial Relations

One of the oldest joint committees is the Council on Industrial Relations set up in 1920 by the National Electrical Contractors' Association and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The Council is a national device for the settling of local grievance or contract disputes after deadlocks develop.

The Council is composed of six representatives of the Contractors' Association and six members of the Brotherhood. Members meet quarterly in various sections of the country and hear the cases brought before them.

The Council operates much like a court, with the parties submitting briefs and presenting arguments. The Council never has had to send a dispute back to the parties without a unanimous decision although, in about one percent of the 960 cases decided, a four-man executive committee had to make the decision. Never in the 43 years of the Council's existence has a decision been violated.

The Council covers about 95 percent of the electrical construction industry. The Council plan does not include the local unions and contractor chapters in New York City and Chicago.

At first the disputes involved interpretations of existing contracts, but now the Council resolves deadlocked contract negotiations as well, deciding what such agreements may contain. Disputes that cannot be settled by negotiations must be submitted to the Council. Strikes and lockouts are barred.

Foundation on Automation

Another type of joint labor-management cooperation is the American Foundation on Automation and Employment, Inc., with John Snyder, Jr., President of U.S. Industries and A. J. Hayes, President of the Machinists, as co-chairmen. This foundation was established in February 1962 by the union and the manufacturer of automated equipment.

The foundation is concerned with broad social problems brought on by automation rather than internal labor relations problems between the IAM and U.S. Industries. Its purpose is to "tell the truth about automation" in terms of its impact upon human beings.

It is financed entirely by the company through a levy on every automated machine it sells or leases to another company in the United States. The foundation is managed jointly by the company and the Machinists. The fund is administered by a nine-member board of trustees—one each from the company and union and seven public members drawn from government, labor and other fields.

Conferences evaluate, discuss and inform the general public of possible solutions to problems of automation. This joint venture is bringing local union officers into contact with federal government manpower and training experts as well as college researchers for the purpose of developing solutions to the problems of radical technological changes.

An international conference is being planned in conjunction with the International Labor Organization for an international study of the implications of automation. Further meetings will be concerned with training and retraining needs of workers, as well as with apprenticeship programs.

Negro voting strength is estimated at more than 40 per cent and in some instances at more than 50 per cent in nine of 15 Alabama counties where Negroes are seeking office in the May 3 Democratic primary. Similarly, it is estimated at near a majority in three of seven legislative districts where Negroes are candidates.

These estimates are based on a running total of Negro registration in southern states kept by the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council. Figures and percentages on the seven districts and 20 counties, nearly all in the Alabama Black belt, were released by the VEP today (tables attached). There are 67 counties in Alabama.

These Alabama figures underscore the dramatic change in politics in that state since the 1965 passage of the Voting Rights Act. Statewide, Negro registration has increased from approximately 112,000 to approximately 226,000 (about 16.5 per cent of total registration) since the act went into effect last August.

The VEP estimates of the Negro percentage of the voter totals are conservative because many of the counties involved show a white registration higher than the 1960 Census figure on the number of whites eligible to vote. A closer comparison would probably be the Negro registration with the 1960 white voting-age population on the attached tables.

In counties where Negroes are offering for offices ranging from sheriff, tax assessor, coroner, county commissioner, board of education member, to Democratic executive committeeman and beat captain, the estimates show Wilcox County with 52.4 per cent Negro voters; Hale, 47.6; Macon, 50.6; Bulloch, 44.1;

Sumter, 46.9; Marengo, 44.9; Perry, 41.9; Dallas, 46.3; Greene, 66.5. Lowndes County, where Negroes plan to run independent Black Panther party candidates in the general election next fall, has a Negro registration of approximately 45.8 per cent of the total; it is among those with white registration figures apparently inflated.

Negro registration is estimated at 44.5 per cent in House District 27; at 46.3 per cent in House District 28, and at 38.1 per cent in House District 31.

The Voter Education Project figures are based on field reports and other sources of information.

Collective Bargaining — Issues

The Transfer Rights Of Displaced Workers

by Rudolph Oswald

A firm closes a department, laying off workers while its other departments are hiring. A multi-plant company closes one plant, dismissing the workforce and opens another somewhere else with new help. Firms shift operations from one facility to another or consolidate or diversify operations. Under these varied conditions, what are the employe's rights to stay with the job or firm? Can he transfer to the new operation or any other existing operations of the firm? What benefits can he transfer?

Many union contracts now cover the transfer of workers displaced by a factory or departmental closing. And unions are adding the principle of seniority rights to the subject of transfer. To facilitate interplant transfers, many contracts include moving and relocation allowances, adopting a fringe benefit once reserved for executives.

Transfer rights are just one of many techniques developed to meet the problems of plant and departmental closings. It is no substitute for such other programs as early retirement and adequate severance provisions. Advance notice clauses assure the workers of adequate forewarning and attrition clauses protect the worker's job. Retraining provisions often go hand in glove with transfer clauses.

When work is moved from one locality to another, unions want every effort made to help affected workers. The steps emphasized in negotiations by different unions vary on details, but the following summarizes broadly the views being pressed by various unions—and agreed to by many companies—in bargaining on this problem.

The primary type of protection is to give the displaced employe the right to follow his work. Employes displaced in a departmental or plant move should be given the right to transfer to the new location. It is the work they know and to which they have devoted much of their working lives. If that work is going to be done, they have a rightful equity in the work, built up by years of service in the company.

If only lower-paying jobs are available, then the unions want the company to guarantee the transferring worker his old wage for at least a designated period, making up the difference between the new job rate and the worker's former rate.

When the available new jobs may require somewhat different or additional skills or duties, which the workers could ordinarily master after a reasonable retraining period, the objective is to have the company provide the necessary retraining to equip the workers.

To avoid an undue economic burden on workers and to make the transfer opportunities most meaningful, the company should pay all or at least part of the expenses involved in the moving of the worker and his family and possessions and in the family's resettlement in the new community.

The transfer clause in the contract spells out who can transfer and under what conditions the move to different departments, plants and locations takes place. Transfer programs require a review of existing seniority provisions and the purposes of such provisions.

The right of transfer to other departments or plants may have a number of variations. For example, transfer rights may be limited to employes laid off because of a plant or departmental shutdown, or may cover employes laid off for any reason at all. The protection may extend to new plants, to situations in which existing operations have been moved to a new location, or to all the company's plants in a given area or community. On the other hand, an employe may have the right to transfer to any plant of the company, regardless of its "newness," type of operation or location.

Under some agreements, transfer rights or preferential hiring rights may even be broadened to cover a number of plants of different companies within the same industry or area. Under other contracts, the parties may merely agree to negotiate regarding transfers in the event of the establishment of a new plant.

Employes who transfer may retain full seniority rights or they may retain those rights only for pensions, vacation and severance.

Seniority

Seniority provisions which allow transfer only within an occupation or a department may not protect long-service workers when a particular department or occupation becomes obsolete or is phased out. The question becomes particularly important when an entire operation or department is seriously affected by technological change. Such problems have often led to revised seniority rules so as to provide workers greater protection in exercising job retention rights.

The question of seniority can involve difficult problems regarding the merger of departments, moving of employes to other plants of the company or reducing the normal workforce as a result of technological change.

Seniority often is the key to the older worker's stability of employment and job security. Seniority deals with individual and not collective job security. The application of seniority assures the greatest amount of employment security to those workers oldest in point of service. Thus, an employe obtains a preferred claim to present and future employment, based on the length of past service, under the seniority provisions of the agreement.

His seniority is a product of collective bargaining. In a non-union establishment, seniority may exist only as a matter of voluntary acceptance by the employer and only as long as he wishes to observe the principle.

Union contracts traditionally provide that the order of lay-offs be based on inverse seniority. However, if the seniority unit is too narrow, it may not provide the protection intended.

To provide senior workers with the greatest possible protection against job loss, unions usually have sought to broaden seniority units within a plant and establish the right to transfer to jobs in other plants.

The seniority unit is often related to the degree of interchangeability among the jobs, since seniority generally functions easiest in a unit where skills are relatively interchangeable. As specialization increases, the seniority unit often becomes smaller. The more specialized the seniority grouping, the less protection the employe has in case of technological changes in his work situation. A seniority unit that works fine for selecting persons to work overtime, or to set vacation schedules, may not meet the needs of technological changes in the work process.

Therefore, in order to maintain the intended job protection, seniority units may need to be adjusted or broadened to take care of transfers, temporary assignments or general labor-pool arrangements.

Transfer rights, for example, may require the integration of seniority lists of two or more departments or plants. This can be an extremely complicated procedure. One or a combination of the following approaches usually is employed:

1. Surviving groups or "tailending," where integrated employes go to the bottom of the list of the dominant or "surviving" unit.

2. Length of service or "dovetailing," where groups are integrated on the basis of straight seniority.

3. Absolute rank or "interlacing," where a new seniority roster is created by alternating selection from each group.

4. Proportionate ranking, where ranks are allotted on the basis of the proportionate number of employes in each group. Thus, if the new group contains 100 men, with 75 coming from one department or plant, and 25 from another, the new seniority list chooses three from one group and then one from the other group, and so forth, until all are arranged in a new seniority roster.

5. Follow the work. Where a previously existing job is transferred to a new location, the incumbent on the job can follow it into the new group.

Some contracts provide for transfers from one department to another on a temporary basis, with the worker retaining seniority only in his own department.

In all cases, the worker usually retains his full seniority for purposes of vacation, retirement, etc., as long as he works for the same employer.

Interplant Transfers

Interplant transfer rights may vary from a limited statement of opportunity, whose availability is largely subject to managerial discretion, to a bona fide "right" that can be asserted to "bump" another employe in a specified unit of the same company. Within this range, three kinds of transfer rights can be distinguished: (1) interplant bumping rights; (2) preferential hiring and (3) the "transfer with work" principle.

The strongest form of transfer rights are interplant bumping rights. Under this arrangement, an employe laid off from one plant could replace a junior employe in another plant of the same company. Such a contract, however, may present serious intra-union problems, arising from the difference of the length of service of members employed at different plants of the company.

The Packinghouse Workers and the Meat Cutters have negotiated agreements with the Swift and Armour companies that establish a broad system of interplant bumping. Beginning with August 1961, each employe covered by the appropriate master agreement accumulates company-wide seniority for displacement purposes. All employes on the payroll on August 1, 1961, start their company-wide seniority from that date. The relative position of new employes to each other depends upon when each employe is hired. If an employe is displaced because of the shutdown of a plant or a department, he selects any two plants covered by the master agreement between his union and Swift (or three plants, in the case of Armour) to which he desires to transfer. He will then bump the most junior employe on the company-wide seniority roster in the plants selected. These transfer rights apply only to units organized by the same union.

The UAW negotiated a variation of the interplant bumping rights with the Ford company concerning interplant bumping at the company's River Rouge operations. Under this agreement, employes with 15 years of seniority or more could bump employes of 10 years of service or less in other Rouge plants.

Another type of transfer clause is the "transfer with work" principle, providing that employes affected by the shift of work from one plant or facility to another will have the right to transfer with the work and associated job opportunities. Application of the "transfer with work" principle normally does not mean that every employe displaced by the shift is given the right to a job at the plant to which the particular work is transferred. Usually it means the jobs related to the operation would be made available to employes who originally worked on the operation, based on employe seniority and the number of jobs available. This principle applies to two types of situations: (a) those involving a shift of work to an established plant; (b) those involving the transfer of work to new plants.

This principle has been extensively used for the establishment of transfer rights for displaced workers of the Big Three automobile companies and for office employes of railroads under contracts of the Railway Clerks.

Problems occasionally have arisen over the definition of "work," as the job may be somewhat different at the new location, particularly when the transfer of work is the occasion for automating the operation.

The most common form of interplant transfer protection is "preferential hiring," giving employes who have been laid off from one plant the right to preferential consideration when applying for a job at another plant of the same firm. This means that displaced workers be given first choice over new applicants for employment at other plants. Such "preferential hiring" provisions usually only apply to laid-off workers who have been displaced by a plant shutdown rather than laid off because of a temporary curtailment of work.

In some cases, the scope of preferential hiring rights may be limited with respect to specific plants or designated geographical areas.

For example, employes laid off because of the closing of Ford's Iron Mountain, Michigan, plant were given preferential hiring rights at the jet engine plant in Chicago.

An example of the geographical approach is the Glass and Ceramic Workers' contract at Libby-Owens-Ford glass plants in Toledo, Ohio. This company's four plants in the area are brought together under a common "preferential hiring" arrangement.

A modification of the preferential hiring plan grants preference to high seniority dismissed employes over lower seniority laid-off employes at a second plant. Such an arrangement was worked out by the UAW at Chrysler in 1959. Under this plan, when work opportunities became available at a given plant through attrition, the open jobs were offered to employes on the plant's recall list and to employes on the special "closed plant" list on a rotating one-and-one basis. That is, the first open job was offered to the highest employe on the plant recall list, the second job to the highest employe on the "closed plant" list.

In addition to a transfer when operations move, the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union negotiated the right of workers to transfer to new suburban stores when they opened.

A more detailed description of interplant transfers is provided in Professor Arnold Weber's chapter, "The Interplant Transfer of Displaced Workers," in the book, "Adjusting to Technological Change," by Somers, Cushman and Weinberg.

Inter-firm Transfers

In addition to interplant transfers, some unions also have negotiated transfer rights to other firms.

The Retail Clerks' contract in eastern Pennsylvania, southern New Jersey and Delaware provides that, when one chain lays off employes, another firm signatory to the master contract will hire these workers before any outside help.

In the Mailers' contract with the Publishers Association of New York, job security provisions include a city-wide hiring pool from which mailers who lose their jobs because of merger would be hired. Job protection was provided for both regular and substitute mailers now working.

The Glass Bottle Blowers, in its industry-wide contract, provides that workers who are laid off by one firm will have preferential hiring rights at any of the 22 firms signatory to the industry-wide contract. Pension credits are retained by workers age 40 or over who have 15 or more years' service.

Income Maintenance

Just providing transfer rights without maintaining "pay" may be an empty promise. Thus many unions have moved to protect the income of transferred employes. However, such protection usually only applies to intra-plant transfers, not transfers between plants. Even here, the approach of unions has varied.

Under the can industry pacts, if a worker is transferred to a lower paying job, an employe's rate of pay may not be reduced below 95 percent of his average straight-time rate per hour, as established during the preceding year. This rate protection is applied on the basis of quarterly review of each employe's average straight-time hourly rate in comparison with his preceding year's rate average.

The Cement Workers in various contracts negotiated a clause guaranteeing workers that they would not be terminated due to technological change or installation of new equipment. Workers whose jobs are eliminated, and who transfer to other jobs in the company, receive pay protection of at least 95 percent of the previous job-rate for a minimum of one year and up to a maximum of 5 years. Under a California contract, the workers have preferential hiring rights if a company shuts down one plant and opens another in the area.

The Shoe Workers, in an agreement with southern California shoe manufacturers, negotiated a guarantee against pay reduction for workers displaced from their old jobs by new equipment or new production methods.

Under the Auto Workers' contract at Allis-Chalmers, workers in the top grades may choose layoff instead of transfer to a lower wage group.

Legal Rights Regarding Transfer

The legal right of an employe to a transfer depends largely on provisions of the contract. A few contracts prohibit the moving of a plant or any of its operations. Most contracts, however, have no such prohibition. In such cases, the courts and arbitrators look to other contract clauses, such as recognition, seniority, arbitration or recall.

Since the Supreme Court's decision in the Steelworker cases, questions of contract violation in plant removal (as in many other areas) generally have been referred to arbitration where the contract provides for arbitration. However, suits for damages arising out of plant removal also have been brought in federal district courts under Section 301 of the National Labor Relations Act relating to suits over breach of contract.

Some contract clauses have been construed to mean that, while the employer may move his operations, the agreement would remain in force at the new location. On the other hand, a provision applying the contract within a 60-mile radius was held to convey no transfer rights in a move beyond 60 miles.

In addition, the courts have held that certain rights and benefits extend beyond the expiration of the contract. The primary basis for this holding is that these benefits are, in effect, "property rights" accruing to the employe as the result of past service.

In the Glidden case, the company transferred its production operations from Elmhurst, New York, to Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, after its contract with the union expired. A key element in the Circuit Court's decision, in recognizing that the employes might have rights to transfer, was a clause in the contract providing for recall rights with seniority up to three years after date of layoff. Since this three-year period extended beyond the expiration of the contract, the Court reasoned that the seniority right provided by the contract had become vested and that these vested rights could give employes transfer rights to the new plant.

The U.S. Supreme Court (in Carpenters versus Kimball) held that a company that moves a plant to a new location may be required to arbitrate the question of employment rights at the new plant even though: (1) the new plant is a considerable distance away and (2) the contract has expired. The contract called for arbitration of all differences. It also gave laid-off employes recall rights for a two-year period. However, the contract had expired after the old plant was closed and before the new plant opened. The Court didn't explain its decision, but merely cited its decision in Wiley and Sons, under which the Court had held that a successor company could be required to arbitrate claims under the previous company's union contract.

In Wackenhut Corp., the U.S. Court of Appeals applied the Wiley rule to a purchase rather than a merger situation. It seemed to interpret Wiley to stand for the proposition that, where there is a "substantial similarity of operation and continuity of identity of the business enterprise before and after the change in ownership," the new owner is bound by the entire collective bargaining agreement entered into by the union and the predecessor employer.

And, in Steelworkers v. Reliance Universal, Inc., another Appeals Court also applied the Wiley doctrine in a purchase situation, apparently holding the entire contract to be binding on the purchasing company, excepting those provisions which changed circumstances might make "unreasonable or inequitable" to apply.

In the Ross Gear case, a U.S. Appeals Court ruled that the employes had no transfer rights to a new plant in another state because the contract's recognition clause confined the union's recognition to the company's plant or plants located within the city limits of Detroit. The Wiley doctrine likewise does not apply where a different union is the bargaining representative at the new plant.

It cannot be said that the courts have granted employers an absolute legal right to transfer. Rather, court decisions have been based upon the particular circumstances and contracts involved. Each case has turned upon the specific conditions and the wording of the contract.

Moving Allowances

A prime prerequisite of transferring to a different area is the ability to pay for the move. Companies long have provided various types of moving and relocation allowances to executives and management officials. Now unions are gaining some of these benefits for all employes.

Some of the relocation benefits provided are payment of transportation costs of the employe to a new location; payment for the cost of moving household goods and incidental moving expenses; payment for losses on sale of an employe's house; payment of a real estate broker's commission and payment of temporary living costs of an employe and/or his family. In addition, some firms provide an expense allowance for an employe and his wife to house-hunt before he is actually transferred.

Without company payment of moving expenses, workers transferring from one city to another have to fall back on their own resources for very expensive moving costs. In some instances, such workers have had to seek aid from community welfare agencies.

An increasing number of labor-management contracts now provide moving and relocation allowances.

As part of the benefits negotiated by the Chemical Workers for employes displaced by the closing of the Lever Brothers' Cambridge, Mass., plant, the company agreed to pay some of the costs involved in transferring employes to its other plants. If an employe elected to move to another Lever Brothers' plant, he was given first-class railroad fare to the city in which that unit was located. His wife was given the fare for a round trip and a one-way trip from Cambridge to the other city. The wife was afforded the extra round trip fare so that she might be able to visit and familiarize herself with the new community before the transfer was carried out. When the employe actually moved, the company also paid the cost of shipping his household effects. The maximum allowance payable for all moving expenses was equal to the amount forthcoming as separation pay if the employe had decided not to transfer.

The GM-UAW contract provides basic moving allowances based on mileage between plants and on marital status, as follows:

Miles Between Plants	Relocation Allowance Single Employe	Relocation Allowance Married Employe
50— 99	$ 55	$180
100—299	75	220
300—499	105	290
500—999	155	420
1000 or over	215	580

Under the Machinists-Convair agreement, transferred employes are given transportation allowances for the employe and each dependent, plus a per diem living expense for each day of travel and until their household effects are moved into their new residence, or for a period of 30 days, whichever is less. The contract also provides for packing and crating, insuring and transporting an employe's household goods up to 8,000 pounds. A unique element in this contract is provision for moving of an employe's housetrailer.

In the current closing of the U.S. Steel plant at Donora, Pennsylvania, the company is offering to buy houses of Steelworkers who take jobs at the company's Joliet, Illinois, plant. The company offers to pay the current appraised value, less 4 percent for appraisal and real estate fees. The company previously had provided this benefit for management people, but this is the first time for blue collar workers.

In addition, the Steelworkers' contract with U.S. Steel provides for the following relocation allowances:

Miles Between Plants	Relocation Allowance Single Employe	Relocation Allowance Married Employe
50— 99	$130	$180
100— 299	150	420
300— 499	180	490
500— 999	230	620
1000—1999	290	780
2000 or more	350	940

In a survey of company practices in 1964, the National Industrial Conference Board found that the majority of companies that transferred employes to other company locations paid the cost of transportation of the employe and his family to the new location and paid the cost of moving household goods. Other benefits were paid by a minority of the companies surveyed.

Another 1964 survey by Business Management showed that the majority of the companies responding to its survey provided an expense allowance for an employe and his wife to house-hunt before they were actually transferred. The same survey also showed that a majority of firms paid for hotel, motel or other accommodations for an employe and his family, if they do not find a home before they move to the new location.

Both surveys showed a majority of the firms answering these questionnaires treated blue collar and white collar workers alike. However, a large group, around 40 percent in each survey, provided white collar workers with different benefits than were provided other employes.

Flow-Back Provisions

Some contracts provide for so-called "flow-back" rights, which allow a transferee to return to his original plant. This is an attempt to alleviate the transferred worker's fear of being laid off and stranded in a strange community. If the old plant is still in operation, he may be able to exercise his seniority within that unit to displace another employe or take his place on the plant recall list. If the plant has permanently shut down, he may then be entitled to apply for severance pay or early retirement.

The basis for "flow-back" rights is the belief that employes who transfer to a new community should be given a period of grace to determine their ability to adapt to the new environment. Under railroad contracts, a trial period of one year is usually provided.

Governmental Policies

The U.S. government has recognized the need for relocation allowances to help workers transfer from one area to another. A number of governmental policies point to the desirability of providing workers with the financial means for getting from one place to another. The federal government is aware of its responsibilities to its own employes since a number of moving adjustments are in effect and more are proposed. Federal programs also pay relocation allowances for some unemployed workers under the Manpower Development and Training Act and under the Trade Expansion Act. Even the federal income tax was changed to permit the deduction of non-reimbursed moving allowances.

The government also has realized that just paying moving allowances is insufficient. President Johnson has recommended to Congress a comprehensive bill providing for broad relocation allowances.

Under last year's Housing and Urban Development Act, mortgage relief is allowed homeowners who become unemployed due to closing of a federal installation. Under this section, a temporary moratorium on payments is granted to Veterans' Administration and Federal Housing Administration mortgagees. This Act also contains a section providing for government purchase, at fair value, of family homes situated at or near military bases which are ordered closed.

Those responsible for training people under the Manpower Development and Training Act also recognize the importance of federal government relocation allowances. Under this Act, experimental funds have been made available in specific cases for helping workers move from one location to another.

Under the 1962 Trade Expansion Act, the federal government is authorized to pay moving expenses and relocation allowances to a worker who loses his job because of imports and cannot find suitable employment in his home area.

Conclusions

Experience indicates that workers prefer to stay in their communities or to transfer to other plants within commuting distance from their homes. However, economic conditions in their home communities and the prospect of alternative job opportunities weigh heavily in the choice between moving with a job or staying home.

The guarantee of transfer, with full seniority for purposes of job rights, is an important determinant as to whether workers will transfer or not. A preferential hiring program that only provides for date-of-entry seniority at the plant to which the worker is transferred may be an insufficient incentive for the worker to move to a new location.

An incentive for a worker to transfer is his desire to protect his pension rights. Thus a worker with 19 years' service under a pension plan requiring 20 years of service for vesting will often transfer for at least a year so that he can obtain his pension at age 65. Also, the older worker may fear age discrimination in applving for a new job with another firm.

Obstacles to transferring include home ownership, family and social ties and children in school. Some transferred workers find it necessary or expedient to maintain two homes and to commute between areas on weekends, at least in the first year after transfer.

The question of who bears the cost of relocation is an important determinant of whether a displaced worker will transfer or not. Too often the worker does not have sufficient resources of his own to bear the financial burden of relocation. Without help in meeting the relocation costs, the right to transfer may be illusory.

A displaced worker should not be forced to transfer, but should be allowed to choose from a number of alternatives. In addition to the worker's right to move to a new job in another department or plant, important alternatives are early retirement, severance pay, extended supplemental unemployment benefits and retraining. A combination of provisions along such lines, together with transfer and relocation clauses, can protect those workers faced with plant or department shutdowns.

Vice President Humphrey talked—and dreamed out loud—about America's future with UAW staff. He asked labor to help make U.S. a great country in a great world.

"Now, there will be a day of peace, my fellow Americans. Some of you may wonder when. Who doesn't? But just as surely as we're in this room, that day will come. And I want to ask you a question. Are we going to let happen after Viet Nam what happened after Korea? The cities were sick after Korea—the slums were there, the poor were there, the unemployed were there, too. The schools were bad, the housing was terrible, the movement of the poor Negro and the poor white from the South to the cities was taking place; and what did we do after Korea? We cut the budget, we reduced the taxes, and we did not commit any new revenues or new resources to a better America. In fact, we tried to forget the poor. Today we need to be looking ahead. We need a post-Viet Nam plan of social action."

—Vice President Humphrey to UAW staff last week.

"So I come to the years ahead—in the areas of science and technology. We will have a man-orbiting laboratory in outer space. Just as sure as you're in this room. We'll have men that go up—climb in—come back. We'll have ways and means of monitoring the earth so we can have safe disarmament. We are going to have organ transplants in the human body. We're going to be able to extend the longevity of life—extend man's life. And we'll do a great deal in terms of productivity to make possible a shorter workweek—with ever increasing productivity and an increasing standard of living. In the next few years, as a matter of fact, for people who have heart disturbance, there'll be little isotope atomic batteries we can install in the heart to give perfect rhythm. We'll have unbelievable things in medicine and science and technology—I have a list of about five pages of these things which I use to talk to young people in the colleges. But after we get through with all of that, the question is are we going to be able to live with each other? All these machines, all these inventions—the real question is what kind of environment are we going to live in. Are we going to choke ourselves to death with pollution and smog? Are we going to have clean and fresh water? Are we going to have any places of leisure? I heard Tom Watson of International Business Machines speak here the other night and he said by the year 1980, the workweek will be 27 hours and he said, "What are we going to do with the rest of the time? Are we planning ahead for our wilderness areas, for our recreational areas, for our leisure activities? What are we going to do with the people that are on retirement—are they just going to wither away or can we find ways and means for creating work for them. This is what we have to be thinking about."

—Vice President Hubert Humphrey—February 16, 1967

"I would like to see the UAW—and other trade unions—lay down an agenda for the next decade. I want you to help set priorities for America and humanity—for people and progress. It's all tied together. It's all part of a great America."—H. H. H.

The Case Against a Tax Increase

by Edwin L. Dale Jr.

Nearly two years ago in this journal, at a time when men of good will were worried to the point of despair about automation, the flood of teen-agers into the labor market and the supposed disappearance of jobs for the unskilled, and when unemployment was 5.5 percent, I was lucky enough to write: "My proposition . . . is that general fiscal and monetary measures of the government to expand total demand . . . will all by themselves solve the unemployment problem. And by solve it I mean reduce unemployment, by our normal statistical definitions, to 3.5 percent or less of the labor force in two or three years." Reaction of readers was almost uniformly disbelieving.

In the intervening time, spurred by measures such as the 1964 tax cut, aggregate demand has risen by just under $50 billion a year, a rattling big increase. The war in Vietnam has helped it rise faster in the past nine months than it would have risen otherwise, but up to now this extra effect of defense spending has been small – an annual rate of $5 billion at most, in a $700 billion economy. Presumably nearly everybody now agrees that demand is the main cure for unemployment, and among the "everybody" are Sargent Shriver and Willard Wirtz. Unemployment, at this writing, is 3.7 percent of the labor force and heading down, and the biggest growth in jobs for nearly two years has been among the relatively unskilled. Negroes have benefited at least as much as whites.

But now there arises a serious question. Granted that the old worries about "automation" and "chronic" unemployment are out of date for all but a tiny fraction of our working-age people, whose problems the government is trying to tackle, there remains the issue of whether we can safely press on to drive unemployment well below 3.7 or even 3.5 percent, and by the same method as before: expansion of aggregate demand.

The question arises because that is precisely the direction in which we are heading. Can we let 'er rip some more without a damaging and dangerous inflation? If the government does nothing to brake demand, we will move to even lower levels of unemployment. The issue is no longer whether we can get lower unemployment from expanding demand, but whether we should. The following argument that we should do so – that we should let 'er rip a while longer – is made with far less assurance than the argument of two years ago. But it seems to me worth making because now, once again, the conventional wisdom (even among economists this time, in contrast with the earlier period) is saying that we cannot safely do so.

Thus, this is the case against a tax increase. It is the case against braking demand and the boom itself. It is the case in favor of going for broke – for an unemployment level of three percent, or even possibly less. It is a gambler's case, for it has risks.

The case is in four parts.

First, we can drive the economy harder because Americans can get an astonishing amount out of bailing wire on the old machine or a day's work out of a dropout. This country can produce more, and employ more, and thereby make supply rise to meet demand.

There are, after all, still three million unemployed (even if most now have not been unemployed for long) – and two-thirds of them have some previous work experience. There is, granting the grave deficiencies of the statistic, about eight percent of industrial capacity not working, on the average, though there are differences among industries. Salesmen for chemical products, books, drugs, tractors and a host of other things are still on the road looking for orders. The admen are still trying to sell a few more Buicks and stainless-steel blades. Prices are actually going down for many man-made fibers, and there is certainly no scarcity of toasters or transistor radios, let alone cars.

In a word, this country's capacity to produce is not exhausted. To drive the economy harder means more jobs, not actual shortages of anything that matters. If rising demand brings forth more supply, inflation will not be serious. Every additional point on the industrial-production index now means several score thousand jobs. Why not see whether the alleged "hard core" unemployment is really so hard core? We got down to 2.5 percent unemployment in the Korean war because the war pushed us into an expansionary policy. Why not try again, even if the war in Vietnam ends? The fiscal and monetary tools are there, war or no war. We shall never know how hard we can push this economy without serious inflation until we try.

Second, there is the matter of "restraint" – otherwise known as guideposts. Here the real world is remarkably different from the public image, but in two contrasting ways.

It is entirely true, as critics of the government's anti-inflationary guideposts have contended, that they have no application at all to a tremendous number of prices and wages in the economy, probably the big majority.

Ask Armour or Swift, or their dozens of smaller competitors, whether the guideposts could possibly govern meat prices. Ask a drug or supermarket chain or a bank whether guideposts influence the wages of their counter clerks. Ask a steel scrap dealer or a merchant in cattle hides whether the guideposts have anything to do with the prices they get.

Labor and the Guideposts

As George Meany huffs and puffs about the inequity of the guideposts for labor – with considerable justification, because the 3.2 percent figure for wage increases can be fair only if average consumer prices do not rise at all, and of course prices do rise – he understandably neglects to mention that organized labor does not set wage levels. Less than one-fourth of the labor force is unionized. The newspaper front pages, when they discuss union attitudes toward the guideposts, discuss something of less than earthshaking importance. Most wages in this country are in fact set in the classic marketplace, and nonunion wages are now probably rising faster than union wages.

And yet with all that said, the critics do not do the guideposts full justice. For the guideposts have changed human attitudes in some specific situations, and thus they have kept wages and prices here and there lower than they otherwise would have been.

With almost no notice, the unions of federal government employees have accepted a guidepost award this year. There is no doubt that last year's fairly moderate steel settlement was made possible because the guideposts gave a figure the government intervenors use. Steel, aluminum, newsprint and cigarette prices have gone up less, because of the guideposts, than they would have gone up 10 years ago. Although no one can prove the case, it is the pragmatic guess of this writer that even the construction unions, despite their words, will in fact settle for somewhat smaller gains (though still, of course, in excess of the guideposts) this year, just because of the existence of a somewhat organized public opinion.

In short, "restraint" – i.e. guideposts – will have some moderating influence where men, rather than pure economic forces, have an influence over decisions. The effect will be modest, but it will exist. To the extent it exists, it makes safer a policy of driving the economy harder.

Third, there is the issue of how much inflation we can tolerate. Dropouts will be employed, bailing wire will keep machines going, and Roger Blough of US Steel will act the statesman. But still prices will rise if we drive the economy as we are doing. They have risen already. How much is too much?

I do not know. I suggest, however, that we can tolerate a price rise on the order of three percent or even four percent over a short period of about one year if that rate of price increase does not last.

Germany, France, Sweden and Holland have done so without grave difficulty, for more than a year. All have driven unemployment well below our levels. Britain has done so too. But Britain is in trouble and the others are not. The reason, of course, is that mysterious thing called the balance of payments.

The argument here could go on forever. Briefly, my contention is that the American balance of payments, and in particular our trade surplus, is far more immune from price and even wage movements than those of European nations.

We export only four percent of our total output of goods and services, far less than any European country, and a moderate upward change in our price level is unlikely to have any big impact on our share of the world market (just as our recent price stability by comparison with our competitors has not increased our market share).

In Britain, a higher level of wages or prices, or both, matters a great deal to the maintenance of the value of the nation's currency vis-à-vis others; I seriously doubt that this is so in the case of the United States, within the limits we are talking about. Caterpillar Tractor machines will continue to be sold abroad because of quality, not price. Our gold loss will not increase, and the dollar will certainly not be devalued, if our price rise hits even four percent for a while.

Apart from the balance of payments, there is of course the argument that inflation is unjust. It is. I am simply suggesting that unemployment – even if now it is not as long-term as it was and is very low among family breadwinners – is more unjust. Economists rightly talk of the "trade-off" between so much inflation versus so much less unemployment. Fair enough. I am choosing lower unemployment and accepting somewhat more inflation, though as argued above, I doubt that the inflation will be as bad as the worriers fear.

Fourth and last, there is the problem of "overbraking." All of us are agreed on one thing: we want the expansion to continue and to avoid a recession. Those who favor applying the brakes do so, in complete good faith, on the ground that this will prolong, not shorten, the expansion. However, for better or worse, we are already using the brake of a tighter monetary policy, whose effects are likely to be powerful later this year. In addition, the normal growth of our tax revenues, plus another social security tax increase next January, will move fiscal policy in the direction of restraint early next year. Thus, a tax increase request now, allowing for the fact that it could not be in effect before June or July at the earliest, might well "bite" at just the wrong time, when the economy was ready to slow down of its own accord.

This is no more than a statement of a risk. The other side claims the greater risk to sustained prosperity is to let inflationary pressure mount, for there will be an inevitable post-inflation recession. No man can say for certain which view is right. But it is worth pointing out that the boom is good for us, not bad; a hangover is not inevitable; perhaps we should hold our fire at least until we see the bloodshot in its eyes. As President Johnson has pointed out, not all the economic indicators even now are screaming "inflation."

Once again the case comes down to a gamble: Why not go for broke? Has anybody noticed that there are no riots in Cleveland or Detroit lately, or in West Virginia, or even in Newark or Harlem? Full employment does not solve everything, but it solves some things. Maybe if we let 'er rip, even people in Watts will find ways to get to work.

Nobody wants to exceed the speed limit. But slow drivers can be dangerous, too. Until we know what the speed limit is, why not test it? Other countries have achieved genuinely full employment. Why not us?

Mrs. Gandhi's Mission

What India Wants from the US

by Alex Campbell

New Delhi

This country is facing its biggest crisis since independence, two decades ago, and urgently requires American help to overcome it. A very high official here says, "India is teetering between success and failure, and we'll probably know by August which it's to be." Thus, the meeting in Washington this month between Prime Minister Indira Gandhi and Lyndon Johnson could be crucial.

Indians, who are no better than the rest of us at guessing what goes on inside President Johnson's head, are asking nervously if, as the price of aid to India, he will ask Mrs. Gandhi to stand up and be counted alongside the US over Vietnam. They also wonder if he will demand from her some gesture like cutting down the number of Indian soldiers confronting Pakistan, to get the Kashmir problem settled so that India can help the US "contain" China.

Perhaps the Indians are being overly apprehensive. Possibly Mr. Johnson will gladly offer India the aid it so badly needs, without imposing on Mrs. Gandhi any awkward conditions. If so, New Delhi will release a pent-up sigh of relief. For although it can be papered over with bland ambiguities about wanting peace and abominating war, a gulf exists between Indian and American official thinking about vital Asian problems. Indians detect with some alarm that even friendly well-informed Americans are inclined to read their own meanings into Indian attitudes; on China, for example. It's no secret that ever since October, 1962 India has regarded the Chinese with sharp suspicion and bitter resentment. China's Himalayan attack that year put the Indian army, the country's pride and joy, to shame. It cruelly revealed that a lot of surface spit and polish and Sandhurst posturing – Indian generals still speak English and call one another "old boy" – covered up a great deal of Indian slovenliness. Last year, Indian dislike of China was reinflamed when the Chinese once more fired off guns in the Himalayas, this time in concert with a brief but destructive summer war between India and Pakistan. But none of this means, for a moment, that India is now willing to stand shoulder to shoulder with the US, in a military sense, to "contain" China. To imagine it does, and that India's 825,000-man army can be confidently counted a factor in that particular crusade, could be the American mistake of the century.

Americans here talk of India as a great anti-Communist counterweight to Red China. Some of them envisage India joining hands with Japan and other Asian countries to thwart Chinese designs. There is currently

Dear Sir and Brother:

As Labor Educators, I am sure that you are interested in the approaching Conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Social Security Department to be held at the Sheraton-Chicago Hotel, Chicago, Illinois, April 19 and 20, 1968.

I am enclosing information about the Conference and the program outline. If you will note, the program is designed to establish and create more interest and activity by Labor Leadership in the more pressing social problems that are a part of the AFL-CIO priorities and goals.

In cities, towns, and rural areas, Labor is being called upon to furnish representation to serve on Policy Making Boards and Commissions to plan, organize and administer programs such as Community Action, Manpower and Development, Urban Renewal, Housing, Medical Services, Legal Services, Public Transportation, Industrial Development, Air and Water Pollution, and many others that are important not only to members but all of the citizenry.

It is our hope that from these Regional Conferences can come a reevaluation of program priorities for Summer Schools, Conferences and Institutes, with special emphasis upon mobilizing as a pressure group to bring about change legislatively in such areas as Housing, Health Services, Welfare, Safety, Education and Employment. Hoping to utilize all of the resources of Labor on the Community level to pressure for change towards new concepts and ideas to tackle the social and economical problems of the Urban and Rural Communities.

Priority should be given to training Leadership with special expertise geared to the problems of the late 60's and 70's that goes beyond wages, hours, and working conditions. Solutions to these problems far exceed the ability to interpret a contract, handle a grievance, or conduct a meeting. Possessing the know-how is helpful, but the point is - if we expect our members to make a contribution as a knowledgeable member of that Planning Committee or Policy Making Board in these complicated problems, representing Labor - shouldn't we be providing them with the proper tools to perform the job?

We hope that this Conference can provide some new insights. Looking forward to seeing you there.

Fraternally,

Hobert P. Butler

LEGAL STATUS OF UNION SECURITY CLAUSES IN WISCONSIN

1. The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947 prohibits a CLOSED SHOP clause.

> "Sec. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8 (a)(3)."

2. The Labor-Management Relations Act permits a UNION SHOP or MAINTENANCE of MEMBERSHIP clause

> "Sec. 8 (a)(3)...nothing in this Act...shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization...to require as a condition of employment membership therein on or after the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment..."

PROVIDED THAT:

A. "...such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a), in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made."
- Section 8 (a)(3) -

B. "Nothing in this Act shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State...in which such execution or application is prohibited by State...law."
- Section 14 (b) -

Thus, under the Taft-Hartley Act a union shop clause is permissible when it is negotiated by the designated or selected representative of a majority of the employees in a collective bargaining unit UNLESS it is explicitly prohibited by state law. Does Wisconsin law at present prohibit a union shop clause in collective bargaining agreements?

3. The Wisconsin Employment Peace Act, 1939 permits a UNION SHOP or MAINTENANCE of MEMBERSHIP clause.

> "Chapter 111.06 (1)(c)1....an employer shall not be prohibited from entering into an all-union agreement (an agreement...whereby all or any of the employees in such unit are required to be members of a single labor organization) with the representatives of his employes in a collective bargaining unit..."

PROVIDED THAT:

A. "...at least two-thirds of such employes voting (provided such two-thirds of such employes also constitute at least a majority of the employes in such collective bargaining unit) shall have voted affirmatively by secret ballot in favor of such all-union agreement in a referendum conducted by the board...

B. "The board shall declare any such all-union agreement terminated whenever it finds that the labor organization involved has unreasonably refused to receive as a member any employe of such employer."

THUS, IN WISCONSIN, IF THE REFERENDUM REQUIREMENT IS MET SUCCESSFULLY, A UNION MAY NEGOTIATE FOR INCLUSION IN ITS COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENT A UNION SHOP OR MAINTENANCE OF MEMBERSHIP CLAUSE.

4. In the administration of a UNION SHOP clause the Labor-Management Relations Act provides that:

> "Sec. 8 (a)(3)...No employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization...if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership."

5. The Labor-Management Relations Act further provides that:

> "Sec. 9 (a) Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by > the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the EXCLUSIVE representatives of ALL employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment..."

This means that a union, even in the absence of a Union Shop clause, must "represent non-union members of the (unit) without hostile discrimination, fairly, impartially, and in good faith." The National Labor Relations Board in the Hughes Tool Company Case, 104 NLRB 318 (1953), ruled that:

> "The duty of equal representation...is inherent in the exclusive representative status accorded by the statute...We...find that... Section 9 (a)...gives rise to a duty by labor organizations, as the exclusive representative in grievance proceedings, impartially and without discrimination to accept and process all grievances placed in its hands by the employees it represents" regardless of their union membership or not.

Text of Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as Amended by Public Law 86-257, 1959 *

Key to Amendments

Portions of the Act which have been eliminated by the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, Public Law 86-257, are enclosed by black brackets; provisions which have been added to the Act are in italics; and unchanged portions are shown in roman type.

[Public Law 101—80th Congress]

AN ACT

To amend the National Labor Relations Act, to provide additional facilities for the mediation of labor disputes affecting commerce, to equalize legal responsibilities of labor organizations and employers, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SECTION 1. (a) This Act may be cited as the "Labor Management Relations Act, 1947."

(b) Industrial strife which interferes with the normal flow of commerce and with the full production of articles and commodities for commerce, can be avoided or substantially minimized if employers, employees, and labor organizations each recognize under law one another's legitimate rights in their relations with each other, and above all recognize under law that neither party has any right in its relations with any other to engage in acts or practices which jeopardize the public health, safety, or interest.

It is the purpose and policy of this Act, in order to promote the full flow of commerce, to prescribe the legitimate rights of both employees and employers in their relations affecting commerce, to provide orderly and peaceful procedures for preventing the interference by either with the legitimate rights of the other, to protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to define and proscribe practices on the part of labor and management which affect commerce and are inimical to the general welfare, and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes affecting commerce.

IUD Protests NLRB Ruling

The Industrial Union Department has challenged an NLRB ruling that a union contract is not a bar to a representation election if it requires a member to notify both union and management of intent to revoke a dues checkoff authorization.

In a case involving a Utility Workers Union petition for an election at a plant under contract to District 50, United Mine Workers, the Board ruled that the member is required only to notify management. The Board has now consented to reconsider and the IUD will file a brief on Nov. 16. The IUD has been joined by 11 affiliates, the AFL-CIO, the Metal Trades and the Building Trades. The Utility Workers are not a party to the case.

Most union contracts require that both the union and the company must be notified before a revocation becomes final. When Taft-Hartley was adopted in 1948, the U. S. Dep't of Justice approved a form so providing. If the ruling stands, stable relationships between labor and management could be threatened at many plants.

Taft-Hartley is silent on the contract bar issue. The Board had established common sense rulings designed to promote reasonable labor-management stability and to prevent turmoil within bargaining units because of an endless stream of election petitions.

The only legal restriction on the checkoff is that it cannot be irrevocable for more than one year. In its ruling, the NLRB took the position that "although the Act is silent" on who shall be notified of revocation, "we cannot construe it other than as requiring notice only to the employer . . ."

Sperry-Rand Cooperation

Cooperation among IUD affiliates facing contract negotiations with Sperry-Rand Corp. will be mapped at a meeting of the unions early this coming winter.

Agreement on cooperation was worked out at a meeting held at IUD headquarters in Washington in late October. Thirty-four delegates from the International Union of Electrical Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, and Steelworkers attended the meeting which discussed economic data and the need for a common front.

COORDINATED BARGAINING. Over 45 delegates from four unions holding contracts with Sylvania Electrical Products meet in Buffalo to discuss company's economic proposals. Delegates unanimously rejected the offer as "inadequate." The all-day meeting was sponsored by the IUD and chaired by its organizational director, Nicholas Zonarich.

Real Wages Sink Again; Living Costs Still Climbing

Living costs rose again in September, surging ahead by 0.2 percent to another all time record high. Because of higher prices and part-timing, real earnings were below last year.

The Consumer Price Index reached 126.8, meaning that prices were 26.8 percent higher than in the 1947-49 period.

Prices were 1.3 percent over last September, meaning more bad news for the average American. The latest rise in the living cost indicator came just as the GOP claims about stable prices reached their peak during the election campaign.

Prices have risen despite continued tight money policies. The present rise was attributed among other things to most elements of housing, an area greatly affected by high interest rates.

Home furnishings rose 0.6 percent, re turning to the level existing before th year's August sales. Seasonal rises we reported in home fuel costs. Gas bi were up 1.0 percent, due chiefly to i creases in Pacific Coast cities and in tv Eastern cities.

Apparel costs were up 1.5 percent a food prices rose 0.1 percent. Transp tation costs, on the other hand, w down by 1.0 percent. This was chiefly to more liberal discounts by de ers seeking to rid themselves of huge c stocks of new 1960 autos to make for the 1961 model.

Used cars were also down in pri a contraseasonal trend. This was a tion of the huge new car invent uation, and of the trend toward compacts.

About 75,000 workers received wage increases of one cent under cost-of-living escalators. Some 25,000 others received two or three cents.

As living costs rose, real dollar earnings of factory workers continued to decline. The factory workweek dropped from 39.8 in August to 39.6 in September, causing earnings to fall slightly to $90.68 weekly. The dip in the workweek was largely offset by a one cent per hour rise in hourly wages.

Spendable earnings this September were 0.6 percent higher than last year—during [illegible] were up

Heritage of Eisenhower Remains in Labor Board

While it is still too early to determine the election's impact upon national labor policy, the heritage of the Eisenhower Administration will not be easily cast aside.

Throughout most of the past eight years, labor policy has been made almost as much by the National Labor Relations Board as by Congress. This key agency has been stacked against organized labor by the outgoing President.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D., Ore.) charged four years ago that the Labor Board had taken over legislative functions in the labor-management relations field.

"The sad thing is," the Senator told an IUD meeting at that time, "that this reactionary Administration is doing pretty well in accomplishing its legislative objectives without the passage of legislation at all. They have done it with a few appointments to the National Labor Relations Board that have usurped the legislative processes of the Congress."

This situation has not changed for the better since 1956. The NLRB has remained stacked against labor, and has continued to make law by decree.

The NLRB has permitted a pattern to emerge which frustrates the right to organize. Employers have been able to fire workers taking the lead in organizing activity on the flimsiest pretext.

If collective bargaining is to take its proper place in the years ahead, administration of the law must be changed. Current appointments to the NLRB, however, continue to run almost until the end of the first term of the new Administration.

Boyd Leedom, present NLRB chairman, was named to his post in the first Eisenhower term. Reappointed by the outgoing President, Leedom's term runs through 1964. This South Dakota judge had no experience in labor-management relations prior to his appointment to the NLRB. Kennedy can displace Leedom as chairman, since the President can designate the member of the NLRB to hold the post.

Philip R. Rodgers, former administrative assistant to the late Sen. Taft and a reputed author of the Taft-Hartley Act, was first named to the NLRB in 1953. Reappointed by Eisenhower in 1958, his term runs until August of 1963.

By tradition there is bipartisan representation in the supposedly independent administrative agencies. Eisenhower got around this in the case of the NLRB by naming Joseph L. Jenkins, a "Democrat for Eisenhower" in 1957. The term of this former NLRB regional attorney expires next August.

John Fanning, the "liberal" member of the Board, came from the Defense Dep't where he was in charge of labor relations. His term continues until December of 1962. He is listed as a Democrat.

Arthur A. Kimball is an interim appointee, whose appointment is still to be confirmed by Congress. He has no previous labor relations background.

A key post in the NLRB is that of General Counsel. It is up to the General Counsel to determine whether or not a complaint shall be processed by the NLRB. Stuart Rothman, former Labor Department solicitor under Sec. James Mitchell, now holds this important traffic cop post.

Rothman's four year term continues through 1963. While NLRB general counsels have resigned with a change of Administration, such a step is not obligatory.

Court to Review Boycott Ruling

The Supreme Court has agreed to review a lower court's secondary boycott ruling against the Int'l Union of Electrical Workers that—if left to stand—could seriously limit labor's traditional picketing rights.

The alleged boycott involves a 1958 strike at GE's Louisville Plant when union members set up a picket line at a plant gate reserved for the use of workers employed by independent contractors.

According to the National Labor Relations Board, the strikers asked the neutral employees not to cross the picket line and issued special passes so that these employees could enter the plant and get their tools.

The Board charged that "the pickets left no doubt that the picketing [at the special gate] was aimed at the contractors and their employees."

Answering the NLRB decision, the IUE claims that unions have traditionally had the right to appeal to neutrals presenting themselves at the gates of a struck plant. It adds that if the ruling is upheld, organized labor may find it illegal to seek strike support from customers, suppliers, and transporters coming to a struck plant.

CEMENT UNION GUEST. Felix Jones, general president of the International Union of Cement, Lime and Gypsum Workers, pins a guest badge on Jacob Clayman, IUD administrative director, as he welcomed the latter to the union's recent convention in Dallas.

Jane Addams Republished

Jane Addams' "Peace and Bread" was written almost 40 years ago. It has just been republished by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, with the aid of grants from the Sidney Hillman Foundation and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers to the Jane Addams' Centennial Committee.

The book, which includes an introduction written for a 1945 edition by Philosopher John Dewey, is partially an account of the 1,136 women who gathered at the Hague in 1915 to try to stop the slaughter that had engulfed the world in the first global war.

Miss Addams was born in 1860, and her career was a continual struggle for the underdog and for a better world. ACWA joined in the work of republication of the book in commemoration of the great reformer's service to the union in its early years.

The Centennial Committee was initiated by the Women's International League and its sponsors include both Herbert Hoover and Eleanor Roosevelt. The book is a major part of the centennial observation and can be ordered at $1.25 per copy from Jane Addams House, 2006 Walnut St., Philadelphia 3, Pa.

The book is valuable as an analysis of a fight for peace that failed, as well as an historical document.

Jane Addams founded the Women's League and headed it until her death in 1935. She has been described by Sen. Paul Douglas of Illinois as one of two Americans "who most closely approached saint-hood." The other was Abraham Lincoln.

Coordination Making Gains

The IUD's coordinated organizing drive in Philadelphia is making good progress. Of 10 organizing campaigns in which IUD coordination has played a part to date, seven have been successful.

With activity gaining momentum and scope, four campaigns have been won in recent weeks. The largest of these involved some 300 workers at the Quaker City Iron Works.

The United Auto Workers emerged as victor in a hard fought campaign at this plant. It received 159 votes against 61 for District 50 of the United Mine Workers.

IUD Coordinator William Layman has also reported that at the Filmont Pressed Steel Co., the UAW was voluntarily recognized as bargaining agent for about 100 workers after the majority signed union authorization cards in a drive involving IUD coordination.

At Wayne Iron, a firm employing about 135 workers, the United Steelworkers was victorious following a coordinated drive. At I. Z. Motors, a small firm, the UAW was victorious by a vote of 18 to 1.

Layman has reported good cooperation among the more than 20 unions participating in the coordinated effort. Currently, the IUD is working with the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers in carrying out a drive in which OCAW local unions are participating.

Harold Ash, who had long experience in the CIO Department of Organization, has been added to the IUD staff in the Philadelphia area and Pete Riley, who had been on loan from the American Newspaper Guild, has returned to his regular union assignment.

Reviewing the situation, IUD Organizational Director Nicholas Zonarich has expressed satisfaction with progress to date. "We are hopeful," he said, "that progress will snowball in the months ahead."

Higher Education

A recent Elmo Roper survey for the Ford Foundation showed that 70 percent of all families are "planning" to send their children to college. But only two out of five families are able to put anything aside for this purpose, and then the median amount saved is only $150 a year. Yet, costs of a four year university education are already figured at from $6,000 to $10,000 depending upon the school. Scholarships on the average are worth only $145 each.

SHIPBUILDERS CONVENTION. Top officers of the International Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America were reelected to their posts at the organization's recent convention in New York. Shown here are: Ross Blood, IUMSWA secretary-treasurer; Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers of America and a featured speaker; John Grogan, IUMSWA president; Andrew Pettis, IUMSWA vice-president.

New Classroom Lag Shows Federal Help Imperative

As school began this year, the nation was still short at least 132,000 classrooms.

In the 1959-60 school year, some 63,000 classrooms had been built. This was 10 percent fewer than in the 1958-1959 year. In part, the fewer classrooms were built in the most recent school year because of the tightening of money and because high interest rates made costs prohibitive for some communities.

The United States has remained virtually at a standstill in meeting classroom shortages despite the building of 130,000 classrooms in the past two years. Shortages in 1958 were conservatively placed at 135,000 classrooms.

The great population explosion and the continued rise in school enrollments have kept pace with school construction. Rising costs of classrooms and high interest rates have aggravated the problem. Record birth rates of the past five years indicate that schoolroom needs will be even greater and that shortages may mount again in the next several years.

With the present slack in the U. S. economy, a program of school construction makes especially good sense. Total school construction outlays by the states for new plants is scheduled to reach about $3.5 billion this year, less than the U. S. spends for cigarettes.

In the 86th Congress, an attempt to spur school construction was beaten back when the House Rules Committee refused to clear a final bill. The Senate had passed a $917 million bill for both construction and teachers' pay, and the House had passed a $1.3 billion measure which would have assisted construction of classrooms over a three-year period.

It is probable that the bills would have resulted in about $400 million in school construction aid annually to the localities. With classrooms costing about $40,000 each, federal aid would have added a maximum of 10,000 new units a year. This would have permitted the nation to continue at the 70,000 construction rate.

A federal program must be begun soon, if the nation is not to slip further behind. Such a program now would provide both needed jobs and stimulus to an economy that has been sagging seriously.

According to Dr. Walter Heller of the University of Minnesota, each $100 million of school construction will provide 15,000 man-years of work on and off the job site. It will create a demand for $6 million of electrical equipment, $12.7 million for plumbing and heating; $6 million for steel; $2 million for brick and tile; $5.1 million for concrete and concrete block; $3.5 million for millwork, $3.2 million for windows and glass; $3.9 million for kitchen equipment and $1 million for asphalt floor covering.

Indiana Agency Shop Reaffirmed by NLRB

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. — The National Labor Relations Board has, in effect, reaffirmed the legality of the agency shop in so-called "right-to-work" states like Indiana, refusing to issue a complaint against AIW Local 270 on the grounds that no proof was submitted that the agency shop violated federal law.

The test of the agency shop, first of its kind involving Indiana labor since agency shop agreements were written following enactment of this state's compulsory open shop law, involved two workers employed by Fittings, Inc., here.

The case was first filed early in October 1959 by two men who had withdrawn from the union and subsequently refused to pay initiation and regular monthly fees contending that the AIW's insistence that Fittings, Inc. live up to the agency shop agreement was a violation of Sect. 8 (b) (1) (A) and Sec. 8 (b) (2) of the labor law.

Two months after the charge was filed, the company, complying with its contractual obligations to Local 270, discharged the two men. Early in January 1960 the National Labor Relations Board, through the Indianapolis office, dismissed the charges.

Aiding the local in handling the legal aspects of the case was the general counsel of the AIW; Bernard M. Mamet of the Indiana Workers Protective Committee; and Lyle Daugherty, AIW representative.

NLRB Vote Won by Peninsula Workers

WARREN, Mich. — Workers at the Peninsula Chemical Products, Inc., here have voted, by a large margin, to join Local 267 of the AIW.

The AIW won bargaining rights at the plant in an election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

Insurance Pay Hike Feature Local's Pact

LANSING, Mich.—A new three-year agreement, providing for a minimum 18-cent-an-hour wage boost over the life of the contract, has been signed by AIW Local 182 with the Dail Steel Products here.

The contract calls for wage increases of 6 cents per hour or 2.5 per cent, whichever is the greater, in each of the three years, coupled with freezing of 9 cents per hour of the present cost-of-living into the wage structure. At the same time, the living-cost escalator in the previous contract is continued.

The pact also provides for increased insurance benefits, with the installation of the Michigan Blue Cross-Blue Shield M-75 plans B and C, with an added feature permitting employes on leave or layoff to carry the insurance for a period of 90 days at the group rate, followed by the right to transfer to the direct payment plan.

Other sections of the contract were clarified and improved.

Negotiations for AIW Local 182 were conducted by Branch Chairman Helen Grinnell, Committee Chairman Ernest Roberts, and Committeemen Thomas Shaw and Harold Pant. They were assisted by Dist. Rep. Laurence S. Miller.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE USE OF THIS FORM

WHO MUST FILE.—Every labor organization that wishes to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board must file this Form NLRB–1085, Distribution of Financial Report Certificate, to certify that it has furnished to all its members copies of the financial report accepted by the Secretary of Labor in satisfaction of Sec. 9 (f) and (g) of the act.

WHERE TO FILE.—NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this Form NLRB–1085 with the Affidavit Compliance Branch, National Labor Relations Board, Washington 25, D. C.

LOCAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this Form NLRB–1085 with the Regional Office of the National Labor Relations Board with which they usually file cases.

WHEN TO FILE.—This Form NLRB–1085 must be refiled each time your organization's financial report has been accepted by the Secretary of Labor. Do not file this Form until after your financial report has been accepted by the Secretary of Labor and you have furnished copies of that accepted report to your members. If you have received an extension of 90 days within which to file and distribute your financial report, remember that this Form NLRB–1085 must be filed together with the Department of Labor post card. A newly formed union which has not completed its first fiscal year must file this Form and the Department of Labor post card showing when its first fiscal year will end.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS FORM.

a. ITEM 1. Fill in the complete date of the end of the fiscal year which the report covered. If you are a new union, fill in the complete date on which your first fiscal year will end.

b. ITEM 2. Copies furnished members must be copies of the report finally accepted by the Secretary of Labor.

1. National or international labor organizations may use ways "A," "B," "C," or "E," or any combination of them, but must not use way "D." If way "B" is used, the instructions sent with the copies to the local union must cover "(a)," "(b)," and "(c)." No less than all three are acceptable.
2. Local unions may use any of the five ways or a combination of them.
3. If you check "E," you must remember, in describing the way you used, that—
   - (a) The method described must be very much like "A," "B," "C," or "D," or a combination of them.
   - (b) Neither posting the report nor reading it at a union meeting is alone enough.
   - (c) You must arrange to give copies of the report to all members or to make copies available to all members.
   - (d) If you distribute the report in a way like "B" or "D," you may use any effective method, such as giving a copy to each member personally, or placing enough copies on a table in the meeting hall and inviting members to take one if they want it.
   - (e) If you make the report available at a regular meeting of the union, you need not search out members not at the meeting to deliver copies of the report to them.
   - (f) If you hand out the report at the plant gate, shop, bunkhouse, etc., you must also announce at a regular meeting of the union that copies are there for all members, and you must post a copy at the meeting hall, in order to take care of members who were absent from work or otherwise missed outside the meeting hall.

c. CERTIFICATION:

1. Give the full name of your labor organization, including the local number, if any.
2. Fill in the business address of your organization, including number, street, city, and State.
3. Give the full name of the national or international union with which you are affiliated. If none, check the box.
4. Enter the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which you directly, or your national or international, are affiliated. If none, check the box.

WARNING.—The attention of persons filing this form with the Board is directed to U. S. Code, Title 18, Sec. 1001 (formerly Sec. 80), which provides that any person willfully making or causing to be made any false or fraudulent statements or representations in any matter within the jurisdiction of the Board shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE USE OF THIS FORM

WHO MUST FILE.—Every labor organization that wishes to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board must file this form, signed by one of its officers.

WHERE TO FILE.—NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this form with the Affidavit Compliance Branch, National Labor Relations Board, Washington 25, D. C.

LOCAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this form with the Regional Office of the National Labor Relations Board with which they usually file cases.

WHEN TO FILE.—There must be an up-to-date form on file with the National Labor Relations Board at all times. This form MUST be renewed under the following circumstances:

a. Whenever there is a change of officers or offices of your organization.

b. Whenever a trustee or administrator is appointed to take over the affairs of your organization.

c. After every election of union officers, even though there is no change in officers.

d. Whenever the term of office of one or more of your officers changes.

e. Whenever there is a change in affiliation or name.

If your officers are not installed immediately upon election, you should advise the appropriate office of the National Labor Relations Board, as indicated under WHERE TO FILE, when they will be installed. Under such circumstances the old officers will be considered as holding over until the new officers are installed, provided that no affidavit of the old officers will expire prior to the installation date.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS FORM.—Completely fill out the reverse side of this form as follows:

a. TITLE OF OFFICE:

Write in this column the exact title of each office listed in your constitution and bylaws whether the office is vacant or not.

b. NAME OF OFFICER:

In this column show the name of the person occupying each of the offices listed in the first column. If any office is not filled, write the word "VACANT." If one person holds two or more of the offices, show his or her name opposite each office.

c. EXPIRATION DATE OF PRESENT TERM:

Write in this column the date the officer's term of office will expire. Be sure to give the month, day, and year.

d. CERTIFICATION:

1. Give the full name of your labor organization, including the local number if any.
2. Fill in the business address of your organization, including number, street, city, and State.
3. Give the full name of the national or international union with which you are affiliated. If none, check the box.
4. Enter the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which you directly, or your national or international, are affiliated. If none, check the box.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE USE OF THIS FORM

WHO MUST FILE.—This affidavit must be filed by each officer of a labor organization that wishes to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board. An affidavit must be on file for each officer listed in your constitution and bylaws. Where an officer holds more than one office, a separate affidavit for each office must be filed by him.

WHERE TO FILE.—NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this affidavit with the Affidavit Compliance Branch, National Labor Relations Board, Washington 25, D. C.

LOCAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this affidavit with the Regional Office of the National Labor Relations Board with which they usually file cases.

WHEN TO FILE.—This affidavit is good for only one year from the time it is signed and must be renewed each year. Each time a new officer assumes office, whether elected or appointed, he must file this affidavit. If an officer is reelected or reappointed, it is not necessary to file a new affidavit unless or until the affidavit on file with the National Labor Relations Board is one year old.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS AFFIDAVIT:

a. Read carefully items 1, 2, and 3 of this affidavit.

b. Fill in the full name of your labor organization, including the local number if any.

c. Give the full name of the national or international union with which your organization is affiliated. If none, check the box.

d. Enter the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which your organization directly, or its national or international, is affiliated. If none, check the box.

CERTIFICATE OF INTENT

I, an officer of the Union named below, certify that within 90 days after the fiscal year ending .....,
(Month) (Day) (Year)
this Union intends to:

1. Refile the required financial report for such fiscal year with the Department of Labor;
2. Furnish copies of the report to its members;
3. Furnish the National Labor Relations Board with a copy of the notice received from the Department of Labor signifying that this Union has refiled the required financial report;
4. File Form NLRB–1085 (Distribution of Financial Report Certificate) with the National Labor Relations Board.

It is therefore requested that the National Labor Relations Board continue to process, during this 90-day period, cases in which this Union is an interested party. It is understood that any action taken in behalf of this Union during this 90-day period is subject to withdrawal, and all matters being processed by the Board in behalf of this Union may be subject to immediate dismissal, if compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) has not been renewed by the end of the 90-day period.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE USE OF THIS FORM

GENERAL.—This form, if filed within 30 days prior to the end of your fiscal year, may be used to notify the proper office of the National Labor Relations Board of your intent to remain in compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. It will not, however, extend the filing requirements under Section 9 (h), (affidavit of noncommunist union officer).

WHO MUST FILE.—Every labor organization that wishes to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board during that period (not to exceed 90 days) between the end of the organization's fiscal year and the time it is able to file the required financial report with the Department of Labor and distribute the report to its membership, must file this form, or other written request containing the same information, signed by one of its officers.

WHERE TO FILE.—NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this form with the Affidavit Compliance Branch, National Labor Relations Board, Washington 25, D. C.

LOCAL LABOR ORGANIZATIONS must file this form with the Regional Office of the National Labor Relations Board with which they usually file cases.

WHEN TO FILE.—To receive the 90-day extension, this form or other written request must be filed with the appropriate office of the National Labor Relations Board before your fiscal year ends. Do not file it more than 30 days before that date. All matters being processed by the Board in your behalf may be subject to immediate dismissal if this form or other written request is not filed on time.

HOW TO PREPARE THIS FORM.—

a. Read carefully the entire statement contained on the face of this form.

b. Fill in the month, day and year on which your fiscal year will end.

c. Completely fill in the remainder of the form as follows:

1. Give the full name of your organization, including local number if any.

2. Fill in the business address of your organization, including number, street, city, and State.

3. Give the full name of the national or international union with which your organization is affiliated. If none, check the box.

4. Fill in the name of the national federation, such as AFL–CIO, Confederated Unions of America, National Independent Union Council, etc., with which you directly, or your national or international, are affiliated. If none, check the box.

OUTLINE OF LEADING NLRB RULINGS ON CONTRACT BAR DOCTRINE

A. NATURE OF AGREEMENT

1. Oral agreement is not a bar.
2. Members only agreement is not a bar. (Moreover, a members only contract which detracts from the Board certification not only is not a bar, but it will also result in revocation of the certification as well.)
3. Recognition agreement is not a bar. (For a contract to be a bar it must contain substantial terms and conditions of employment which are deemed sufficient to stabilize the bargaining relationship. It will not be a bar if it is limited to wages only.)
4. Contract which covers an inappropriate unit under Board policy or substantially departs from Board certification is not a bar. (Exceptions: inclusion of supervisors or guards in contract unit of production and maintenance workers does not remove contract as a bar.)
5. Where the contract commits the union, during term of contract, to refrain from organizing or representing employees not covered in the agreement, that contract bars a further petition by such union during its term.

B. DURATION OF AGREEMENT

1. A valid contract having a fixed term of duration constitutes a bar for as much of its term as does not exceed two years.
2. Contract with no fixed term is not a bar for any period.
3. Contract which is terminable at will is not a bar for any period.

C. TIMELINESS OF RIVAL PETITION

1. Rival petition is timely 150 to 60 days before the end of the contract term. (Extension of contract which is executed prior to the last 60 days of this period will be considered a premature extension which is not a bar. Extensions executed during or after this 60-day period will not be so considered.)

2. Petition filed during the 60-day insulated period will be dismissed as untimely regardless of conduct of contracting parties during this period.

3. Where the contract is one of "unreasonable duration" (more than two years), the insulated period will be the last 60 days of the reasonable period.

4. Contract executed on same day as filing of petition is a bar if it is effective immediately or retroactively and the employer has not been informed at time of execution that petition has been filed. (Contract is not a bar if the petition is filed prior to execution of the contract, regardless of employer knowledge. Cut off time is midnight, notwithstanding continuous bargaining.)

D. UNION SECURITY PROVISIONS

1. Contract is not a bar if its union security clause (note model on accompanying sheet) on its face fails to conform to the requirements of the Act or has been found unlawful in an unfair labor practice proceeding.

2. Contract is not a bar if the union security clause:

   (a) does not expressly grant old, non-union employees 30 days' grace;

   (b) is accompanied by a provision deferring the effectiveness of invalid clauses or attempting to rescind or amend them; or

   (c) may be interpreted as either lawful or unlawful because of ambiguity or generality of language used.

3. Contract containing union security provisions is not a bar if, within the year before the execution of the contract, a majority of the employees in the unit have voted to rescind the authority of the union to make such agreement.

4. Contract containing union security provisions is not a bar if the contracting union or its affiliated parent is not in compliance with the filing requirements of the Act. For the purpose of this rule, a union is deemed to be in compliance with the filing requirements if it meets any of the following requirements:

   (a) It was in compliance at the time of the execution or renewal of the contract; or

   (b) It received a notice of compliance within the 12-month period preceding the execution or renewal of the contract; or

   (c) It received a notice of compliance before the filing of the petition if initial steps to achieve such compliance were taken before the execution or renewal of the contract; or

(d) It achieved compliance after the filing of the petition if initial steps to achieve compliance were taken before the execution of the contract was achieved within a reasonable period of time.

(Evidence will not be received in representation proceedings for the purpose of determining the validity of union security clauses for contract bar purposes.)

E. SIGNATURE AND RATIFICATION OF AGREEMENT

1. Contract, to be a bar, must be signed by all parties before petition is filed. This is so even if the parties conclude negotiations and put into effect some or all of the provisions.

2. Only where the contract itself makes ratification a condition of its effectiveness shall the contract be no bar until ratified.

F. SCHISM IN CONTRACTING UNION

1. Contract is not a bar where the Board finds the existence of a schism warranting an election. The Board will find such schism if the following conditions are met:

(a) Local disaffiliation action must have occurred "in the context of a basic intra-union conflict * * * over policy at the highest level of an international union * * * or within a federation, which results in a disruption of existing intra-union relationships." (Local action unrelated to such a conflict is insufficient.)

(b) Disaffiliation action will be recognized where taken "at an open meeting called, without regard to any constitutional restrictions but with due

notice to the member in the unit, for the purpose of taking disaffiliation action for reasons relating to the basic intra-union conflict."

(c) Disaffiliation action must be taken "within a reasonable period" following occurrence of the conflict, and such conflict must result "in confusion unstabilizing the bargaining relationship;" that is, the employer must be "confronted with two organizations each claiming with some show of right to be the organization previously chosen by the employees * * * ."

G. UNIT EXPANSION (Numbers, classifications)

1. Contract is no bar if executed before any employees have been hired.

2. Contract, which is executed prior to substantial increase in personnel, is a bar if:

(a) 30% of the employees on the payroll at the time of the hearing were employed when the contract was executed; and

(b) 50% of the job classifications in existence at the time of the hearing were in existence when the contract was executed.

H. CHANGE IN OWNERSHIP OF BUSINESS

1. Assumption of the operations by a purchaser who in good faith has not bound himself to assume the contract of the prior owner of the establishment removes the contract as a bar.

2. Where the new owner executes a new agreement with the incumbent union, the only change being in the termination date of the agreement, all other terms remaining the same, the Board does not view this as a premature extension.

NLRB'S "MODEL" UNION SECURITY CLAUSE

For the guidance of negotiators, the NLRB has drafted a "model" union security clause providing the maximum security permitted by the Act. The text of the clause follows:

> It shall be a condition of employment that all employees of the employer covered by this agreement who are members of the union in good standing on the effective date of this agreement shall remain members in good standing and those who are not members on the effective date of this agreement shall, on the thirtieth day or such longer period as the parties may specify following the effective date of this agreement, become and remain members in good standing in the union. It shall also be a condition of employment that all employees covered by this agreement and hired on or after its effective date shall, on the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment or such longer period as the parties may specify become and remain members in good standing in the union.

BEFORE THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

COMPLIANCE STATUS OF INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILERMAKERS, IRON SHIP BUILDERS, BLACKSMITHS, FORGERS, AND HELPERS, AFL-CIO, and LOCAL 609, INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILERMAKERS, IRON SHIP BUILDERS, BLACKSMITHS, FORGERS, AND HELPERS, AFL-CIO

ADMINISTRATIVE DETERMINATION OF COMPLIANCE STATUS

On April 14, 1958, Plant City Welding and Tank Company, an Employer in interest in certain proceedings pending before the Board, filed a petition with the Board for an administrative determination of the compliance status of International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, hereinafter referred to as the International, and Local 609, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, hereinafter referred to as the Local. An administrative investigation was thereafter conducted on behalf of the Board. Since the facts are not in substantial dispute, it would serve no useful purpose to order a hearing in this matter. The Board has considered the entire administrative record herein and hereby makes the following determination:

The International's compliance status

The Employer alleges that the International has failed to meet the requirements of Section 9 (f), (g), and (h) of the Act in five respects.

(1) The Company maintains that in violation of Section 9 (f) (B) (2) the International furnished financial statements to its members for the fiscal years 1947 through 1957 which did not contain all the information required by the Act and which were not copies of the statements filed with the Secretary of Labor.

The International admits that the published financial statements were not the complete reports filed with the Secretary of Labor but contends that this allegation should be rejected because (a) each of the Journals in which the annual "Summary of Funds" was published also contains a letter from the International President and International Secretary-Treasurer which states: "All members are hereby notified that every Financial Secretary is in possession of a detailed financial report prepared and certified to by Certified Public Accountants. Any member desiring to examine these reports is at liberty to do so by requesting the Financial Secretary of your Local Union to provide a copy of same"; (b) the fund headings, according to the International, adequately show in themselves the sources of income and purposes of disbursements, and there is no statement of assets and liabilities, as such, because all assets shown consist of cash and investments, it has no liabilities except transitory insurance premiums payable and a few benefit claims receivable; and (c) in addition to the detailed financial report it has furnished to the Secretary of Labor each year a printed copy of the Journal showing the "Summary of Funds" distributed.

Under these circumstances, and particularly the fact that the exhibits accompanying the Employer's Motion clearly establish that the above letter did appear with each summary, we are satisfied that the International made available to its membership the financial data required by Section 9 (f) (B).[1/]

(2) The Company also contends that the International has failed to meet the requirements of the Act in that the copies of the financial statements were furnished to fewer than its total membership.

We are satisfied that the International has taken reasonable steps to reach as many members as possible, and therefore conclude that it has met the statutory requirement in this regard.[2/] We do not believe that a union can be expected to search out each and every member in order to deliver a copy of its financial report before it may qualify under Section 9 (f) and (g). To impose so strict a requirement would undoubtedly have the effect of nullifying the rights of unions to file petitions and charges under the Act and would prevent employees from having the opportunity to select a union to represent them, inasmuch as it is doubtful whether this standard could ever be met. We do not believe that Congress intended such a result.

(3) The Employer also takes the position that there was a lapse in the International's compliance in that its financial statement for the fiscal year 1957 was distributed several days after the expiration of the 90-day grace period granted when it filed a certificate of intent, and therefore, under the

1/ See Compliance Status of Cigar Makers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, 117 NLRB 856.
2/ Ibid.

Board's decision in Monsanto Chemical Company, 115 NLRB 702, all pending proceedings should have been dismissed, and that,

(4) the International's forms NLRB-1085 for the fiscal years 1953 through 1957 were executed and filed at times when the financial statement had not yet been distributed; therefore, they contained false statements and the Board should find, on the authority of Compliance Status of Plaster Tenders, Construction, General and Shipyard Laborers' Local Union #802, International Hod Carriers, Building and Common Laborers' Union of America, AFL, 111 NLRB 742, that the International is not in compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g).[3/]

Near the end of each of the fiscal years in question, the International filed a certificate of intent to renew compliance under Section 9 (f) and (g) and was granted a 90-day extension of time in which to do so. Since the fiscal year ends on June 30, the 90-day grace period expired September 28 each year. Sometime in September of each of the years under consideration, the International filed its form NLRB-1085 certifying that it had published its financial statement in its Journal which was distributed to its members. However, the actual publication was in the October issue of the Journal, which was not distributed until October 1 or shortly thereafter. It thus appears that the facts alleged by the Employer are accurate. Nevertheless, we do not believe that the findings advocated by the Employer are warranted under the circumstances here present.

During the investigation the International advised the Regional Office that it had delivered the financial reports to the printer for printing and mailing prior to the execution and filing of the form NLRB-1085 and before the expiration of the 90-day period. Moreover, we note that the International's past history clearly manifests an intent to achieve full compliance.[4/]

3/ Allegations 3 and 4 are discussed together, since they relate to the same facts.

4/ This situation is, therefore, unlike that in either Monsanto Chemical or Plaster Tenders. In the former case, there was a delay of 3 weeks during which the financial statement was in the hands of the union, but distribution was delayed until its next regular meeting, whereas in the instant situation the distribution was within the control of the printer and the delay amounted to only a few days. In the Plaster Tenders case, the union stated in its form NLRB-1085 that it had posted copies of its financial report at its headquarters and had announced at a regular meeting that copies thereof were ready for distribution but in fact it had done neither of these things at any time, whereas here the statements in the form NLRB-1085 were substantially accurate.

Accordingly, we reject these contentions of the Employer.

(5) The Company maintains that a number of individuals, although not designated in the International's constitution as officers, are nevertheless officers who should be required to file Section 9 (h) non-communist affidavits.

The International's constitution provides as follows, in Article III, headed "International Officers":

> Section 1. The International officers shall consist of an International President, International Secretary-Treasurer, Editor and Manager of the official Journal, and sixteen (16) International Vice Presidents . . .

The Employer contends that, in addition, the incumbents of the positions of President Emeritus, Trustee, International Representative, District Representative, Business Manager, Member of the Executive Council, "Delegate to A. F. of L.", and Delegate to the Trade and Labor Congress of Canada are officers. However, it is clear that these positions are not designated as offices by the constitution. Therefore, none of the incumbents is an officer of the International within the Board's "constitutional" test, which the United States Supreme Court has approved as a "reasonable, if indeed not a compelling construction of the statute."[5/]

Moreover, even if we were to apply the interpretation of the constitutional test adopted by some U. S. Courts of Appeals [6/] (i. e., "identification" in the constitution by virtue of description of duties, manner of selection, etc., associated with a person holding office), we would be compelled to reach the same conclusion. Thus, the President Emeritus and Business Manager are clearly not within that interpretation, since they are not even mentioned in the constitution, and there is complete silence as to their powers and duties as well as to those of Trustees, International Representatives, District Representatives, and Delegates. In an analogous situation the U. S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has held[7/] that the incumbent of such a position is not an "officer". Furthermore, even if Executive Council

Members were held to be officers under this interpretation, such Members also hold other international offices[8/] and have filed affidavits as the incumbents of such positions, thus satisfying the requirements of Section 9 (h).

The Local's compliance status

The allegations relating to the Local's compliance approximately parallel those set forth above but are different as to detail.

(1) The Company contends that the Local has failed to comply with Section 9 (f) and (g) in that the financial reports distributed by it for the fiscal years 1955, 1956, and 1957 were not sufficiently comprehensive because they did not contain all the necessary information and were not copies of the reports filed with the Secretary of Labor; they were not posted as set forth in the forms NLRB-1085 filed with the Board; and they were distributed to fewer than its total membership.

The Local's fiscal year ends December 31. Each year the Local has certified to the Board that copies of its financial report were distributed by "/posting/ a copy in a conspicuous place at the headquarters and meeting hall of the Local Union and /announcing/ at a regular meeting that copies were ready for distribution to all members."

With respect to the Local's compliance at the close of its fiscal year 1955, the Local admitted during this investigation that because of the peculiar circumstances at that time copies of the report were, in fact, not distributed, although the details thereof were discussed at a meeting, the report was posted during the course of the meeting, and the members approved the report. It is apparent that the steps taken with respect to this 1955 financial statement were insufficient to meet the requirements of the Act. Section 9 (f) (B) (2) provides for distribution and leaves the Board no discretion to accept anything less. Accordingly, we must conclude that the Local's compliance at the end of fiscal 1955 was insufficient and its compliance had lapsed during the calendar year 1956.

8/ The constitution provides that the Executive Council is to be composed of the International President and the 16 International Vice Presidents.

This is not true, however, with respect to the Local's conduct at the end of its fiscal years 1956 and 1957. The Local, at those times, announced at a regular meeting that copies of its financial statement would be available to the membership at the next meeting, made such copies available at that meeting to all members who wished them, and posted a copy thereof during the course of the meeting but removed the posted copy at the end of the meeting because the meeting hall is used by 16 other unions and the Local has no headquarters of its own. Under these circumstances, we are satisfied that the Local's compliance for the fiscal years 1956 and 1957 was sufficient to meet the requirements of the Act.

(2) The Company maintains that the Local was also out of compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) in that it did not distribute its financial statement for the fiscal year 1957 until March 10, 1958, although this was within the 90-day grace period granted by the Board after the Local had filed a certificate of intent to renew its compliance, since the Board's action in granting such an extension "is contrary and in derogation to Section 9 (f) and (g), improper and beyond the authority of the NLRB" or "assuming, arguendo, that such action is within the authority of the NLRB, the NLRB has failed to properly promulgate, establish or authorize this policy, rule, or regulation."

We reject this position as without merit. We have previously held that the procedure for securing an extension of time to renew compliance is applicable in circumstances such as these,[9/] and have also had occasion more recently to reject this same contention by the instant Employer[10/] as well as by another employer.[11/]

(3) The Company further maintains that the positions of Chief Steward, Representative Steward, Sick Steward, and Member of Negotiating Committee, although not listed in the Union's constitution as officers, are nevertheless officers who should be required to file Section 9 (h) non-communist affidavits.

What we have said above with respect to the Employer's allegation concerning additional International officers is equally applicable to the instant contention. The Subordinate Lodge Constitution, in Article II, contains the following provision:

> Section 1. The officers of each Subordinate Lodge shall consist of a President, Vice President, Treasurer, Inspector, Inside Guard, Outside Guard, Recording Secretary, Financial Secretary, Corresponding Secretary, a Board of Trustees . . ., and a Business Manager where one is considered necessary . . .

This section of the constitution further provides that "stewards" are to be appointed, and "sick stewards" and "committeemen" may be elected or appointed as each lodge shall determine but are not to be considered officers. However, no duties are described for any of these positions. Accordingly, the incumbents clearly are not "officers" under the Board's "constitutional" test or under the interpretation thereof adopted by some of the U. S. Courts of Appeals.[12/]

IT IS THEREFORE ADMINISTRATIVELY DETERMINED that International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, is in compliance with Section 9 (f), (g), and (h) of the Act, and that Local 609, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, was not in compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2) and (g) of the Act during the calendar year 1956 but has been in compliance thereafter, and

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that any letters of compliance issued to Local 609, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers, and Helpers, AFL-CIO, during the calendar year 1956 be, and they hereby are, declared null and void and without effect.

JOHN H. FANNING, MEMBER, concurring in part and dissenting in part:

I concur in the majority's conclusion that Local 609 was not in compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2) of the Act during calendar year 1956 and that letters of compliance issued to that organization for that year are null and void.

I must dissent, however, from the majority's conclusion that the International itself was in compliance with the Statute.

Section 9 (f) (B) (2) requires that the processes of the Board shall be available only to those unions which furnish their members with "copies of the financial report" they are otherwise required to file with the Secretary of Labor. Similarly, the Board's Rules and Regulations provide that a complying labor organization must execute a declaration stating that it has furnished "to all its members copies of the financial report filed with the Department of Labor . . ." (Section 102.13). In its "Guide for Labor Organizations to the Filing Requirements of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947" the Board states on page 6: "Section 9 (f) (B) (2) of the Act requires that you furnish to all the members of your organization copies of the financial report filed with the Department of Labor . . ." And, in further implementation of the Act, the Rules and Regulations, and the Guide, Form NLRB - 1085, "Distribution of Financial Report Certificate", among other things, contains the statement that the Secretary of Labor has accepted the financial report of the union and that "The union has furnished copies of that report to all its members . . ." The instructions on the reverse side of the Form, in pertinent part, require that "Copies furnished members must be copies of the report finally accepted by the Secretary of Labor." It appears abundantly clear that the Act and the Board's Rules and Regulations and outstanding instructions to unions preclude the Board from finding compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2) on the basis of the distribution of any financial statement other than the full report filed with and approved by the Secretary of Labor. No requirement of the Statute is more simply or clearly stated.

The facts set forth in the majority's opinion reveal that the International did not furnish its members with "copies" of the financial report submitted to the Department of Labor. Rather, it is admitted that the International merely published a "summary" of that report in its annual Journal, informing its members that they could secure a copy by requesting the Financial Secretary of the Local Union to provide one. This procedure was not, in my opinion, compliance with Section 9 (f) (B) (2). A copy is a copy. It is not an approximation, an abbreviation, or a summary. In concluding that the International made available to its membership the financial data required by Section 9 (f) (B) the majority relies particularly upon the letter which was published with the summary. This letter informed the members that a detailed financial report was in the possession of the financial secretaries and that "Any member desiring to examine these reports is at liberty to do so by requesting the Financial Secretary of your Local Union to provide a copy of same . . ." In effect the majority, while admitting that the complete report was not furnished the members, is, at the same time, stating that this procedure was tantamount to furnishing the membership the complete statement. It seems to me that this is precisely the kind of "furnishing" the Statute attempts to prevent. To furnish is to give--not to give upon request. Union members quite eager to examine a copy of their Union's financial report might be understandably reluctant to demand that the Financial Secretary provide them with one. Accordingly, I conclude that the International failed to comply with the filing requirements of the Act.

In reaching this conclusion, I am, of course, aware of the fact that for some years the practice has been prevalent among some unions to provide their members with a "summary" rather than a "copy" of their financial reports. Despite the specific language of the Statute and the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Board appears to have acquiesced in this practice in Cigar Makers International Union of America, AFL-CIO, cited above. I was not a member of the Board at the time that decision issued. I believe it was wrongly decided. Nevertheless, I recognize that this International and other labor organizations may have been misled into believing that the Board's rules did not require furnishing actual copies of their financial reports to members. Except as indicated herein, the International has followed the requirements for compliance with Section 9 (f) and (g) of the Act. There is no evidence that it has been guilty of either neglect or an attempt to evade the requirements of the Act. If there is any blame to be assessed, it is not with this labor organization, but elsewhere, possibly with the Board's administration of the pertinent requirements of the Act.

The Board has in certain instances exercised its discretion in the application of the requirements of the pertinent section of the Act by granting certain periods of grace. (See, for example, Marshall and Bruce Company, 75 NLRB 90; Simplicity Pattern Company, 102 NLRB 1283, and Monsanto Chemical Company (John F. Queeny Plant), 115 NLRB 702.) I do not believe the Board should unstablize labor relations with the resultant disturbances and the future unwarranted expenditure of public funds in reprocessing these cases through the Board's procedures, by forthwith revoking certifications in a situation such as that presented here. Nor do I believe that, considering the equities involved and the effectuation of the purposes of the Act as a whole, we would be justified in revoking the Boilermakers' certification without permitting that organization an opportunity to comply with the Act. Accordingly, I would allow the International and other labor organizations similarly situated a reasonable grace period to take steps to comply with the literal requirement of Section 9 (f) (B) (2).

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

AGREEMENT FOR CONSENT ELECTION

Pursuant to a Petition duly filed under Section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act as amended, and subject to the approval of the Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board (herein called the Regional Director), the undersigned parties hereby waive a hearing and AGREE AS FOLLOWS:

1. ELECTION.—An election by secret ballot shall be held under the supervision of the said Regional Director, among the employees of the undersigned Employer in the unit defined below, at the indicated time and place, to determine whether or not such employees desire to be represented for the purpose of collective bargaining by (one of) the undersigned labor organization(s). Said election shall be held in accordance with the National Labor Relations Act, the Board's Rules and Regulations, and the customary procedures and policies of the Board, provided that the determination of the Regional Director shall be final and binding upon any question, including questions as to the eligibility of voters, raised by any party hereto relating in any manner to the election, and provided further that rulings or determinations by the Regional Director in respect of any amendment of any certification resulting therefrom shall also be final.

2. ELIGIBLE VOTERS.—The eligible voters shall be those employees included within the Unit described below, who were employed during the payroll period indicated below, including employees who did not work during said payroll period because they were ill or on vacation or temporarily laid off, and employees in the military services of the United States who appear in person at the polls, but excluding any employees who have since quit or been discharged for cause and have not been rehired or reinstated prior to the date of the election and any employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement. At a date fixed by the Regional Director, the Employer will furnish to the Regional Director an accurate list of all the eligible voters, together with a list of the employees, if any, specifically excluded from eligibility.

3. NOTICES OF ELECTION.—The Regional Director shall prepare a Notice of Election and supply copies to the parties describing the manner and conduct of the election to be held and incorporating therein a sample ballot. The Employer, upon the request of and at a time designated by the Regional Director, will post such Notice of Election at conspicuous and usual posting places easily accessible to the eligible voters.

4. OBSERVERS.—Each party hereto will be allowed to station an equal number of authorized observers, selected from among the nonsupervisory employees of the Employer, at the polling places during the election to assist in its conduct, to challenge the eligibility of voters, and to verify the tally.

5. TALLY OF BALLOTS.—As soon after the election as feasible, the votes shall be counted and tabulated by the Regional Director, or his agent or agents. Upon the conclusion of the counting, the Regional Director shall furnish a Tally of Ballots to each of the parties. When appropriate, the Regional Director shall issue to the parties a certification of representatives or certificate of results of election, as may be indicated.

6. OBJECTIONS, CHALLENGES, REPORTS THEREON.—Objections to the conduct of the election or conduct affecting the results of the election, or to a determination of representatives based on the results thereof, may be filed with the Regional Director within five days after issuance of the Tally of Ballots. Copies of such objections must be served upon the other parties at the time of filing with the Regional Director. The Regional Director shall investigate the matters contained in the objections and issue a report thereon. If objections are sustained, the Regional Director may in his report include an order voiding the results of the election and, in that event, shall be empowered to conduct a new election under the terms and provisions of this agreement at a date, time, and place to be determined by him. If the challenges are determinative of the results of the election, the Regional Director shall investigate the challenges and issue a report thereon. The method of investigation of objections and challenges, including the question whether a hearing should be held in connection therewith, shall be determined by the Regional Director, whose decision shall be final and binding.

7. RUN-OFF PROCEDURE.—In the event more than one labor organization is signatory to this agreement, and in the event that no choice on the ballot in the election receives a majority of the valid ballots cast, the Regional Director shall proceed in accordance with the Board's Rules and Regulations.

8. COMMERCE.—The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2 (6) (7) of the National Labor Relations Act.

16—47629-6

9. WORDING ON THE BALLOT.—Where only one labor organization is signatory to this agreement, the name of the organization shall appear on the ballot and the choice shall be "Yes" or "No." In the event more than one labor organization is signatory to this agreement, the choices on the ballot will appear in the wording indicated below and in the order enumerated below, reading from left to right on the ballot:

STIPULATION FOR CERTIFICATION UPON CONSENT ELECTION
(R Cases)

The undersigned labor organization(s) (herein called the union(s)) claim(s) to represent employees of the undersigned employer (herein called the employer), and the undersigned parties desire that the question concerning the representation of said employees which exists by virtue of said claim shall be resolved by an election by secret ballot. Therefore, the said parties, subject to the approval of the Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board (herein called the Regional Director), HEREBY AGREE AND STIPULATE AS FOLLOWS:

1. SECRET BALLOT -- An election by secret ballot shall be conducted under the supervision of the Regional Director, among the employees in the Unit defined below, at the indicated time and place, to determine whether or not the employees desire to be represented by (one of) the Union(s). Said election shall be held in accordance with the National Labor Relations Act, the Board's Rules and Regulations, and the customary procedures and policies of the Board.

2. ELIGIBLE VOTERS -- The eligible voters shall be those employees included within the Unit described below, who were employed during the payroll period indicated below, including employees who did not work during said payroll period because they were ill or on vacation or temporarily laid off, and employees in the military services of the United States who appear in person at the polls, but excluding any employees who have since quit or been discharged for cause and have not been rehired or reinstated prior to the date of the election and any employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement. At a date fixed by the Regional Director, the Employer will furnish to the Regional Director an accurate list of all the eligible voters, together with a list of the employees, if any, specifically excluded from eligibility.

3. NOTICES OF ELECTION -- The Regional Director shall prepare a Notice of Election and supply copies to the parties describing the manner and conduct of the election to be held and incorporating therein a sample ballot. The Employer, upon the request of and at a time designated by the Regional Director, will post such Notice of Election at conspicuous and usual posting places easily accessible to the eligible voters.

4. OBSERVERS -- Each party hereto will be allowed to station an equal number of authorized observers, selected from among the nonsupervisory employees of the Employer, at the polling places during the election to assist in its conduct, to challenge the eligibility of voters, and to verify the tally. As soon after the election as feasible, the votes shall be counted and tabulated by the Regional Director, or his agent or agents. Upon the conclusion of the counting, the Regional Director shall furnish a Tally of Ballots to each of the parties.

5. POST-ELECTION AND RUN-OFF PROCEDURE -- All procedure subsequent to the conclusion of counting ballots shall be in conformity with the Board's Rules and Regulations.

6. RECORD -- The record in this case shall be governed by the appropriate provisions of the Board's Rules and Regulations and shall include this stipulation. Hearing and notice thereof, Direction of Election, and the making of Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law by the Board prior to the election are hereby expressly waived.

7. COMMERCE -- The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2 (6) of the National Labor Relations Act, and a question affecting commerce has arisen concerning the representation of employees within the meaning of Section 9(c).

TO THE READERS OF:

LABOR ACT UPSIDE DOWN

NLRB: Now An Employer Agency

by

Joseph E. Finley

When the study was in galley, a copy was made available to Mr. Philip Ray Rodgers for his comment on the part dealing with his record, which had been included as illustrative of the way a board member acts. This was done because, as the study says, "Board members are human beings, like the rest of us, their decisions often reflect the background and ideas they possess."

While the NLRB was set up by congressional action to protect and further the rights of labor to organize and bargain collectively, whenever a board member consistently votes against the law in the truly controversial cases coming before the Board, we believe this merits attention and explanation. The author of the study stated this view and presented his evidence.

Then Mr. Rodgers took exception to that statement in a reply presented to and on file with the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, a copy of which was made available to Mr. Finley. At my suggestion, he reviewed that reply, and made his rejoinder, which is attached here for whatever value it may have for you. Unfortunately, the Rodgers statement is not our possession, but may be published by the Committee, or can be seen at the Committee office in the United States Senate by those interested in judging for themselves the merits of the two positions taken.

Dewey Anderson
Executive Director

Joseph E. Finley's rejoinder to Mr. Philip Ray Rodgers' Statement

Filed with the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, June 30, 1958.

One of the important points made in "Labor Act Upside Down," is that Member Philip Ray Rodgers of the NLRB has shown an outstanding predilection for the interests of management over the past three years. Member Rodgers was given a galley proof of this article and filed a written defense of his record with the Senate Labor Committee. Several factors stand out which require comment, but the inescapable conclusion is that Member Rodgers, no more than Macbeth's wife, can erase the spot of his promanagement rulings.

1. Mr. Rodgers' principal complaint about the analysis of his voting record was that it was "fraught with monumental omissions," and that "the purported thesis falls, both as to scholarship and accuracy, due to this vast array of incongruous and wholly inexplicable omissions."

To cure these "monumental omissions," Mr. Rodgers indulged in a "numbers game" that could deceive only the uninformed or the unaware. Mr. Rodgers wants to add to the four proemployee decisions cited in the Appendix of the study "Labor Act Upside Down" some 3,676 cases in which he participated in 1955, 1956, and 1957 wherein elections were directed or unfair labor practice orders were issued which allegedly benefited employees. This, he would have us believe, demonstrates that if he voted in the interests of management 160 times, he voted proemployee some 3,680 times, therefore proving his overwhelming devotion to the interests of working people.

This kind of a defense can only injure Mr. Rodgers in the eyes of anyone who has even the slightest knowledge of NLRB practice and procedures. The great mass of cases coming before the Board are of the purest routine, requiring the exercise of little judgment, and usually producing unanimous views among the Board members. Therefore, if Mr. Rodgers is serious in his desire to add these cases to his record, then indeed he must be quite anxious to obscure the implications of the devastating effect of his 98 per cent promanagement vote in critical cases.

As is carefully pointed out, the cases selected for study were only those cases where there was a clear conflict between the interests of labor and the interests of management. It is in these cases where the real policy of the NLRB is made. Further, the study was restricted to those cases where there were two points of view among Board members. For example, if the Board voted unanimously, no matter how anti-labor such a vote might be considered, one could not find fault with Mr. Rodgers if all his colleagues shared his views. It is believed that the method of case selection for analysis is not only the fairest one possible, but by all means the best indicator of the true disposition of Mr. Rodgers.

2. The claim of "monumental omissions," is, of course, a two-edged sword. Mr. Rodgers omitted comment on the undisputed fact that since he came to the NLRB, the Board has reversed numerous past precedents favorable to labor, and substituted therefor decisions favorable to management, but has not reversed a single promanagement ruling in favor of a new interpretation helpful to labor! This fact alone is enough to stamp the present NLRB as promanagement.

Mr. Rodgers also omitted comment on the serious charge that the present NLRB is unwrapping the labor injunction for use against unions. The author sincerely hopes he is wrong on this point, but there is too much evidence to the contrary.

Thirdly, and most important of all his omissions, was a total failure to join issue on the principal points made in the study. It becomes painfully difficult to answer these points when a man has voted in 1957 in 45 critical cases unanimously on the side of management. He also could not defend some of the views he has expressed, such as his willingness in Bata Shoe Company to approve employer deceit which was "within the realm of possibility;" such as his demand in National Biscuit Co. that a union must disprove its guilt; such as his upholding employer tactics in Peoples Drug Stores as "one of the most significant aspects of the law." He cannot show from his decisions, in any form whatever, the same concern for employee interests that he has consistently shown for management interests. These are simply unanswerable, and so Mr. Rodgers ignores them.

3. Mr. Rodgers, in defense of his record, turned to an analysis of how his opinions or rulings have fared upon judicial review. Of the cases cited in the Appendix where Rodgers voted with the majority against labor, where decisions were reached in the Courts of Appeals, forty per cent of these antilabor rulings were reversed. He could hardly be proud of such a figure. Mr. Rodgers, however, would count in his favor those cases which were not appealed for one reason or another, which is again a stacking of the "numbers," since there are many unknown reasons why cases are not appealed to the courts. For example, in at least two of the cases cited, this attorney, although not participating in the trial of the cases in any way, made the ultimate decision not to appeal. This decision was made, not out of any respect for Mr. Rodgers' side of the controversy, but because the labor problems had long ago been settled and the time and expense of taking an appeal were not justified in the circumstances.

Where Rodgers had dissented from NLRB prolabor rulings, he points out that nine out of sixteen of his opinions were affirmed in the courts. We are happy to concede at least one valid point to Mr. Rodgers. However, it does not require straining of argumentative points to remark that many of the judges who sit on the various Courts of Appeals, and especially so in the south, are not overwhelmingly friendly toward the interests of unions.

Mr. Rodgers also points with pride to how his opinions have fared when they reached the United States Supreme Court. Some of the decisions favorable to unions which were approved by the Supreme Court were rendered in Mr. Rodgers' first year on the Board, when his record appears to be somewhat more reasonable than in the last three, but in those cases, there was much earlier Board precedent to support his position. In the recent hot cargo cases, his stringent anti-labor position was, of course, soundly rejected, even though he attempts to mislabel the Supreme Court ruling as accepting "the substance of my position," which is simply not so.

In any event, however, while it is certainly fair to consider how NLRB decisions have been treated in the Courts of Appeals and in the Supreme Court, the more exact test of whether a Board member is biased toward either labor or management must come from that member's votes in cases decided by the NLRB. The major reason for this is aptly stated by the Supreme Court in the recent decision of NLRB v. Steelworkers, June 30, 1958, where the Court declined to reject the Board's position on a particular legal question, stating: "For us to lay down such a rule of law would show indifference to the responsibilities imposed by the Act primarily on the Board to appraise carefully the interests of both sides of any labor-management controversy in the diverse circumstances of particular cases and in light of the Board's special understanding of these industrial situations." In other words, once the NLRB has decided a legal question, the courts will give that ruling great weight and will not upset it unless the law appears strongly to the contrary. Thus, in the ultimate analysis, one must turn back to the Board votes, and they show Rodgers 98 per cent for management in critical cases. This indisputable fact is the condemnation of Mr. Rodgers.

4. In conclusion, the charge against Mr. Rodgers that he is promanagement and antilabor remains more substantial than ever. By his failure to join issue in the principal areas under discussion, by his attempt to resort to a loading-on of insignificant routine cases to bolster his disastrous record, by his inability to challenge the comparison of his attitudes where the rights of management and the rights of employees are involved, he has given greater validity to the indictment.

We can only hope that an analysis such as is presented in my study "Labor Act Upside Down" will bring home to Mr. Rodgers and his colleagues the necessity of paying more attention to the language and intent of the law and less to the rights of employers which they consider more compelling than the rights of employees for which the law was primarily written.

JOSEPH E. FINLEY

COMPARISON BETWEEN

WAGNER ACT	and TAFT-HARTLEY ACT
ADMINISTRATION
National Labor Relations Board of 3.	National Labor Relations Board of 5.
Duty to investigate and determine representation questions; and to investigate and prevent unfair labor practices.	Same.
Little detailed prescription as to methods of operation. Board came under general rules of Administrative Procedures Act, providing for unified administration.	Detailed prescriptions as to method of operation; powers of NLRB limited; divided administration: General Counsel, independent of authority of Board, in charge of investigation of charges and issuance of complaints, and their prosecution before the Board. Review section replaced by legal assistants to individual Board members. No trial examiner's report to be reviewed except by Board member or his legal assistant. Rules as to evidence. Certain rules of decision specified.
Orders in unfair labor practice cases enforceable and reviewable by Circuit Court of Appeals.	Same, but scope of review possible broadened by language as to "substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole".
No power to obtain injunctions in advance of Board's order.	Injunction may be sought when complaint issued. Petition for injunction mandatory (against union) in cases involving complaints of unlawful strikes or boycotts.
NLRB free to make arrangements with state boards, allowing them to handle certain types of cases.	NLRB not free to cede jurisdiction to state agencies unless state law consistent with national law.
RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES
Right to self-organization, to form, join or assist labor organization, bargain collectively through representatives of own choosing, engage in other concerted activities, for purpose of bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.	Same, except that employees shall also have the right to refrain from any or all such activities except as may be affected by a legal union security agreement.

UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES OF EMPLOYERS

Interference, restraint or coercion.	Same.
Domination, interference or support of a labor organization.	Same, except that same rules of decision are to apply whether union is affiliated or unaffiliated.
Discrimination to encourage or discourage membership in a labor organization - except under a valid union security agreement.	Same, except (1) any closed shop agreement is illegal; (2) discrimination under a valid union security agreement may not be justified if membership in not available on same terms as to others, or if membership was denied for reasons other than failure to tender dues.
Discrimination for filing charges or testifying under the Act.	Same.
Refusal to bargain.	Same, except that obligation is limited in effect by various other provisions of the Act.
	Other provisions affecting findings of unfair labor practices are: "Free speech" clause: expression of any view, arguments or opinion not to constitute or be evidence of unfair labor practice unless contains threat of reprisal or promise of benefit. Definition of collective bargaining, requiring 60-day notice of change or termination. Employee striking during 60-day period loses protection of the Act and may be discharged. Nothing in Act to prohibit discharge of worker for cause (as it effects organizing situations). Unions may not file unfair labor practice charges unless thay have filed financial and other data required and their officers have filed non-communist affidavits. Six-month statute of limitations.

UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES OF UNIONS

None, but NLRB decisions imposed a number of restraints on unions: Union coercion of employees could invalidate election.	Restraint or coercion of employees, or employer in choice of his representative.
Discrimination for dual unionism limited.	Discrimination or causing employer to discriminate (except as modified by valid union security agreement).
Union "refusal to bargain" considered in several cases of refusal to bargain charges made against employers.	Refusal to bargain.
NLRB dealt with some jurisdictional disputes. Elections settled many. Union coercion against a certified union was held no defense for employer against charge of refusal to bargain or dis-crimination.	Boycotts, broadly defined, including strikes and boycotts in jurisdictional disputes.
	Excessive initiation fees under union security agreements.
	Featherbedding - causing payments in nature of exaction for services not performed.

REPRESENTATION DISPUTES

Majority rule, with right of individuals to represent grievances.	Same, except right of individual adjustment of grievances, so long as not inconsistent with contract, and right of bargaining representative to be present.
Bargaining unit decided by NLRB.	Same, but several restrictions on discretion of NLRB: No units of supervisors. No inclusion of professionals in other units unless they so vote. No inclusion of guards in unit with others, or unit of guards if union includes or is affiliated with others. No denial of craft unit on grounds of prior Board determination. Extent of organization not to be controlling.

Conditions for petitions and elections within descretion of NLRB: "One-year" rule in general. Board permitted petition by employer faced by conflicting claims of two unions.	Same, except for limitations on discretion of NLRB: One election in year. Employer may petition upon a request for recognition by any union. No pre-hearing election. Rules for run-off elections. Strikers who are not entitled to reinstatement ("economic" as against "unfair labor practice" strikers) not eligible to vote. Decertification elections, on petition of 30 percent of employees.

LIMITATIONS UPON ACCESS OF UNIONS TO BOARD TO FILE PETITIONS & CHARGES

	Union must have filed Constitution and financial report and other information with Secretary of Labor. Officers of union must file non-communist affidavit with NLRB.

UNION SECURITY AGREEMENTS

Permitted when made with union representing majority, and not the result of any unfair labor practice.	Closed shop outlawed, union shop and maintenance of membership OK. Discharge for non-membership under such agreements limited to cases of refusal to tender dues.
State prohibitions of closed shop permitted to stand.	More restrictive state laws permitted to stand in respect to any and all forms of union security. Check-off of union dues unlawful except on individual written assignments, not irrevocable for more than one year.

STRIKES, BOYCOTTS, PICKETING

Under Norris-LaGuardia Act, only fraud or violence could be enjoined.
Limited in effect by NLRB decisions permitting discharge for violation of contract or for violence and other misbehavior in strikes.	Same.

No specific limitations in Wagner Act.	Certain types and methods are unfair labor practices, and subject to injunction and suit for damages: Restraint or coercion of employees. Sympathetic strikes or boycotts. Strikes or boycotts against non-union products or producers. Strikes or boycotts to force recognition by any other employer unless union is certified. Strikes or boycotts against certified union.
Coercion against certified union no defense to employer's violation of Act; courts threatened to find such union in contempt of court order to employer.
NLRB elections solved many jurisdictional disputes.	Jurisdictional strikes; decision by NLRB in absence of voluntary adjustment.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY STRIKES

No provision in Wagner Act. U. S. Conciliation Service could intervene.	Presidential appointment of board of inquiry; 80-day injunction; vote on "final offer" of each employer; discharge of injunction; report of President to Congress with any recommendations.

STRIKES BY GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

	Unlawful; subject to penalty of immediate discharge and loss of civil service status, and not eligible for re-employment by government for three years.

INJUNCTIONS AND DAMAGE SUITS

Norris-LaGuardia Act limited injunctions against unions; permitted them, with procedural safeguards, only in case of fraud or violence.	Discretionary petition for injunctions against employers or unions upon issuance of complaint of unfair labor practices.
No provisions for injunctions in Wagner Act except for temporary injunctions against employers during proceedings for enforcement of Board orders in circuit courts.	Mandatory petition for injunctions only against unions upon issuance of complaints of unlawful strikes or boycotts.
	Injunctions in national emergency strikes.

	Damage suits in federal courts for violation of contract or for unlawful strike or boycott, permitted without respect to amount in controversy or citizenship.
Under Norris-LaGuardia, union is held responsible only for acts actually participated in or authorized or ratified.	Union responsible for acts of its agents whether or not the specific acts were actually authorized or ratified; "Agency" broadly defined.

WELFARE FUNDS

	Payments by employers to such union funds unlawful except under specified conditions: for purposes specified by law. employers represented in administration of trust fund. pension funds segregated in separate trust.

CONCILIATION AND MEDIATION

Not within scope of Wagner Act; U. S. Conciliation Service in Department of Labor.	Independent Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. Duty of unions and employers to give 30-day notice to the Service when agreement not reached in dispute over termination or modification of contract. Secret ballot on employer's last offer as one voluntary means of settlement.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES

	Prohibits any corporation or labor organization from making any contribution or expenditure in connection with national election or primary.

REMEDIES AND PENALTIES

Cease and desist orders by NLRB against employers, enforced by courts.	Same, against employers and unions.
Dis-establishment of company-dominated unions.	Same.
Withdrawal of recognition from illegally recognized unions.	Same.

Reinstatement and back pay for victims of illegal discrimination.	Same, and back pay from union for victims of discrimination caused by unions.
Orders to bargain.	Same, against employers and unions.
Posting of notice of compliance.	Same, by employers and unions.
Contempt action for violation of court orders enforcing NLRB orders.	Same, against employers and unions.
	Injunction in district court against employer or union when complaint issued, at discretion of NLRB General Counsel. Contempt action for violation.

BEFORE THE WISCONSIN EMPLOYMENT RELATIONS BOARD

In the Matter of the Petition of G. S. HAGEN For a Referendum on the Question of an All-Union Agreement Between THE WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Employer and THE COMMERCIAL TELEGRAPHERS' UNION, A.F.L., Union	Case III No. 4602 R-1987 Decision No. 3661

Appearances:

Mr. G. S. Hagen, Petitioner, appearing for himself.
Mr. Robert A. Levett, Assistant General Attorney, and Mr. George J. Marcipan, Division Manager Employee Relations, for The Western Union Telegraph Company.
Mr. Samuel H. Jaffee, Attorney, for The Commercial Telegraphers' Union, A.F.L.

DIRECTION OF REFERENDUM

On November 12, 1952, G.S. Hagen, an employe of The Western Union Telegraph Company at Antigo, Wisconsin, filed a petition with this Board, pursuant to the provisions of Section 111.06 (1) (c) of the Wisconsin Statutes, requesting that a new referendum be conducted among the employes of said Employer on the ground that a change had occurred in the attitude of the employes concerned toward the union security agreement in effect between The Western Union Telegraph Company and the Commercial Telegraphers' Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, which agreement had been authorized in a prior referendum conducted by the Board on February 5, 1952; and a hearing on such petition having been conducted at the Board's office at Madison, Wisconsin, on December 10, 1952, all members of the Board being present; and the Board having considered the record and arguments of the parties, and having concluded that there is reasonable ground for believing that since the prior referendum a change has occurred in the attitude of the employes of The Western Union Telegraph Company toward the present union security agreement in effect between the Employer and the Union;

NOW, THEREFORE, it is DIRECTED

That a referendum by secret ballot be conducted under the direction of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board within sixty (60) days from the date of this Directive, among all Wisconsin employes of the Western Union Telegraph Company, who are included in the collective bargaining unit defined by the National Labor Relations Board in Case No. 17-R-742, and who were employed by the Employer on January 11, 1954, except such employes as may prior to the referendum quit their employment or be discharged for cause, for the purpose of determining whether or not the required number of such employes favor an "All-Union Agreement" between The Western Union Telegraph Company and the Commercial Telegraphers' Union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Case III
No. 4602 R-1987
Decision No. 3661

MEMORANDUM ACCOMPANYING DIRECTION OF REFERENDUM

On February 5, 1952, this Board conducted a mail ballot referendum among the Wisconsin employes of the Employer. On February 11, 1952, the Board issued its certification reflecting that out of an eligible list of 475 voters, 391 cast ballots, that 335 employes favored an "All-Union Agreement" with the Union, and that 56 employes were opposed. On November 10, 1952, George S. Hagen, an employe at the Antigo, Wisconsin office of the Employer and a member of Local 206 of the Union, filed a petition with this Board, requesting that a new referendum be conducted on the ground that since the prior referendum a change of attitude among the employes had occurred concerning the union security agreement. The petition as filed set forth that the grounds, therefore, were based on Sections 111.05, 111.05 (4), 111.06 (1) (c), 111.07, 111.08 and 343.682 of the Wisconsin Statutes. The Board has concluded from the facts contained in the petition and from the record presented at the hearing that the proceeding constituted a petition for a new referendum as outlined in Section 111.06 (1) (c) of the Wisconsin Statutes, and that it did not constitute a proceeding for the annulment of an existing union security agreement. The pertinent provisions of the Statute are quoted below:

> ". . . . . .Such authorization of an all-union agreement shall be deemed to continue thereafter, subject to the right of either party to the all-union agreement to request the board in writing to conduct a new referendum on the subject. Upon receipt of such request by either party to the agreement, the Board shall determine whether there is reasonable ground to believe that there exists a change in the attitude of the employes concerned toward the all-union agreement since the prior referendum and upon so finding the board shall conduct a new referendum. If the continuance of the all-union agreement is supported on any such referendum by a vote at least equal to that hereinabove provided for its initial authorization, it may be continued in force and effect thereafter, subject to the right to request a further vote by the procedure hereinabove set forth. If the continuance of the all-union agreement is not thus supported on any such referendum, it shall be deemed terminated at the termination of the contract of which it is then a part or at the end of one year from the date of the announcement by the board of the result of the referendum which ever proves to be the earlier date. The board shall declare any such all-union agreement terminated whenever it finds that the labor organization involved has unreasonably refused to receive as a member any employe of such employer, and each such all-union agreement shall be made subject to this duty of the board. Any person interested may come before the board as provided in section 111.07 and ask the performance of this duty....."

At the hearing, the following facts were disclosed:

1. That a general strike of Western Union employes occurred on April 31, 1952, and was terminated May 26, 1952.

2. That during the strike, a number of employes covered by the collective bargaining agreement continued their employment.

3. That the agreement negotiated by the parties following the settlement of the strike changed the previous union security clause from a union shop provision to a combination of a maintenance of membership and agency shop agreement. The union security provision as negotiated by the parties is as follows:

"3.07 (a) All existing employees who are members of the Union will retain such membership as a condition of continued employment except that they shall have a 10-day escape period to begin upon the expiration of the 7 days following the termination of the strike.

"(b) All existing employees who are not members of the Union will become members at the end of 30 days from the date hereof and remain members as a condition of continued employment unless they signify their intention not to become members within the period of time referred to in (a) above.

"(c) Those employees mentioned in subdivisions (a) and (b) above who have used the escape clause therin, and new or re-engaged employees who have not become members of the Union within thirty days of hiring or reemployment, shall, as a condition of employment or continued employment, pay or tender to the Union the periodic dues uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership, or the equivalent thereof, with the understanding that the amounts thus payable by such employees shall not exceed the amount of the dues presently charged by the applicable Union local.

"(d) The intent not to join as above provided shall, to be effective, be evidenced by written notification received by the Union with a copy to the Company both at the local level.

"(e) The Company will, on demand of the Union, discharge any employee who has failed to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fee uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership, or any employee who, not having become or remained a member, has failed to pay the periodic dues referred to above or the equivalent thereof.

"(f) If any provisions of law prevent the effectuation of any part of the Union Security clause, the parties will give consideration to making revisions herein to effect its general purpose and to conform with the appropriate provisions of applicable law."

4. That some twenty-seven employes availed themselves of the escape period provided in the Strike Settlement Agreement and terminated their membership in the union.

5. That in the Strike Settlement Agreement between the parties, a no-discrimination clause was also negotiated, which reads as follows:

   "14. Neither the Union nor the Company will find or discriminate against any employee who exercised his right either to work or to strike.

6. That shortly after the termination of the strike, Local 206 caused to be circulated among the employes of the employer in Wisconsin and upper Michigan, a list of employes who worked during the strike. The name of the petitioner headed a list of some one-hundred and thirty employes whom the union alleged worked during the strike for the employer.

7. That in October, 1952, Local 206 published in its monthly periodical, The Beacon, a copy of an Order issued by the National Executive Board of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union, known as Board Order No. 22, which reads in part as follows:

"That all members of the Western Union Division who worked for the Western Union Telegraph Company during the legally-called strike, between April 3rd and May 25th, be denied all active participation in the affairs of their respective locals, and the Western Union Division as associate members. The definition of associate membership is to be without the right to vote on any matter pertaining to the election of officers, By-laws, and all legislative matters relating to the Locals and the Western Union Division, and further be denied the right to receive the periodicals of the International, Western Union Division and Locals.

"Further moved that the action of the Board in relation to those working during the strike be made mandatory on all Locals within the Western Union Division."

8. That A.H. Cyr, Financial Secretary, of Local 206, testified that Local 206 had, on its rolls at the time of the hearing, some fifty or sixty employes classified as associate members.

9. That Hagen met and discussed the effect of Board Order No. 22 and other directives of Local 206 with fellow employes, and after concluding that a number of other employes were dissatisfied with the present union security provisions of the collective bargaining agreement in effect between the Employer and the Union, he filed this petition.

10. That a number of new employes were hired by the Employer during and since the strike who have not become members of the Union.

The union contends that the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board does not have jurisdiction over the subject matter because of the interstate nature of the employer's business. This Board is of the opinion that the Western Union Telegraph Company is engaged in interstate commerce, but it is, nevertheless, satisfied that it has jurisdiction based on the provisions of Sections 14b of the Labor Management Relations Act, as amended, and on the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of the Algoma Plywood and Veneer Company. (336 U.S. 301)

Union counsel asserts that Hagen is not the proper petitioner since he is not a party to the collective bargaining agreement, which counsel claims is a prerequisite to the right to file a petition pursuant to the Statute. An examination of the section previously cited indicates that "either party to the all-union agreement" may request the Board to conduct a new referendum. This Board has consistently followed the policy that a member of a collective bargaining unit for whose benefit a collective bargaining agreement is made, may commence an action before this Board to secure or protect his rights thereunder even though the employe is not a signator to the agreement. We are of the opinion that the same policy can be applied to the filing of a petition for a new referendum by an employe covered by a collective bargaining agreement containing a union security provision. If it were not possible for the individual employe to file a petition, so-called honeymoon contracts might be encouraged, whereby an employer and a union could conspire to maintain an all-union agreement against the wishes of the majority of the employes.

Union counsel further contends that even though Hagen is a proper petitioner, he did not file a petition, but has sought an annulment of the existing union security agreement, and not a new referendum. The Board has concluded that regardless of the form of the action sought by Hagen, the proceeding is in fact a petition for a new referendum. The record clearly indicates a change in attitude of the employes toward the union security agreement.

Union counsel further contends that an all-union agreement is not involved in this proceeding, since the union security provision of the collective bargaining agreement between the parties is an "agency shop", which lacks the compulsory provisions of an all-union agreement. The agreement between the parties requires membership in the union of some of the employes as a condition of employment. The statutory definition of an all-union agreement is as follows:

> "111.02 (9) The term"all-union agreement" shall mean an agreement between an employer and the representative of his employes in a collective bargaining unit whereby all or any of the employes in such unit are required to be members of a single labor organization."

It should be noted that the definition uses the phrase, ". . .all or any . ." of the employes. Under this broad definition, the Board is satisfied that the "agency shop" provision in the agreement falls within this definition and is applicable to this proceeding.

Union counsel finally argues that there had not been a change in the attitude of the employes towards the union security provision of the collective bargaining agreement. This argument has been clearly answered in the Findings of Fact set forth above and needs no further comment.

Counsel for the Employer in his brief raises the question of whether the form of union security provision contained in the collective bargaining agreement existing between the parties is valid. This question has been answered above. He further questioned whether or not the petition as filed by Hagen requires the Board to terminate the union security clause presently existing in the agreement. This question has also been answered. It should be interesting to note that in his brief, Counsel for the employer states.

> "The record in this case is likewise clear and supports the recent conclusion that there is a reasonable ground to believe that there has been a change in the attitude of the employes."

The collective bargaining agreement may be terminated by the parties on May 31, 1954. The Board, therefore, believes that this direction is made at an appropriate time since the statute provides that if a union security agreement is not supported by a new referendum that the union security provision shall be terminated at the termination of the contract.

The results of the new referendum indicating the wishes of the employes with regard to an all-union agreement will be known prior to the possible termination of the present agreement. This knowledge will tend to stabilize negotiations at least with respect to the union security issue.

CHARLES J. WIECHERING, Complainant, vs. APPLETON PHOTO ENGRAVERS UNION #77, a unit of INTERNATIONAL PHOTO ENGRAVERS UNION OF NORTH AMERICA, commonly known as I.P.E.U.; and ROBERT G. PAGEL, Respondents.	Case I No. 5864 Cw-231 Decision No. 4187-A

Appearances:
Bouch, Hilton, Dempsey and Magnusen, by Mr. Ray C. Dempsey, for the Complainant.
Mr. Sydney R. Mertz, for the Respondent.

FINDINGS OF FACT, CONCLUSIONS OF LAW, AND ORDER

The above entitled matter having come on for hearing before the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board in the City Hall, Menasha, Wisconsin, on the 4th day of April, 1956, at 10:00 A.M. before Chairman L.E. Gooding; and the Board having considered the evidence and arguments of counsel, and being fully advised in the premises, makes and files the following Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Order.

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. That the Complainant, Charles J. Wiechering, is an individual residing at 380 Hickory Lane, Oshkosh, Wisconsin.

2. That the Respondent, Appleton Photo Engravers Union, Local 77, is a labor organization representing employes of various employers in the Fox River Valley, engaged in the engraving business and is affiliated with the International Photo Engravers Union of North America, commonly known as I.P.E.U. with its post office address at P. O. Box 22, Menasha, Wisconsin.

3. That the Respondent, Robert G. Pagel, is an employe of the Marathon Corporation at Menasha, Wisconsin, and since January, 1955, has been the Secretary of the Respondent Local 77, his address being P.O. Box 22, Menasha, Wisconsin.

4. That the Respondent Local 77 has engaged in collective bargaining with employers in the photo engraving business in the Fox River Valley section of the State of Wisconsin for a number of years including the Marathon Corporation, Menasha, Wisconsin; that said agreements have contained union security provisions requiring union membership as a condition of employment; that the collective bargaining agreement existing between Local 77 and Marathon Corporation which has been in full force and effect at all times material herein contains among others the following provisions:

ARTICLE III
EMPLOYMENT

"Section 1. A "Union Shop" status in accordance with section 8 (3) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, is recongnized and granted by the Employer, a party hereto.

"Section 2. The Employers agree to notify the Union when there is a vacancy or need for extra help, and the Union agrees to furnish competent and reliable members of its organization as applicants whenever available and such notice is geven by the employer.

"Section 3. Unless "otherwise mutually agreed" by both parties hereto, only persons with a minimum of six years' practical experience at one or more branches of photoengraving or kindred process shall be considered or classified as journeymen.

ROTO-GRAVURE
Rider Clause

"Section 1. This rider applies to all roto-gravure shops under the jurisdiction of the Appleton Photo-Engravers' Union No. 77, and is in addition to all other provisions as set forth in the regular Photo-Engraving and Roto-gravure Agreement.

"Section 2. This process of gravure and its attendant work thereto is defined as being and is all parts of the gravure process pertaining to the production of gravure from the "copy", original or subject, up to the finished product, and shall be performed under the terms of this agreement. The following branches recognized are: 1. Photographers 2. Photocomposers 3. Etchers-Re-etchers-Stagers 4. Sensitizers-Printer and Transfer 5. Retoucher-Layout, 6. Cylinder Grinder, Polishers, Platers-Depositors 7. Finishers

"Section 4. Photo-Engraver journeymen upon entering Roto-gravure and Roto-gravure journeymen upon entering the Henderson process shall be required to serve a 600 hour probationary period...

"Section 6. The company agrees to notify the Union when there is a vacancy or a need for extra help, and the Union agrees to furnish competent and reliable members of its organization as applicants whenever available and such notice is given by the company. The employer shall have the right to secure the necessary skilled and experienced workmen from a kindred trade. Such men entering Roto-gravure from kindred trades shall have a minimum of six years experience. They shall serve a probationary period of sixty (60) days, during which time they will work on permit at Photo-Engravers' scale. At the termination of that period, the Chapel Chairman shall present to the Union a recommendation signed by at least three (3) journeymen members of the specific branch under consideration. In the case of men entering Rotogravure, they shall be paid under the conditions set forth in the Roto-gravure Rider Clause and shall not be given credit for the sixty (60) day probationary period. However, in the best interests of the Union and of Management the Union reserves the right to investigate the qualifications of these men and their adaptability to Roto-gravure.

"Section 8. It is recognized by the parties hereto that journeymen in the Engraving and Roto Departments are interchangeable between departments."

5. That Marathon Corporation is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Labor Management Relations Act; that on August 21, 1948, this Board certified the results of a referendum in a bargaining unit consisting of employes doing photo engraving work and divisions therof, employed by five employers including the Marathon Corporation, which authorized said employers to enter into an "All-Union Agreement" with Local 77.

6. That in 1920 Wiechering became employed in the photo engraving trade as an apprentice, and after completing a five year training period as an apprentice, Wiechering continued working in the trade as a journeyman until 1938, and as a journeyman and office manager until sometime in 1942; that from 1920 through 1942, Wiechering at no time was a member of Local 77 or any other local affiliated with the International Photo Engravers Union of North America; that from 1942 to the summer of 1954 Wiechering was employed in endeavors not connected with the photo engraving trade; that in the summer of 1954, at the suggestion of the Business Agent of Local 77, Wiechering sought a position as a photo-engraver with the Marathon Corporation; that on that occasion, Arch Dixon, Engraving Plant Manager, Informed Wiechering that no openings were available at the time and that if Wiechering should obtain several months experience elsewhere his application would be reconsidered.

7. That thereafter Wiechering consulted the Business Agent of Milwaukee Photo Engravers Union, Local 19, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, who arranged for his employment at the Mueller Engraving Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on a permit basis; and that Wiechering continued in the employment of said company for a period of two months when he was replaced by a union member of Local 19, who had been laid-off at another engraving plant.

8. That upon leaving the employ of the Mueller Engraving Company, Julius T. Mueller, a journeyman copper etcher and president of the firm, gave Wiechering a letter recommending that Wiechering had proved himself to be a craftsman of the highest quality in performing copper halftone and combination work.

9. That on November 4, 1954, upon submission of the above recommendation, Wiechering was hired by Dixon on behalf of the Marathon Corporation as a roto stager, a division of photo engraving work and was employed in a department of four persons doing similar work; that Dixon immediately notified the officers of Local 77 of Wiechering's employment and that said officers orally "cleared" his employment on a 90 day permit basis.

10. That on November 18, 1954, after previously obtaining a blank application for membership in Local 77, which application in addition to requiring the signature of the applicant, also required the signatures of three journeymen attesting to the qualifications of the applicant, Wiechering returned his application, signed by him and one journeyman to the secretary of Local 77, who advised Wiechering that "no signatures were required on the application"; that Local 77 took no further action on the application nor was Wiechering advised, at any time, that his application was incomplete; that on February 24, 1955, Ray Hoelzel, President of Local 77, orally notified Dixon that Wiechering's work permit had expired on February 22, 1955; that then Dixon wrote to Hoelzel on February 25, 1955, requesting the Local 77 to advise him in writing as to Wiechering's status as an employe under the existing labor agreement; that on February 28, 1955, Hoelzel replied in writing to Dixon in part as follows:

> "Mr. Wiechering's work permit expired February 21 st and was not renewed. Thus he has no recognized status with the Appleton Photo Engravers Union. Mr. Wiechering is now an employee of Marathon Corporation and is entitled to whatever consideration they can provide for him. To the best of my knowledge no provision is allowed in the current labor agreement to cover a situation of this type."

11. That during the months of January, February and March, 1955, Wiechering's fellow employes, all members of Local 77, held back work assignments from Wiechering, that on April 16, 1955, a meeting was held in Dixon's office between Mr. Connell, International President of the I.P.E.U., Dixon and Wiechering, at which time Wiechering was told that he had too much initiative to work at Marathon Corporation, but that his work permit was being orally extended for 90 days to expire on July 21, 1955; that on the same day Connell called Together the remaining employes in the department, all members of Local 77, and told them to forget their differences and to work with Wiechering on a congenial basis; and that on the same day, Hoelzel posted the following notice on the bulletin board:

"NOTICE"

> To all members of Appleton Photo Engravers Union:
> Mr. Charles Wiechering, currently employed in the roto etching department of Marathon Corporation is entitled legaly to retain his position.
> The Union expects and desires all members to cooperate with Mr. Wiechering. No one is to interfere with his carrying out the duties assigned to him in the course of his employment."

12. That on May 16, 1955, Wiechering satisfactorily completed the 600 hours probationary period as a roto stager, and then received the full journeyman wage scale under the terms of the Collective Bargaining Agreement; that Wiechering's job performance was up to the standards required by the Marathon Corporation and expected of a journeyman.

13. That during the month of May, 1955, Wiechering asked Pagel, the secretary of Local 77, whether he should file another application for membership; that Pagel advised him not to do so, but he later gave Wiechering another application blank; that Wiechering although he attempted to do so, was unable to obtain the signatures of three members of the Local 77 certifying to his competency as a workman in the journeymen branch of membership, for which he had applied.

14. That on July 21. 1955, the expiration date of Wiechering's oral work permit, Dixon wrote Wiechering notifying him that he was being laid off as of Friday, July 22, 1955 because of a seasonal slack period and the desire of the company to cut down on plant over-head; that however on that occasion Dixon orally advised Wiechering that, "due to the fact that the union was going to start discriminatory action again he would have to leave me go because Marathon wouldn't stand for any more of it"; that at the time of Wiechering's layoff work was available for Wiechering as a copper etcher.

15. That after the lay-off notice Dixon changed Wiechering's application for union membership from the work classification of roto stager to copper etcher because he believed Wiechering could more readily obtain employment in that classification; that Dixon then signed Wiechering's application in his capacity as a member of the local union and also obtained the signatures of supervisor Kerr and another employe of the department who were members of the local union.

16. That said application was then submitted to Secretary Pagel who wrote Wiechering on July 23, 1955, after conferring with officers of the International Union, to the effect that even if Local 77 did accept and act upon his application for membership, Local 77 would be unable to grant Wiechering a traveling card for a period of six months after the approval of his application and that the earliest date that the Local 77 could consider his application would be at the next regular meeting on September 19, 1955; and that Pagel further advised Wiechering that he should contact the secretary of any local in which a copper etcher job was open and that upon securing employment the local having jurisdiction would then be able to act upon his application for membership.

17. That subsequently, after his lay-off, Wiechering was advised by officers of Milwaukee Local 19 of the I.P.E.U., that he would first have to obtain a membership in Local 77 and a traveling card before Local 19 would approve of his employment in their jurisdiction.

18. That on September 22, 1955, Pagel wrote Wiechering informing him that Local 77 on September 19, 1955 had rejected and was returning his membership application because he was not presently employed in Local 77 and again suggested that Wiechering seek employment in the jurisdiction of a local having an opening in his branch of the trade.

Upon the basis of the above and foregoing Findings of Fact, the Board makes the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. That the officers, agents and members of Respondent Local 77 and Respondent Robert G. Pagel have unreasonably denied Charles J. Wiechering's membership in Local Union 77 within the meaning of Section 111.06 (1) (c) 1. of the Wisconsin Statutes.

2. That by their discriminatory actions against Charles J. Wiechering, the officers, agents and members of Respondent Local 77 and Respondent Robert G. Pagel have induced Marathon Corporation to discharge him and interfered with his rights as guaranteed in Section 111.04 and have committed an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 111.06 (2) (b) of the Wisconsin Statutes.

Upon the basis of the above and foregoing Findings of Fact, and Conclusions of Law, the Board makes the following

ORDER

1. That the "All-Union Agreement" existing between Appleton Photo Engravers Union, Local 77 and Marathon Corporation is set aside effective twenty (20) days from the date of this Order unless in the interim Appleton Photo Engravers Union, Local 77 accepts Complainant Wiechering as a regular and bonafide journeyman member in any division of the trade in Local 77 and the International Union upon payment of current monthly dues and the regular initiation fee, if any.

2. That Appleton Photo Engravers Union, Local 77 affiliated with the International Photo Engravers Union of North America, its officers, agents and members, including

Robert G. Pagel shall:

(a) Immediately cease and desist from:

(1) Causing or attempting to cause the Marathon Corporation, Menasha, Wisconsin, or any other employer within the jurisdiction of Local 77, to discriminate against or refuse to hire Charles J. Wiechering because of his nonmembership in said Local 77, or in any other manner cause or attempt to cause the Marathon Corporation, or any other employer within the jurisdiction of Local 77, to discriminate against Charles J. Wiechering.

(b) Take the following affirmative action which the Board finds will effectuate the policies of the Act:

(1) Immediately notify Charles J. Wiechering and the Marathon Corporation, in writing, that they have no objection to the immediate reinstatement of Charles J. Wiechering to his former or substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges with the Marathon Corporation.

(2) Immediately notify, in writing, all other employers within the jurisdiction of Local 77, that they have no objection to the employment of Charles J. Wiechering as a journeyman photo engraver in any division of said trade.

(3) Immediately notify Milwaukee Photo Engravers Union , Local 19, affiliated with the International Photo Engravers Union of North America and the International Photo Engravers Union of North America, in writing, that they have no objection to the employment of Charles J. Wiechering as a journeyman photo engraver in any division of the trade.

(4) Post in conspicuous places in its office at Menasha, Wisconsin, and such other places as notices to its members are customarily posted, copies of the notice attached hereto marked Appendix "A", copies of such notice shall be prepared by Appleton Photo Engravers Union Local 77, signed by an officer and also by Robert G. Pagel, and posted immediately upon receipt thereof and be maintained by it for a period not less than sixty (60) consecutive days thereafter. Reasonable steps shall be taken by it to be sure that said notices are not altered, defaced or covered by any other material.

(5) Immediately forward a copy of the executed notice to Marathon Corporation at Menasha, Wisconsin for posting, the company willing, at places where notices to employes are usually posted.

(6) Notify the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board in writing within 21 days of the receipt of a copy of this Order what steps have been taken to comply therewith.

Given under our hands and seal at the City of Madison, Wisconsin, this 9th day of November, 1956.

MEMORANDUM ACCOMPANYING
FINDINGS OF FACT, CONCLUSIONS OF LAW AND ORDER

Counsel for Local 77 argues that this Board has no jurisdiction over the issue presented here because the controversy is preempted by the Labor Management Relations Act which vests exclusive jurisdiction in the National Labor Relations Board. Counsel has moved the Board to dismiss the proceeding on this ground and oral argument on said motion was had before the Board at Madison, Wisconsin, on February 16, 1956. The Board denied said motion in a formal order dated April 4, 1956, and Counsel renewed his motion at the hearing on the merits and Chairman Gooding again denied said motion. The Board's assertion of jurisdiction over this question is based upon Section 14 (b) of the Labor Management Relations Act, as amended, and on the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Algoma Plywood & Veneer Co., vs. the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board (336 U.S. 301). We are confident that what the state can prohibit it can also regulate and since Wisconsin regulates the conditions under which union security agreements may be exected by requiring a referendum it can also by the authority of its statutes set aside such "All-Union Agreement" when it finds that said agreement has been unreasonably applied.

Counsel further argues that the Complainant Wiechering is barred from bringing this action because the constitution and general laws of the Photo Engravers Union requires members to exhaust all remedies under the constitution and general laws before taking his case to the "Civil Courts" and that Wiechering had not exhausted such remedies. This Board is not opposed to parties to a labor controversy exhausting remedies for settlement of grievances that may be available to them prior to bringing an action before this Board, but the record discloses that Wiechering was not a member of the Union and thus could not avail himself of the privilege of pursuing his grievance under the laws and constitution of the Union. Assuming for the sake of argument that Wiechering was a member, a consideration of the record of this case convinces us of the utter futility and complete unrealism of the argument as applied to the Complainant in view of the treatment Wiechering has received from Local 77 and International Union.

Counsel for the union also argues that numerous cases decided under the National Labor Relations Act have determined that a labor organization may establish its own rules for membership and that this agency cannot prescribe what rules Local 77 shall use for the acceptance of members in its organization. The effect of our Order is not to prescribe the rules for union membership but does say that when such rules are applied in a manner as to unreasonably deny membership and thus cause the loss of employment in a circumstance where union membership is required as a condition of employment, this Board will exercise its authority to set aside the union security provision which requires union membership as a condition of employment.

In making this Order, this Board is not desirous of upsetting the collective bargaining relationship requiring union membership as a condition of employment which exists at the Marathon Corporation and has endured over a long period of time. Therefore, we have issued our Order in an alternative which would permit the continuance of the "All-Union Agreement", provided the Respondents take prompt steps to remedy the gross injustice which has been caused the Complainant. Certainly the great powers and privileges possessed by Local 77 and the International Union, which amount as a practical matter to complete control of employment in the photo engraving industry, requires that Local 77, the International Union and the employers concerned administer their collective bargaining agreements in a fair and non-discriminatory manner with respect to all persons qualified to perform work in the photo engraving industry.

We cannot make the Complainant whole for the wages he has lost as the result of discrimination he has suffered at the hands of Local 77 and with the consent, no matter how reluctant, of the Marathon Corporation, since our statutes afford no such relief when labor organizations have wrongfully caused loss of employment under union security agreements where there has been no complaint filed against the employer.

UNION REPORTING REQUIREMENTS IN STATE LAWS

Requirements for Reporting Organizational Data or Financial Statements to State Officials or to the Membership

September 1958

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR
James P. Mitchell, Secretary
Bureau of Labor Standards
Arthur W. Motley, Director
Washington, D. C.

The Bureau of Labor Standards is issuing this summary of State laws that require unions to file organizational data or financial statements, for use in answering requests for such information. The laws have been analyzed and the bulletin prepared by the Bureau's Division of State Services. The Bureau wishes to express appreciation for the generous assistance given by State officials in reviewing this material.

UNION REPORTING REQUIREMENTS IN STATE LAWS

Requirements for Reporting Organizational Data or Financial Statements to State Officials or to the Membership

Eleven States (Alabama, Connecticut, Florida, Kansas, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Utah, and Wisconsin) and Hawaii have enacted laws that require unions to file organizational data or financial statements, or both, with a State official, or to make available to members certain financial information. In most of these jurisdictions the unions are subject to only one or two of these requirements. In fact, only three of them 1/ have all three requirements in their laws; four others 2/ have two, and the remaining five 3/ only one.

As the attached chart shows, the earliest of these laws was that of Utah, passed in 1937, the latest, Connecticut in 1957. One was enacted in 1938, one in 1939, six in 1943, one in 1945, and one in 1946. No legislation of this type has so far been enacted in the 1958 legislative sessions.

Some of the acts also include provisions relating to other internal activities of the union, such as the method and time of election of union officers or limitations on the amount of fees and dues which may be charged. An analysis of these types of provisions is not included in this summary.

Unions Covered

Most of these twelve laws cover all labor unions. However, the Alabama and Minnesota laws specifically exclude unions subject to the Railway Labor Act and the Connecticut law exempts unions with less than 25 members.

Two others, as well as Alabama, exempt certain unions from one requirement only - i.e., that of filing financial reports with a State agency. In Alabama and Kansas only unions with 25 or more members, and in Massachusetts only unions with more than 50 members, are required to file financial reports, but all unions must comply with other provisions of these laws.

Organizational Data[4/]

In seven States (Alabama, Connecticut, Florida, Kansas, Massachusetts, Texas, and Utah) and Hawaii the laws require labor unions to file organizational information with a State official. Reports are required on such items as name of union, locations of union offices, names and addresses of local officers, and names and addresses of organizations with which the union is affiliated. Under some of the laws, the union must report other information, such as scale of dues, initiation fees, fines, assessments, and aims and objects of the union. In addition, unions in four of these States (Alabama, Connecticut, Kansas, and Texas) must file copies of their constitutions and by-laws, either annually or before operating in the State. In three of these four (all but Connecticut) changes or amendments must be reported within a specified period after adoption.

Financial Statements

a. Reports to State Officials

The laws of six of the 12 jurisdictions (Alabama, Connecticut, Kansas, Massachusetts, South Dakota, and Texas) require unions to file reports regarding their financial activities with a State official. As indicated in the chart, the financial items required to be reported vary with each law from merely a report of property owned to a complete financial statement. In general, reports must show all receipts, including income from dues, fees, fines, and other sources, all disbursements and the purposes therefor, a record of property owned, and amounts of salaries, wages, bonuses, and other remuneration paid officers and business agents. One law, that of Massachusetts, expressly provides that if the union is required to file a statement with the U. S. Department of Labor, a duplicate of that statement will meet this requirement.

In most cases the financial statement must be verified by a union official under oath. In Connecticut it must also be audited by a certified public accountant.

b. Reports to Membership

Five of the 12 laws (Alabama, Connecticut, Hawaii, Minnesota, and Wisconsin) provide that unions msut make information on their financial activities available to the membership. Alabama and Connecticut, two of the six States which require unions to file financial reports with a State official, provide that the same report be made available to the membership. Alabama requires that a copy of the report be filed with each member, while Connecticut requires that copies must be furnished to the membership at a union meeting and must be available at the union office for inspection. Hawaii, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, while not requiring financial statements to be filed with a State official, do require unions to furnish financial statements to each member.

The remaining seven States do not require unions to provide their membership with statements regarding their financial actions. The laws in Florida, Oregon, and Texas, however, require unions to keep accounts itemizing receipts and expenditures and their purposes, and also expressly provide that members are entitled to inspect such records at all reasonable times. In Texas the records are also open to inspection by enforcement officials and grand juries. In Kansas and Massachusetts, while the laws do not require unions to furnish information directly to their members, it would in fact be available to them, since the reports on file with a State official are open to the public. The South Dakota law is silent on this point, while the Utah law has no requirement as to a financial statement.

Public Disclosure

Of the nine jurisdictions which require unions to file either organizational data or reports of financial activities, or both, with a State official, only Kansas and Massachusetts specifically provide that such records be open to the public.

Of the other seven, the Connecticut law provides specifically that reports are not open to the public, but that a member may examine his own union's report. (Such report must also be available at the union office for inspection.) The Alabama law provides that the report shall be available to the Governor for inspection. The Texas law provides that reports shall be available only to the Secretary of State, the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, the Attorney General, and to grand juries and judicial and quasi-judicial inquiries in legal proceedings. The Hawaii, Florida, South Dakota, and Utah laws are silent on this point.

State Official with Whom Reports Must be Filed

Of the nine laws which require reports and information to be submitted to a State official, five (Connecticut, Florida, Kansas, South Dakota, and Texas) provide that the material be sent to the Secretary of State. Four laws require it to be submitted to labor agencies: In Alabama, the material must be submitted to the Director of Labor; in Hawaii to the Employment Relations Board; in Massachusetts to the Commissioner of Labor and Industries; and in Utah to the Industrial Commission.

Three of the laws require a fee for filing union reports. The fee is $2.00 in Alabama and Kansas and $1.00 in Florida. One other State, Connecticut, reported that the Attorney General has ruled that the law requiring a $2.00 fee for filing certain documents with the Secretary of State applies to the filing of financial reports by unions.

1/ Alabama, Connecticut, Texas

2/ Hawaii, Kansas, Massachusetts, Florida

3/ Minnesota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Wisconsin

4/ The law of Puerto Rico requires labor organizations, as well as employer associations, to file with the Puerto Rico Labor Relations Board their official name and post office address. Since no organizational or financial matter is required to be filed, Puerto Rico is not included in this bulletin.

FOOTNOTES:

1/ Some of these laws also include provisions regulating other internal union activities, such as procedure for election of officers and limitations on dues or fees, which are not included in this chart.

2/ In Hill v. State of Florida, 325 U.S. 543 (1944) the U. S. Supreme Court recognized the validity of the reporting requirements of the Florida statute. The principle established by this decision is, of course, equally applicable to other such State laws. A majority of the Court, however, raised doubt as to the validity of State sanctions for failure to comply. The State of Florida had enjoined a union from functioning until the required reports were filed. A majority of the U. S. Supreme Court held that a State could not do this because it would be a direct impediment to the full freedom to exercise the right to collective bargaining guaranteed by Federal law, i.e., the National Labor Relations Act. The majority opinion indicated, although the Court did not decide, that imposition by a State of a criminal penalty for failure to file the required reports might be as invalid as an injunction. Following the Hill decision, the Attorney General of Florida rules that all labor organizations in Florida are required to comply with the reporting requirements, and that upon failure to comply they "cannot be enjoined from functioning solely with respect to collective bargaining under the National Labor Relations Act; but as to all other functions and activities of a labor organization, the provisions of said section 6 are valid and enforceable."

3/ Another section [Sec. 3(d)] requiring a complete financial statement was held invalid as imposing upon unions undue burdens which are not demanded by the public interest and are not essential to enforcement of the valid provisions of the Texas Union Control Law. American Federation of Labor v. Mann, Civ. App. 188 S.W. 2d 276.

LEGAL STATUS OF UNION SECURITY CLAUSES IN WISCONSIN

1. The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947 prohibits a CLOSED SHOP clause.

> "Sec. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8 (a)(3)."

2. The Labor-Management Relations Act permits a UNION SHOP or MAINTENANCE of MEMBERSHIP clause

> "Sec. 8 (a)(3)...nothing in this Act...shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization...to require as a condition of employment membership therein on or after the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment..."

PROVIDED THAT:

A. "...such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a), in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made."
- Section 8 (a)(3) -

B. "Nothing in this Act shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State...in which such execution or application is prohibited by State...law."
- Section 14 (b) -

Thus, under the Taft-Hartley Act a union shop clause is permissible when it is negotiated by the designated or selected representative of a majority of the employees in a collective bargaining unit UNLESS it is explicitly prohibited by state law. Does Wisconsin law at present prohibit a union shop clause in collective bargaining agreements?

3. The Wisconsin Employment Peace Act, 1939 permits a UNION SHOP or MAINTENANCE of MEMBERSHIP clause.

> "Chapter 111.06 (1)(c)1....an employer shall not be prohibited from entering into an all-union agreement (an agreement...whereby all or any of the employees in such unit are required to be members of a single labor organization) with the representatives of his employes in a collective bargaining unit..."

PROVIDED THAT:

> A. "...at least two-thirds of such employes voting (provided such two-thirds of such employes also constitute at least a majority of the employes in such collective bargaining unit) shall have voted affirmatively by secret ballot in favor of such all-union agreement in a referendum conducted by the board...
> B. "The board shall declare any such all-union agreement terminated whenever it finds that the labor organization involved has unreasonably refused to receive as a member any employe of such employer."

THUS, IN WISCONSIN, IF THE REFERENDUM REQUIREMENT IS MET SUCCESSFULLY, A UNION MAY NEGOTIATE FOR INCLUSION IN ITS COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENT A UNION SHOP OR MAINTENANCE OF MEMBERSHIP CLAUSE.

4. In the administration of a UNION SHOP clause the Labor-Management Relations Act provides that:

> "Sec. 8 (a)(3)...No employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization...if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership."

5. The Labor-Management Relations Act further provides that:

> "Sec. 9 (a) Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by > the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the EXCLUSIVE representatives of ALL employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment..."

This means that a union, even in the absence of a Union Shop clause, must "represent non-union members of the (unit) without hostile discrimination, fairly, impartially, and in good faith." The National Labor Relations Board in the Hughes Tool Company Case, 104 NLRB 318 (1953), ruled that:

> "The duty of equal representation...is inherent in the exclusive representative status accorded by the statute...We...find that... Section 9 (a)...gives rise to a duty by labor organizations, as the exclusive representative in grievance proceedings, impartially and without discrimination to accept and process all grievances placed in its hands by the employees it represents" regardless of their union membership or not.

2. Special Committees: limited, short term responsibilities.

   a. Assignment of responsibility must be specific.
   b. May study, plan, recommend, report, or execute, or any combination of these duties.
   c. Should be discharged after execution of responsibilities.

3. All committee work should receive recognition.

   a. By the committee chairman.
   b. By the local officers and the membership.

D. Hazards

1. When committees are not active, they are worse than nothing; they breed frustration and disillusionment.

2. Too much may be referred to committees; the membership also has responsibilities and should be involved in all activities possible.

3. Government of the union by committee must be avoided.

4. When the need for action is pressing, committee activity may result in dangerous delays; principle of purpose must be balanced against principle of process.

E. Why some committees fail

Knowledge
Purpose
Process Direction
Challenge

1. No clear mission.
2. Lack of information.
   a. Assign individual study and planning responsibilities.
   b. Use of sub-committee.
   c. Make use of outside experts.
3. Inadequate leadership.
   a. Uninformed on conduct, procedure, resources, purpose.
   b. Unguided, lack of direction.
   c. Vice-president to have responsibilities here?
4. No pressures from officers or members to deliver the goods.

F. Committee reports: see mimeographed materials.

G. Integration and coordination of committee work in union's total program.

Integration
Group Mind
Challenge

1. Should committee chairman be a part of executive board meetings?
2. Should there be annual (semi-annual, quarterly) meetings of all committees together with the executive board for long range planning and coordination.

STIPULATION FOR REFERENDUM

WHEREAS, _____

_____,
hereinafter referred to as the "Union", has requested the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board to conduct a referendum pursuant to Section 111.06 of the Wisconsin Statutes among the employes of _____ hereinafter referred to as the "Employer".

_____,

NOW, THEREFORE, IT IS AGREED by and between the Employer and Union named below, for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of conducting a hearing to determine the questions raised by the request for such referendum that:

1. A referendum by secret ballot shall be held pursuant to Section 111.06 of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Act to determine whether or not the required number of the eligible employes as specified in paragraph four (4) below, favor an "All-Union Agreement" between the Employer and the Union as their representative in the unit as specified in paragraph three (3) below.

2. Said referendum shall be conducted under the supervision of the Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, and shall be held pursuant to the Wisconsin Employment Relations Act, and to such rules and regulations as the Board may prescribe. The referendum shall be conducted at a time and place to be determined by the Board.

3. The unit for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be as follows:

4. The employes eligible to vote shall be the following:

All employes of the Employer who are included in the unit described in paragraph three (3) above, and whose names are included in the list marked "Exhibit A" which is attached hereto and made a part of this Stipulation, shall be eligible to vote.

The parties to this Stipulation certify that the employes named in the attached "Exhibit A" constitute all of the employes of the Employer in the bargaining unit described in paragraph three (3) above.

MEMORANDUM

To: Delegates to Southern Labor School

From: Emory F. Via Labor Consultant

Enclosed are the two pamphlets which we discussed in class at the recent Southern Labor School. The pamphlets are "Sense and Nonsense About Race" and "Prejudiced - How Do People Get That Way?" Each pamphlet is by an expert in his field. The first summarizes what is known about race in terms of anthropology, biology, and psychology. It is scientifically reliable. The second pamphlet deals with the psychology of prejudice, what prejudice does to individuals, and how it affects human relations.

You will remember that we thought these materials would be useful: (1) in supplying factual information; (2) in providing a basis for understanding others in their racial attitudes; (3) in aiding us in our understanding of ourselves; (4) in supplying information useful in refuting the exaggerated and often hot-headed claims of those who engage in race baiting; (5) in providing a guide for aiding others who wish to increase their understanding in these areas. I feel you will find some of this information valuable in all of your dealings with people - whether race is a factor or not - since it brings to light some important principles of psychology and human relations.

Let me know if there are any other materials which would be useful to you. In the meantime, I am preparing a summary of some of the suggestions of "things to do to ease racial tensions," which I will send you in the near future.

Strike Dead Line Set at Food Firm

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — The RWDSU Alabama Council is making progress toward a renewal for 175 members employed by two jointly-owned food-producing firms here, the Alaga Syrup Co. and the W. W. Pickle Co.

"The members have set a strike deadline for later this month," said State Dir. C. T. Daniel, "and we hope that we can settle the contract before then."

The only issue still outstanding is wages. The company so far has offered five cents the first year, seven the second and ten the third.

In the negotiations so far, the union members have gained a dues check-off for the first time in the eight years they have been represented by the union; improved seniority, grievance procedure, holiday and vacation provisions, and strengthened contract language.

Council Rep. Lester Bettice is heading the union's negotiators.

The pickle company sells its products under the brand name of Alabama Girl.

Tennessee Town Going 'Union' As RWDSU Drive Rolls Onward

SHELBYVILLE, Tenn.—Steadily, the RWDSU Alabama Council's organizing drive is making Shelbyville into a real union town.

While negotiations for a first agreement for 250 members at the Dixie Home Products chicken-processing plant are close to completion, the union expects to win NLRB votes early next month among 200 employees at two pencil companies.

At the Commonwealth Pencil Co., the board will hold a bargaining vote among the 85 employees Oct. 3, and it will hold a vote among the 125 employees of the Jensen Lead Co. a week later.

"We're very optimistic on the outcome of the votes," said Alabama State Dir. C. T. Daniel. "We have big majorities signed up at both plants."

Council Rep. Jack Davis, Int'l Rep. Murl Householder and Daniel are heading the drives.

Commonwealth assembles the different parts of a lead pencil—lead, wood, eraser, holder—while Jensen supplies lead, erasers and other parts to other companies.

The two campaigns began shortly after the RWDSU won NLRB elections in June among the Dixie Home employees and among employees of the Bedford County Co-op, a seed and hardware store.

In addition to the pencil companies, workers at several other plants in this city of 10,000 have asked the union for help in organizing their plants.

Meanwhile, negotiations for a first contract at Dixie Home are close to completion.

"We've got negotiating sessions set for Friday, Sept. 12 and Saturday, Sept. 13, and we're planning a meeting of the employees for Sunday, the 14th," Daniel said. "We hope to have an agreement finished by then."

He said that the union expects to win good wage increases in a two- or three-year agreement, seniority, check-off of dues, job and union security, holidays, vacations and other benefits.

The union's drive in Shelbyville began less than a year ago when Davis, who lives in Huntsville, Ala., 50 miles away, visited a relative who works at Dixie Home.

New Orleans Locals Join Alabama Council

NEW ORLEANS, La.—Two New Orleans locals, Local 389 and Local 503, have voted to join the RWDSU Alabama Council, and the Council has opened a new office here to service its new members.

Staffer Joe McCullough will be in charge of the office, which is located at 1515 South Salcedo Street. The phone number is area code 504 866-5274.

McCullough has been a member of United Dairy Employees Local 102A in Mobile, Ala., for nearly 15 years and an officer of the union for most of that time. He joined the Council staff earlier this year.

Sam Lindsey is president of Local 389 and Clifton J. Hernandez is president of '503.'

With the addition of the New Orleans members, the Council now has about 7,500 members in the states of Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama and Louisiana.

Georgia Council Petitions For Vote at Rubber Company

ATLANTA, Ga.—The Georgia RWDSU Council is continuing its successful organizing drive among workers in the Peach State with a petition to the NLRB for an election among the employees of the Hoover-Hanes Rubber Co. of Breman while it moves ahead in its drive to organize the 160 employees of the Dent Poultry Co. of Buena Vista.

At Hoover-Hanes, Rep. Herschel Holmes said that 23 workers out of 27 have joined the union, and there was no question that an election would result in the workers choosing the RWDSU.

A hearing on the union's petition is scheduled for Sept. 10, at The Record's presstime.

The campaign is being directed by Holmes with assistance from an in-shop committee consisting of Tony Patterson, Ernest Wilson and Arthur Chandler.

This is the second attempt by the Georgia Council to represent the Hoover-Hanes employees. In an NLRB election held in September 1968, the vote ended in a tie, which defeated the union.

Hoover-Hanes makes insulation for electric wiring and rubber products.

The Georgia RWDSU Council is meeting with great success in its organizing campaign among the 160 employees of the Dent Poultry Co.

Under the leadership of Council Reps. Andy Thornton and Arthur Hullam, the drive to sign up Dent workers is making excellent progress. At a first meeting with the employees Aug. 31, the union obtained 48 signed cards, while 34 more workers signed up at the second meeting Sept. 5.

Int'l Rep. Guy Dickinson said that very shortly the union will have at least 120 employees, 75 percent of the work force, in the RWDSU ranks.

The Georgia Council's first contact with Dent workers took place in July, at the time the union was engaged in a campaign at the Cagle Poultry Co. in Pine Mountain Valley. After the Council won an overwhelming victory at Cagle July 16, Thornton and Hullam were able to concentrate their efforts on the Dent Poultry drive.

The union will shortly file a petition for an election with the NLRB.

Recalls to Work Begin at Fla. Packer

DADE CITY, Fla. — The Pasco Packing Co., the largest packer of frozen citrus concentrates in the world, has recalled a substantial number of workers and by Sept. 15 will have about 450 employees back on the job.

John Hinson, president of Local 43, which represents the Pasco workers, said that other workers would be recalled in the near future, and in about six weeks the plant will be operating at full capacity.

At the peak of the season, which runs from November to June, the company employs about 1,000 people.

Pasco began laying off its force early in July, a procedure that is customary in the industry. By the middle of August, workers, principally in the maintenance departments, were being recalled.

Strike at Fairway Goes Into 2nd Month

JASPER, Ala.—The strike of 115 members of Local 1095 for substantial wage hikes in a renewal with the Fairway Manufacturing Co. is entering its second month with no immediate prospect of a settlement.

"We haven't set up any meetings with the company," said Alabama Council Org. Margaret Robbins, who is leading the strike.

All of the union members are on the picketline, and the company, a maker of golf bags, is not trying to do any work.

Before the walk-out began Aug. 19, the negotiators had reached agreement on improving the vacation schedule.

Still in dispute, in addition to wages, are holidays, jury pay, funeral leave and improved contract language.

The union negotiators include Willadene Madison, Andrew C. Kelly, Eunice Robinson, Lonnie Ford and Bea McLoughlin. The union has represented the workers for two years.

Piedmount Airlines Seeks To Hi-jack Its Pilots

GREENSBORO, N. C.—Strikebound Piedmont Airlines asked the U.S. District Court for an injunction that would compel striking pilots to return to work —flying old prop-driven planes. Commented an official of the AFL-CIO Air Line Pilots Association, "The logical next step could be an injunction requiring a group of striking truck drivers to pick up the reins and start yelling 'giddyap' to a team of percherons!"

HONOR CHUCK FOSTER: RWDSU Vice-Pres. Frank Parker (right) presents plaque honoring the late Chuck Foster, Alabama Council organizer in Gadsden for ten years, to Willie Mae Bowen, retired recording secretary of Local 506. Presentation was made at recent meeting of the Council, with Miss Bowen accepting the plaque for Mrs. Foster who was unable to attend.

'506' Asks Vote At Gadsden Firm

GADSDEN, Ala. — Local 506 has signed up a big majority of the 30 employees of Morgan Precision Co. and on Oct. 17 it petitioned the NLRB for an election.

"It looks as if we'll win without any trouble at all," said Alabama Council Org. Duane Taylor, who is heading the campaign.

The drive began when a neighbor of a Morgan employee asked Taylor about the union.

In a brief time, the local signed up nearly all the workers.

Fighting the union, the company fired one union supporter, and the union filed unfair labor practice charges.

"The NLRB is investigating and we feel sure she'll be reinstated," Taylor said.

RWDSU Marks Up Third Election Win As Tenn. Organizing Drive Keeps Rolling

SHELBYVILLE, Tenn.—The RWDSU Alabama Council won its third NLRB vote in four months in this city of 12,000 Oct. 3, when the employees of the Commonwealth Pencil Co. voted 52 to 37 to be represented by the union.

The victory raises RWDSU membership here to 400. The union bargains for nearly 300 workers at Dixie Home Products, a chicken-processor, and also at the Bedford County Co-op.

"I believe that within a year or a year and a half we can build our membership to 1,000," said Council Org. Jack Davis. "We got off to a good start and we've got a good reputation."

He said that the union has leads for drives at several other plants in Shelbyville and expects to move on them shortly.

At Commonwealth, the RWDSU has been certified and expects to start negotiations for a first agreement within a week.

"The most important items are job security and retirement benefits," Davis said. "Some of the workers have been at the plant ten or 15 years, and they have not got either."

He said that most workers earn only the $1.60 hourly Federal minimum, and have no holidays, no vacations and almost no benefits.

"We expect that we can get wage increases of 40 cents an hour," Davis said, "and other benefits."

The union's negotiators will be Christine Ray, Wyna Delffs, Hippolito Flores, Vernon Sheldon, Marie Loss, Lois Lock, Lonnie Bragg, Oliver Reed, State Dir. C. T. Daniel, Int'l Rep. Murl Householder and Davis.

The Commonwealth campaign began shortly after the Council opened its new union hall at 109 Mittwede Shopping Center. Commonwealth workers knew of the RWDSU, and began dropping around.

"This is a small town, and people hear of you," Davis said.

The company assembles the different parts—the lead, wood, eraser and holder—into a pencil.

Borden Pact Brings Pay, Holiday Gains

EAST POINT, Ga.—The RWDSU's Georgia Council has negotiated a three-year renewal for 100 employees of the Borden Co. biscuit plant here.

The contract calls for an across-the-board wage increase of 12 cents an hour each year and classification adjustments that brought additional raises of five to 25 cents an hour to more than half the employees. Workers in the maintenance department won the highest adjustment, while some other categories received nine and ten cents an hour.

There is an additional paid holiday, the employee's birthday, for a total of eight paid holidays a year; the shift premium was raised to ten cents an hour from eight cents, and grandparents were included in the bereavement clause.

The bargaining committee consisted of Ray Rollins, chairman; Sybil Campbell, Lowman Baxter, Samuel Kilpatrick, Jasper Beeman and Council Rep. Herschel Holmes.

NLRB Settlement Breaks Nursing Home Resistance

GADSDEN, Ala.—The RWDSU Alabama Council's long, hard drive to win decent wages and working conditions for employees at the Mid-South Nursing Home is drawing near to victory.

In an informal settlement reached at the NLRB, the home agreed to pay 30 union members $15,000 in back pay, reinstate them to jobs at its new building in Trussville and to bargain with the Council when it represents a majority of the workers.

There are 2,000 workers in nursing homes within 50 miles of Gadsden, and the union expects to sign up many of the workers.

"This is the first win in nursing homes around here and it was real hard to get," said Council Org. Duane Taylor. "After this, I think we can really organize."

In February, the union signed up a majority of the 30 workers at the home, then known as the Whitney Nursing Home and located in Ashville. Soon afterward the management fired nearly all the union members and they struck; the union filed NLRB unfair labor practice charges.

After 5½ months on the line, the company consented to an informal settlement in late July. It provided that the workers would be reinstated with $7,500 in back pay Aug. 1.

When the workers returned, however, the company harassed them and discriminated in favor of other workers it had hired, and the union refiled the unfair charges. Eight days later, Aug. 27, to avoid dealing with the union, Whitney closed its doors.

The closing re-opened the case, and the NLRB set a hearing on the union's charges for Oct. 16. Just as the board was to hear the charges, the company yielded and the second settlement was reached.

"We feel sure that the company will begin negotiations when we have proof of a majority," Taylor said.

During the entire campaign, Elizabeth Eggers has been chairman of the workers' committee.

"She's done an outstanding job in keeping the group together," Taylor said. "She's been the sparkplug of the group."

He also praised the late J. H. (Chuck) Foster, Council staffer, who started the drive and was killed in May while returning from the picketline to his home in Gadsden.

"This is another reason why this victory is so important to us," Taylor said.

Attorney Clarence Ray, State Dir. C. T. Daniel and Taylor represented the union members at the NLRB conferences, and Rep. Joe McCullough also took part in the drive.

The workers are nurse's aides, cooks, service and maintenance workers at the home, one of nine operated by the company in the Gadsden area.

"We hope to organize every one of them," Taylor said.

Alabama Poultry Workers Win Union Recognition

BIRMINGHAM, Ala.—After the RWDSU Alabama Council signed up an overwhelming majority of the 120 workers at the A. T. Merrill chicken-processing plant, the company has recognized the union as bargaining agent.

The recognition came at an NLRB hearing Oct. 8 on the union's petition for an election at the firm.

The union members prepared contract proposals and sent them to the company, and negotiations for the first agreement will begin Oct. 27.

The union is seeking a dues check-off, seniority, grievance procedure and arbitration, substantial wage increases, six holidays, two and three weeks of vacation, health and welfare coverage, pensions and other benefits.

"We're real strong here and we expect to make a good contract," said Int'l Rep. Henry Jenkins. "Close to 90 percent of the workers turn out for the union meetings."

The workers include production and maintenance employees and truck drivers.

The campaign began when Alabama Council Org. Jimmy Smith walked to the plant and talked to workers on their break. One day he met some on their lunch hour and said he would sign up anybody who wanted to join the union after work in the parking lot. Fifty workers joined that night, and the drive was off to a strong start.

The union requested recognition, but the company declined, and the Council petitioned for the board vote Sept. 18.

The workers earn $1.60 to $1.70 an hour and have only one week's vacation.

The company processes poultry and sells it throughout the state.

'441' Negotiates 4-Day Week

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Fifty members of Local 441 took a step into the future when they exchanged an eight-hour, five-day work week for a ten-hour, four-day week in their three-year renewal with Gregg Cookies Inc.

The change came because of religious reasons. The owners of the bakery are Seventh Day Adventists, a religious group that celebrates the Sabbath from sundown Friday to sundown Saturday, and they would not schedule any work on either day.

The workers, therefore, were working Sunday through Thursday.

Since this schedule deprived them of celebrating a day of rest, the union suggested that the bakery go on a Monday through Thursday work schedule, and the bakery agreed.

"The members like the new schedule fine," said Alabama Council Org. Jimmy Smith, who headed the negotiators.

The union members gained a five-cent an hour wage boost this year and re-openers in the second and third years of the pact, an additional holiday, and improved grievance procedure.

The agreement went into effect Aug. 23.

The union's negotiators, in addition to Smith, were Leon Patterson, Ada Robinson and Ruth Judge.

N.C. Labor Body Prepares Fight Against Sales Tax

DURHAM, N.C. (PAI)—The North Carolina AFL-CIO will take its fight against a proposed three percent sales tax, due to be voted on in November, before the membership.

State AFL-CIO President Wilbur Hobby said the AFL-CIO would hold a two-day seminar against the increase here preparatory to launching a massive educational campaign among the electorate.

U.S. COURT HOLDS ANTI-UNION FIRM IN CONTEMPT FOR PERSISTENT VIOLATIONS

Labor News - 9/4/70

ATLANTA—A company which for nine years has illegally interfered with all attempts by its employes to organize a union has been ruled guilty of civil contempt of court for ignoring two previous court orders to stop its unfair practices.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit voted to enforce findings of a special master that the Southwire Co., which makes wire cable at a plant in Carrollton, Ga., must stop defying the courts and the National Labor Relations Board.

A three-judge panel called the evidence of wrong-doing by Southwire and its president, Roy Richards, "very nearly a textbook model of union-harassment techniques."

Granting a petition by the NLRB for a contempt citation, Judges Bryan Simpson, Lewis R. Morgan and Joe M. Ingraham enforced an order directing Southwire to quit interfering with organizing attempts by its employes and the Elecrical, Radio & Machine Workers. The order is the fifth by the courts or the labor board since 1961.

The contempt petition charged that, in defeating a 1967 organizing campaign launched by the IUE and another union, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Southwire management violated rulings by the same court in 1963 and 1965.

Judge Simpson wrote the latest decision for the 5th Circuit. He pointed out that in the earlier orders the court forbade Southwire to discourage union membership by unlawfully discriminating against or discharging employes, unlawfully questioning workers, or promising them things of benefit to discourage union support. Yet the firm and Richards smashed the latest organizing efforts by committing exactly the same forbidden acts, the Court found.

Among the illegal actions of the company before the 1967 election, the court cited:

- A poll of employes conducted in a "stark anti-union atmosphere."
- The hiring of detectives to spy on the union activities of workers.
- A six-month delay of a wage increase in an obviously timed effort to influence the voting.
- The threatening of three employes for wearing union buttons.
- Discrimination against seven union activists and the firing of a woman because her husband was a union supporter.

The judges rejected a company argument that the hearing officer, appointed by the court in 1968, had prejudiced the company case by "taking judicial notice" of four cases in which the court affirmed board findings of unfair labor practices by Southwire.

The court quoted the master's findings that unquestionably "the company possesses deep-seated anti-union animus not only as recorded in prior proceedings of this court, but as clearly demonstrated by its vigorous opposition to the 1967 union organizing campaign."

There was "abundant proof of anti-union animus independent of the prior labor history and the prior court decisions," the judges found. They said the master's finding that the company's poll of employes was unlawful is support by "convincing evidence." They cited this language of one poll: "Now I ask all of you who are (1) undecided and (2) want the question settled by a secret-ballot election and (3) all of you who do not want a union here at Southwire to raise your hands."

POLICE VIOLENCE against striking Steelworkers in Georgetown, S.C., ended with more than a dozen strikers injured, many requiring hospital treatment. The police waded into a march following a strike rally near the Bethel Methodist Church. More than 500 black and white workers have been out on strike since Aug. 15 following the refusal of the German-owned Georgetown Steel Co. to bargain in good faith with the union.

ICWU Scores Another First

The ICWU, who long has championed the rights of all workers regardless of race, creed or color, has scored still another first with the signing of a new contract with the Cannolene Co., Atlanta, Ga.

The signing makes the ICWU the first union to reach agreement with an all Black company in Atlanta or the State of Georgia.

The plant was organized into ICWU by Representative William Frazier and the contract negotiated by Representative James Hampton. According to Hampton the main feature of the new contract with management is the wage increases. "We were successful in getting the minimum wages for the new ICWU members raised from $1.85 to $2.08 per hour. The average wages for the local's nearly al women workers now rangel from $2.08 to $3.75," Hampton noted.

Local 860 LTI Held Feb. 27 In Baltimore

The ICWU Education Department held a Leadership Training Institute the weekend of February 27 in Baltimore, Md., for one of the newest ICWU local unions.

The two-day school, conducted by Education Director J. A. "Tommy" Thomas and Anne Green, education associate, was attended by 12 students from Local 860.

Union-Busting In The South

HEMINGWAY, S.C.–". . . The Textile Workers of America wants to give you a sound dose of tranquilizers and turn you into puppets. . . . They want to make it impossible for me to supply you with the means of better production and greater future. . . . I want to make it perfectly clear that legally this company has no obligation to grant the union a single thing. . . . This company has the legal right, if the strike is over wages, hours or working conditions to replace permanently every single person that goes out on strike with no obligation to take them back. . . . The above excerpts are from a letter written to company employees here by John G. "Jack" Wellman, the president of Wellman Industries Inc.

For those who believe that the age of enlightenment has come to labor relations, the vicious anti-union tactics used by Wellman and his allies–which include state and local police, so-called community leaders, town merchants and school and church officials–are a vivid reminder that union organizers in the South still work in the climate of the 1930s when they were viewed as subversives and 'agitators.'

This story of harassment and flagrant violation of the nation's labor law began in early September when TWUA international representatives Tom Barker and R. L. Roper and Industrial Union Dept. coordinator, Harold McIver, arrived in Hemingway to begin preparations for an NLRB election that was scheduled at the plant on Oct. 15-16.

The three union organizers first rented a room at a local motel but were told to vacate immediately when it was learned that they represented TWUA.

After vacating the motel, Roper, Barker, and McIver paid a deposit for a trailer rental at a trailer camp. However, pressure from town officials forced the owner of the camp to order the TWUA organizers to move the trailer from the camp facilities.

This time, the organizers refused to budge and the owner's response was to build a wire fence around the trailer which made access to the highway virtually impossible. (In order to reach the highway, the union organizers had to leap over a wide ditch in front of the trailer.)

South Carolina State Police and local police line highway leading to Wellman plant and refuse to allow employees leaving and entering plant to stop vehicles to accept leaflets from union organizers and in-plant supporters.

Finally, the manager of the trailer camp cut off the water supply to the trailer and three days before the election ordered Barker and Roper to vacate immediately.

Now unable to rent any lodging within or near the town limits, the union organizers, despite constant harassment, refused to vacate and remained at the trailer camp for the duration of the election campaign.

Lodging was not the only problem the TWUA organizers encountered. They also had trouble finding a restaurant in the Hemingway area that would serve them. Only one of the three restaurants in Hemingway found them to be suitable customers.

DECISIONS LAST SUNDAY. My, how our hearts were filled to overflowing last Sunday. We were so happy to welcome the following into the fellowship of our church: by letter, Al J. and Beth Smith (1 & 2) and by baptism Geraldine Benton (3)*. We were also happy for the following Christians who made decisions: Teresa Huggins, Mrs. Bernice Parker, Mark Fenters, Olin Richardson, Mrs. Elsie Hill, and Mrs. Betty Poston. To God be the glory for His marvelous blessings. *(Number of additions since the beginning of our new church year, Oct. 1)

STATE MISSIONS EMPHASIS. Today is State Missions Day in our church. We are indeed happy to have two of our state mission workers with us today. Rev. Delos Miles is from the Bethel Community near Olanta. He is the Secretary of the Department of Evangelism of our General Board of the S. C. Baptist Convention. Mr. Tom Brannon is Director of Public Relations for the General Board. He has done an excellent job of keeping S. C. Baptists before the people of our state. Pray for these men as they speak to our hearts.

Organizing activities by TWUA organizers were hamstrung by the interference of local and state police. Police from the nearby town of Johnsonville appeared on the scene despite the fact that Wellman plant is a mile outside the Johnsonville city limits.

When union organizers and pro-union employees attempted to distribute leaflets outside the Wellman plant, police refused to let employees stop their vehicles in order to accept them.

Police officers were stationed along the highway leading to the Wellman plant and the harassment of union organizers distributing leaflets was an everyday occurence.

The day after union supporter was fired at plant a "Don't Let The Next Fire Be Yours" notice coincidentally appeared on safety bulletin board outside plant.

When the union attempted to distribute leaflets to the Wellman night shift, the company erected huge spotlights to identify employees who accepted them.

The company then unleashed a constant propaganda barrage aimed at employee intimidation. The day after a union supporter was fired by the company, a "Don't Let The Next Fire Be Yours" notice was plastered on the safety bulletin board outside the plant.

Anti-union venom generated by the Wellman Company even reached the Hemingway school and church.

The Oct. 11 church program for the First Baptist Church of Hemingway advised parishoners that there would be an "Important Community Meeting" for all adults in this area in the Johnsonville Gymnasium on Monday, October 12 at 7:30 P.M. The meeting will last about an hour. You are urged to attend. Merrit Morris and Jim McCall are in charge of the meeting."

Wellman Company erected huge spotlights outside plant to identify employees on night shift who accepted organizing leaflets from TWUA reps.

Merrit Morris is president of the Hemingway Development Corporation, an outfit which attempts to lure industry to Hemingway with promises of a cheap and plentiful labor supply.

Leaflets bearing the same wording and addressed "To All Parents" were distributed to students by teachers at the Hemingway school and the students were urged to make certain that their parents received the notice.

Those parents who attended the "Important Community Meeting" were treated to an array of speeches by 'community leaders' who warned of strikes, violence and loss of jobs if the union was to win the NLRB vote. A National 'Right-to-work' Committee film entitled "And Women Must Weep" was also shown to those in attendance.

Not even the nation's airwaves were immune from the anti-union pressures exerted by Wellman Industries and town officials. A union request for paid broadcast time was refused by the Hemingway radio station, WKYB. After attempting to purchase broadcast time on October 12—two days before the start of the NLRB vote—the union was informed by the station manager that they were "not taking any time or spots for union clients."

As a result of the station's action, the union has filed a formal complaint with the Federal Communications Commission urging that action be taken against the station.

On October 14-15, the NLRB election was held.

Despite the constant barrage of anti-union tactics aimed at destroying the morale of pro-union employees at Wellman, the Union lost by only 22 votes—398-420 with 93 challenged ballots.

As a result of the company's flagrant and repeated harassment of union organizers and Wellman employees, TWUA has filed a $100,000 damage suit in Williamsburg County Court which is still pending.

Named as defendants were Hemingway Mayor L. Durwood Lewis and Councilmen Edwin Huggins, Carroll Morris, Cecil Ratcliffe and Keith Gordon.

The suit charges city officials with "having aided and abetted each other to interfere with and intentionally and illegally deny" the union its legal rights.

TWUA has also filed unfair labor charges with the National Labor Relations Board urging that the election be set aside and a new election directed "because actions of the company and other persons and groups acting as agents for the company would show:"

- Repeated pressure by persons or groups not themselves involved in the election which created fear of job loss, violence and other trouble.
- Community leaders, churches and schools had advertised and invited Wellman employees, their families and other adults in the area to attend anti-union meetings held at the Johnsonville High School Gymnasium.
- At these meetings community representatives made speeches about strikes, violence and loss of jobs if the union should be elected as bargaining representative.
- School teachers in the area talked to their children about strikes and violence.
- A Wellman plant guard told union committeeman he would have them locked-up for passing out union leaflets.
- Employees were told that if the union was elected they could not buy anything on credit from town merchants.
- The company restricted pro-union employees from carrying on union activities in the plant. At the same time, they allowed anti-union employees, while on the job, to solicit employees away from the union.
- The company and agents of the company threatened the employees with plant closure if the union was elected.

Rope and Cordage Sets Import Drive

NEW YORK — Representatives of TWUA's Rope and Cordage locals met at International headquarters here last month to discuss problems in the industry and map plans for upcoming contract negotiations, according to J. Harold Daoust, director of the Rope and Cordage Division.

Keir Jorgensen of the union's Research Department gave a report on current conditions in the industry to delegates attending the conference.

Delegates also took action on the threat of rising imports by endorsing a motion urging the International union to continue its fight for import quota legislation and calling for circulation of petitions among Rope and Cordage local members to be signed and mailed to their congressmen.

New Import Quota Bill Introduced by Rep. Mills

WASHINGTON — Renewed efforts to stem the tide of cheap imported textiles got off to an early start in the 92nd Congress with the introduction at the opening session of the House of a new import quota bill by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

The night before he took the action, Mills told an audience of businessmen in Charlotte, N.C., that a healthy and growing U.S. textile industry is of vital importance and unless the Japanese reach voluntary agreements with the Nixon Administration "there will be a textile quota law."

"Last year I said the textile industry and the jobs of its employees would not be permitted to go down the drain and that Congress would take care of the problem and legislate a solution if an orderly international agreement could not be worked out," Mills said.

He added that House passage of his bill last year was proof that Congress meant business even though it was sidetracked in the Senate after being tacked onto pending Social Security legislation in the pre-adjournment rush.

"Let the word go out from here," the Arkansas lawmaker declared, "that we still mean business and will legislate a solution if present negotiations with Japan fail to provide a fair and satisfactory agreement to limit textile imports."

Unlike its predecessor, which would have become effective on Jan. 1 of the year following its passage, Mills' new trade bill contains a clause making the law effective upon enactment.

Otherwise, the new measure is substantially similar to the old one. The same three-year base period of 1967 through 1969 would be used to establish quotas to be imposed through July, 1976 when the restrictions would end. If necessary, the President could then choose to extend them.

Commenting on probable Senate reaction to the new bill, Sen. Everett Jordan (D-N.C.) said he didn't think there was "any question" that it could be passed.

Reform of U.S. Labor Laws Key to Union-Buster Curb

- Supervisors intimidated employees by questioning them as to:
  - a. How they intended to vote.
  - b. When and where union meetings were held.
  - c. Who attended the meetings.
  - d. What was discussed at the meetings.
- Supervisors house-called employees.

In addition, five Wellman employees were discharged for union activities and TWUA is demanding their reinstatement.

An NLRB hearing on the union's charges scheduled for February 9 was postponed and a new hearing date of March 9 has been set.

The tactics employed by Wellman Industries are not new to TWUA organizers in the South. They have encountered them at J. P. Stevens, at Darlington, at Kayser-Roth and will continue to encounter them as long as the nation's labor laws allow union-busters to hide behind a legal apparatus which should be punishing violators instead of shielding them.

Reform of the National Labor Relations Act providing for stiff penalties for violators is urgently needed and the drawn-out legal process which allows anti-union companies to flout the law with impunity must be revised to provide immediate justice for those whose rights have been violated.

The Wellman story is far from over. A union meeting held almost immediately after the election was well-attended despite the Wellman fear campaign and TWUA has promised employees that "we are going to stay until justice prevails for all Wellman plant employees."

Campaign to Unionize Textile Plant Splits Sleepy Southern Town

Labor Charges Harassment; Business Fears High Pay Could Ruin Local Economy

No Room for the 'Agitators'

By NEIL MAXWELL
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

JOHNSONVILLE, S.C.—This sleepy Southern town took school integration in its stride. It scarcely winced when the tiny local library stocked "Portnoy's Complaint." But to hear town elders tell it, Johnsonville now faces a real menace: unions.

Last year, the Textile Workers Union of America sent a pair of organizers—one white, one black—to unionize Wellman Industries Inc., a textile producer that is by far the area's largest employer. The battle that has split this town ever since throws light on the state of union organizing that still exists in much of rural Dixie. It's a far cry from conditions that businessmen face in Northern cities.

When union organizers distribute leaflets to workers, police cars suddenly park nearby. A worker claims he was fired for wearing a union sticker on his shirt. The bulletin of the First Baptist Church in nearby Hemingway prints invitations to anti-union rallies. And the local school system at one point distributed anti-union notices in classrooms for children to take home.

Lagging Wages

The whole town is involved because the whole town thinks its future may be at stake. Nonsense, reply union men. Without unionization, this town of 900 will always be a low-income place, the union men say. They claim Wellman wages, ranging from $1.73 to $2.49 an hour, average $2.20 an hour. (The company says the average is around $2.40.) In any event, this average is considerably below national factory pay and even below the $2.55 to $2.79 hourly wages that unionized textile plants in the state pay, union men say.

But with growing competition from cheap foreign textiles, Wellman says it can't boost wages dramatically. Indeed, rising costs and tougher foreign competition are bankrupting many textile plants and thus stranding textile towns like this one.

Business leaders note that it was largely low labor costs that attracted Wellman here from the highly unionized Boston area back in 1954. Could the company move again? "I was afraid Wellman would go to Mexico or Europe or someplace and leave Johnsonville dead like it was before they came here," says Jim McCall, operator of a heating and air conditioning business here and a former union man himself.

At Wellman itself, the race has been neck and neck. In the first representation election, Wellman workers last October voted against unionization—but by 420 votes to 398. The fight may reach a climax soon. Today the National Labor Relations Board will hold hearings to determine whether six Wellman workers were fired illegally for favoring the union. The union hopes the board not only will reinstate the workers with back pay but also will order a new election.

"Go-Go-Go TWUA"

In one of the cases, the company says it fired Jerry Bruce for posting pro-union stickers in the canteen area, a clear violation of rules. But all that is a misunderstanding, says Mr. Bruce. "All I was doing was wearing a 'Go-Go-Go TWUA' sticker on the back of my shirt," he says. He claims the company also wronged him by taking him off his regular job of wool finisher. "They put me to cleaning floors," he says. "I figure they were trying to dishearten me. I never saw a white boy doing that job—except me."

Even if the NLRB doesn't order a new election immediately, another is expected next October. In any event, the union plans a meeting next Sunday to launch a revitalized organizing drive.

Meanwhile, the alleged harassment continues. Indeed, union men say there has been one "misunderstanding" after another ever since the two organizers arrived and checked into the Coachman Inn, the only motel in Hemingway. The organizers say that as soon as the motel management found out who they were, they were told to vacate.

But that's a misunderstanding, says Merritt Morris, largest stockholder in the motel and undertaker for Hemingway's whites. (Blacks and whites here go to school together, but still get buried separately.) "We knew who they were when they registered; we even gave them a commercial rate," says Mr. Morris in the hushed parlor of his funeral home. He claims the white organizer left of his own accord after 10 weeks and the black one was asked to leave after six weeks because he repeatedly violated rules, such as the one against making telephone calls after 11 p.m.

Then the organizers bought a trailer and parked it just outside Hemingway. But the city refused to let them hook up to the water system. The organizers hooked up anyway. Then the city unhooked the pipe. The organizers promptly hooked up again. Finally the city hauled the water meter and the pipe away.

So the organizers filed a $100,000 suit against the mayor and five councilmen, charging harassment. But city officials say there's no harassment at all. It's just that the city has a water shortage, the trailer was outside city limits, and no new connections are being permitted in such cases, they claim. So the city filed charges against the organizers for violating a state law against hooking onto a water system illegally.

Then the owner of the land that the organizers rented to park their trailer soured on his tenants. "I'm a union man myself," he says. "But I never heard of union organizers doing any good by going into a place and stirring up trouble." So the owner ordered the organizers off the land immediately. The organizers refused to leave right away. So the angry owner built a fence around three sides of the trailer. Thus the only access to the trailer involved walking through a ditch. (The organizers moved to another town.)

Some local businessmen have fought the union nearly as enthusiastically as has Well man itself. Mr. McCall, the heating man, and Mr. Morris, the undertaker, sponsored an anti-union rally in the school gymnasium. (Mr. Morris was on the school board at the time, but he claims the gym is available for any group.) Over 200 citizens attending the meeting heard a number of speeches vigorously denouncing the union and watched a film called "And Women Must Weep." The movie depicted union strike violence in Henderson, N.C., another textile town.

The union-management fight itself has also been acrimonious. Just in case Wellman workers were thinking of a strike, the company made its position clear: "All those who went out could be permanently replaced at the end of the strike. They would have no job and would not be entitled to any lost wages."

Since the organizing drive started, the company has erected powerful searchlights outside the plant. Union backers claim the lights are there largely to help identify workers who accept union literature as they drive in for the night shift.

Union men also claim it is a clear attempt at intimidation when police cars show up during a distribution of union literature.

Gary Cooper, the Johnsonville police chief, says that is all a misunderstanding. He concedes the plant is outside his police jurisdiction, but he says: "We were more or less just spectators. I pay highway taxes just like anybody else, so I got as much right out there as anybody else." Observers say it is only natural for the chief to take an interest in happenings at the plant, as his boss, the mayor, is on the plant security force.

The searchlights and police cars contribute to the high-security atmosphere at the plant. A high chain link fence topped with barbed wire surrounds the premises, and big gates block the entrances. As a visitor drives up to the guardhouse, a uniformed security agent puts down his copy of "Passion for a Price" to check the stranger's credentials. Only when the outsider is identified and his destination determined does the guard press a button to raise the gate.

Wellman executives also keep themselves generally closed off from the press. One of the few things they will tell a reporter is that they think reporters have given the company a bad press. They particularly dislike "Listening to America," a new book by Bill Moyers that has a chapter on Johnsonville.

Despite all this, many here consider John Wellman, the company president, an excellent employer and citizen. Paradoxically, the heavily guarded plant is a beautifully landscaped modern structure. Working conditions are better than in many Southern plants. The company has recently appointed two black supervisors. This may not sound like much, but it is a change in a town that still has service station restroom doors marked "white" and "colored."

Mr. Wellman enthusiastically boosts—and contributes to—various causes to improve the area. He sold land at a cheap price for a low-income housing project. When told that many of the new residents came from the tobacco and soybean farms in the area and were used to large vegetable gardens, he donated a half-acre of land for each tenant.

But union supporters charge "paternalism." And they point out that some Wellman workers earn so little, even working full-time, that they qualify for federal rent supplements.

RE: GRADUATE STUDY OPPORTUNITIES IN ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS FOR MINORITY STUDENTS

I have recently had contact with ~~Professor~~ James Stern, Professor of ~~in the~~ Economics and ~~Department of the University of Wisconsin. Professor Stern is also~~ Chairman of the Industrial Relations Research ~~Center~~ Institute at the University of Wisconsin.

Financial assistance in the neighborhood of $3,000 is available to qualified Negro students interested in graduate study in Industrial Relations or Economics. ~~The amount available per student is in the neighborhood of $3,000~~. Such students would be expected to work part-time as either research or teaching assistants.

The University's normal deadlines for application have been waived. ~~Where needed~~ courses in composition and other ~~basic areas where~~ remedial work ~~may be required~~ will be offered free. ~~Also if~~ Tutoring in the substantive courses (economics and/or industrial relations) will be offered where needed free of charge.

The University is interested in getting "qualified" students. I take this to mean ~~a serious interest in the~~ they will look at potential of a graduate student and ~~willingness to~~ be ~~quite~~ lenient regarding formal requirements.

I would be happy to have information on any student interested in these areas whom you feel may be qualified. Of if you prefer, write to Professor Stern direct. The academic reputation and performance of the Economics Department and the Industrial Relations ~~Center is~~ Institute are excellent.

Dear Mordecai:

Enclosed is an honorarium for your teaching stint in Greensboro with the Textile Workers Union staff. I heard only good reports and for the right reasons. I am especially pleased that you were able to stay beyond your session and have a good bit of informal time with these men.

If you have any special reactions to the sessions in Greensboro I would be happy to hear them.

Enclosure

No special reactions.

I suspect mine would probably square pretty well with yours.

I think the Conference was good for all Concerned. The participants' levels of civil rights development varied from swingers, Circa 1969 to what might be called Swingers Circa 1869.

It was especially good from my own "contacts" point of view to meet and commune with TWUA's National level people (Sol Stein swings, circa 1969 -- even if he did dominate my session) the Regional level (Scott Hoyman -- little to my surprise) and the South Carolina people, with whom I hope to deal.

I chuckled at your reference in the letter to Mine at a "teaching stint" but then I guess that's what it amounted to in large part.

The Money comes in handy. Methinks it represents probably a desk chair, No? (:)

TO ALL ADMINISTRATIVE STAFF

Greetings:

This is a follow up to my letter of December 12th re conference for January 30th through February 1st.

The conference will be held at the Kings Inn, 1103 N. Elm Street, Greensboro, N. C. The conference will begin at 1:00 P. M. on Thursday, January 30th. We have scheduled an all day meeting on Friday, January 31st, beginning at 9:30 A. M. On Saturday, February 1st, the conference will start at 9:30 A. M. and we expect to adjourn by 12:30.

Reservations have been made for you at the Kings Inn. We have guaranteed same and therefore must know if you plan to use the accommodations at Kings Inn. Please advise my secretary, Helen Hill, no later than Monday, January 20th, of your plans. If we have not heard from you by that date we will cancel your reservation at the motel and you will then have to make your own arrangements.

I am looking forward to an interesting and successful conference.

Fraternally yours,

Dear Dr. Via:

My sincere appreciation for your effort on behalf of the World Press Institute during our recent visit to Atlanta.

Your comments on the political, social, and economic situations in Atlanta and the South as a whole did much to pull all our impressions and information together.

My warmest thanks for your interest in the World Press Institute.

Dear Friends:

It was a pleasure to visit with you during my recent trip to Atlanta. I hope this is only the beginning of a fruitful and active relationship between our organizations.

We are studying the materials you provided and incorporating them into our library. Pictorial information was especially valuable.

I will be writing to the local NWRO chapter and food cooperative to follow up on our visit with them. The contacts you supplied in Florida were valuable.

We understand there is a possibility that Dr. Wheeler will be invited to a nutrition meeting in Arizona during the next few months. We hope he is available. It would be a pleasure to meet him.

Thank you for your time and assistance. We expect to be in touch with you in the next few weeks concerning some area situations and the new food stamp regulations.

Sincerely,

Dear Emery:

In a time of great strife, confusion, disunity and violence, few men have the will and energy to work in an effot to make things better; even fewer believe they can.

The participants and staff of "Institute 72", extends our heartfelt thanks to you and the many other resource persons who came and shared their knowledge with us.

You have helped to re-instill in us an ideal belief that "there is a light at the end of the tunnel." Thanks again.

Also, upon completion of all published materials from the institute, they will be forwarded.

Outline of CWA Education: 1967-68

NEW PROJECTS FOR LOCAL EDUCATION WORK

Meet Your CWA -- meeting outline for new members.

Speaking Kits -- for union meetings or community gatherings on topics of importance to the labor movement.

National Service education volunteers -- participation by CWA members in VISTA, HEAD START, and other community education activities.

Committee Chairman Guides -- training outlines for local committees.

Futures Folder -- education opportunities for CWA members and their families.

Study Forum -- series of small group discussions.

Growth Handbook -- guide for members of external organizing committees.

EXPANDED AREA TWO DAY SCHOOLS

Growth School -- for external organizing committees.

Steward School -- revision of outline for steward training.

Officers Training -- program for training newly elected officers.

IMPROVED DISTRICT WIDE SCHOOLS

School for Community Union Builders for chairman of external organizing committees on how to build a local program.

Local Leadership Week Long Conferences -- a wide variety of courses in a two year sequence for local officers.

School for Contract Negotiators -- to train negotiators in newly organized units.

CONTINUING STAFF TRAINING

A new one week course for all staff on current developments affecting labor.

Specialized staff training opportunities on time study, collective bargaining, testing, etc.

SUMMARY

During 1967-68 education programs in the Communications Workers of America will assist local officers and stewards to learn the duties and responsibilities of union office emphasize Growth as the number one need of labor in today's changing society encourage members and the growing number of new members to participate in the work of the union and learn about CWA goals from personal experience

Education programs to achieve these goals are outlined in this report.

The full cycle is followed annually to keep CWA Education Programs in step with union goals and needs. The first four steps are covered by this report.

CWA Education During 1967-68

On November 13-18, 1966 a review of the CWA Education activities was held in Norman, Oklahoma. The district education coordinators, the CWA Education Director, Executive Vice President Watts, and his assistant participated in these discussions with several consultants. The consultants were:

Dr. Donald N. Michael, author of "The Next Generation"
Dr. Lloyd P. Williams, Professor of Education, University of Oklahoma
Dr. Fred Sloan, Professor of Education, University of Oklahoma
Dr. Hubert Hengst, Professor of Education, University of Oklahoma
Director Larry Rogin, Department of Education, AFL-CIO

This report reviews the education work completed by the CWA during 1966, summarizes new developments noted by the participants at the Norman meeting, and outlines goals for education work during 1967-68.

Section I

REVIEW OF CWA EDUCATION WORK DURING 1966-67

A. LOCAL OFFICER TRAINING TWO DAY COURSE

Every two years, after the bi-annual local union elections, CWA Staff conducts training of local officers in the duties and responsibilities of their office. These classes are currently being held throughout the union (January and February 1967). An estimated 2,000 local officers will participate in classes taught by 90 CWA staff.

The teaching outline and materials for this course were completely revised by the Education Department during 1966. They were reviewed by the Education Coordinators at the Norman meeting and include an emphasis on Growth, CWA goals, operation, and achievements. Here is a summary of the topics in the current outline:

Local Officer Training Course -- 2 days or 12 hours

CWA Goals and Achievements
Local Officer Duties
Your Local as a Part of the Labor Movement
Facts on Growth
How CWA Members Negotiate a Contract
Planning Your Program for This Year

Presidents Only	Secretaries Only
Parliamentary Review	Getting Members Dues Deduction
Planning Better Meetings	Processing the Returns from Dues
Getting the Local's Work Done	Deduction Reports and Records
Ethics	Local Union Work and Administration

B. STEWARDS TRAINING

Two day schools for training stewards are held by CWA Staff throughout the year. During 1966 the CWA Staff servicing locals reported conducting an average of 3 classes each, reaching a total of 2,769 stewards in 256 locals. Here is a summary of training during 1966:

TWO DAY STEWARD TRAINING COURSES HELD DURING 1966

The present outline developed in 1963, covers these topics:

Labor History
Steward Duties
Grievance Handling
Organizing
Contract Clauses

During 1966, additional prints of films used in these training outlines were supplied to area offices to facilitate the scheduling of classes. Also a survey of the staff teaching this course was completed to assemble their ideas for revision of the outline. The outline will be revised during 1967 to include information on Growth, CWA goals, operation and achievements.

C. SCHOOLS FOR COMMUNITY UNION BUILDERS -- GROWTH

Much education effort during 1966 was devoted to the development of a course to train local organizing chairmen and officers in ways to involve their members in external organizing. The course consisted of a one week resident school for organizing chairmen and officers conducted by CWA.

1. Goals of Growth Schools

a. These schools were planned to train participants in how to

1) stimulate members about Growth
2) have members turn in organizing contacts
3) train members to make house calls
4) select places to collect show of interest cards
5) understand the U. S. system of labor relations affecting organizing

b. For staff an additional purpose in this school was:

learning how to work with local officers on Growth projects.

2. Methods

These goals were achieved by:

discussion of reasons for Growth, the law and techniques workshops in which students practiced at the school techniques they were to use back home talks by outside speakers on the need for increased organizing by the labor movement.

3. Materials

Materials were prepared in connection with these schools for use at the school and in the local. Most of this material had never been prepared before and presented a challenge:

Manual for training
Staff teaching outline
Contact cards
Polling packet - for training members in making house calls.
Posters, membership letters, leaflets and other materials to promote the collection of contacts.
Planning sheet to establish an organizing drive and budgeting.
Film on collecting contacts (in preparation).

*The figures in these columns combine Introductory Schools and District Schools.

5. Activity

Since participating in the schools, two-thirds of the locals that participated in the 1966 training have been active in some phase of Growth. Some have initiated organizing projects since returning from the school, others have begun initial phases of Growth activity, such as: collecting contacts and researching potential places; and others, already involved in organizing, used the training to learn new techniques for organizing.

As of Jan. 1, 1967—

215 Locals Participated in COMMUNITY UNION BUILDERS SCHOOLS During 1966.

- Twenty one schools were held with a total attendance of 507.
- Most of the schools were held in August to October. The first school was in March and the last in December.
- Nearly as many locals participated in CUB schools as in the previous year's week-long schools — 269 locals in 1965 and 215 locals in 1966 CUB schools.

6. Evaluation of Lessons Learned for Growth Training in 1967-68

Training during 1967-68 should be based on the lessons gained in the 1966 schools. Before additional training materials are prepared, a careful analysis of the use of existing materials by participants at 1966 schools is to be undertaken. This evaluation is to be made in April 1967, approximately six months after most of the training, and will include an analysis of records at headquarters, a survey of the participants, and a depth study of the experience of several selected locals.

7. Cost

The cost of training during 1966 was:

D. FUTURES FOLDER

Information about training and job opportunities for children of CWA members and their families was prepared by the Education Department during 1966.

This project was an outgrowth of the White Collar Survey, which rated education objectives as a high membership priority.

The response to this folder confirmed these findings. Based on a coupon in the October and December CWA News, 1,785 individual requests for the folder were received and filled. Here is a summary of the requests by district:

E. UNIVERSITY LABOR EXTENSION ADVISORY COMMITTEES

Increasing numbers of CWA locals are holding classes with university labor extension programs. The availability of these services has increased in recent years. This year the University of Maine and Hawaii brought to 22 the number of institutions with programs.

These programs testify to the fact that labor is entitled to low cost university services on the same basis as other groups in the community. Unions, however, need to see that the programs are conducted in accordance with AFL-CIO policy which states that a bona fide university program includes a university subsidy, conducts programs with experienced labor staff, and has an advisory committee to inform it of union educational needs.

CWA members serve on the advisory committees of several university programs. These committees see that university programs are relevant and their charges are fair. The following sheet includes a list of the current programs and the CWA members who participate in their advisory committees.

F. SURVEY OF 1964 and 1965 WEEK LONG SCHOOLS

During the past year a survey was developed of participants in the previous two years of week long schools. The purpose of the survey was to determine if the week long programs were successful in reaching the group who are now in office. The survey will attempt to determine the present union activity of past participants in these schools.

Section II

Summary of Current Developments Affecting Labor

At the Norman meeting, trends affecting labor were discussed in addition to a review of the previous year's activity. In trying to anticipate learning needs of CWA local officers and members during 1967-68, these trends were considered to be as important as the experiences of the past year. In this section, a few of these trends are listed.

A. THE NEW DECADE

As the 1970's approach some of the problems that will affect CWA members become evident. This summary of conditions has been drawn from talks given by speakers at Schools for Community Union Builders and from the Norman education meeting. Here are some important trends:

1. INCOME will continue to rise accompanied by a continued loosening of the restraints which have been traditionally imposed by income.

2. WORKFORCE will add 17,000,000 employees by 1975. Most of this group will go to work in the wholesale and retail trades, service trades and local government.

3. URBAN AREAS will continue to accumulate most of the population increase in the next decade and most of the problems. Poverty, traffic jams, pollution, and crime will grow faster than efforts to deal with them. Urban dwellers in the 70's will be more anxious, as a result.

4. EDUCATION will continue to cause a pinch on parents. The rising need for training will meet the continued shortage of facilities. Some professions are changing so fast that they will virtually require continuous training. But quality will suffer especially through the wider use of impersonal "automated" training devices. These trends may be offset by student demands for quality education.

5. TECHNOLOGY will move forward. Millions will be inconvenienced by job elimination and changes. The 70's will be a fertile field for opportunistic political movements. The Birch Society will have lots of company in the 70's.

6. WORLD TENSIONS will be heightened in the 70's by famine. The gap between rising population and lagging food production is expected to reach a critical point in the underdeveloped countries posing a morale dilemma for the developed countries.

B. THE NEW GENERATION

The age group 21 through 25 now numbers 14,000,000 in the U.S., larger than the present membership of all AFL-CIO unions. This is the group that is being called the "New Generation".

In 1965 the CWA education coordinators were interested in the education needs of this group. This generation has since begun to receive attention in the press and Time's Man of the Year for 1966 was "Twenty-five and under".

At the Norman meeting both the coordinators and the consultants agreed on the importance in the union and the community of this group.

A more difficult question is whether the "New Generation" represented a significant break with older generations in terms of the union and political ideas.

Are the differences we see traditional generation differences or is there something new here today? Are the ideas of the "New Generation" on campus, as widely reported in the press, reflected in younger union members? These are questions on which there is no research at this time.

The article in Time included these points:

> "The generation gap is wider than I've ever seen it in my lifetime," said Harvard's David Riesman.
> They are increasingly looking to themselves for ideas and leadership.
> More than 250,000 students are helping tutor children in depressed areas.
> Many are willing to trade income for participation.
> "Unlike the rebels of the '30's, who knew where they were going, the New Left today rejects ideologies -- he's issue-oriented, not ideology-oriented", says CCNY's Buell Gallagher.
> (Has) a built-in bunk detector for sniffing out dishonesty and double standards.

C. EFFECT ON CWA EDUCATION

1. What are the education needs implied by these trends?

   the meaning of trade unionism must be restated for a new generation that will be challenged by a variety of conflicting ideas.

   we can be assured of greater challenges to unionism in the community in the coming years.

   there is an interest by the "New Generation" in action and participation in many fields in which the union also has an interest. Participation is the most potent form of education.

   organizing is one of CWA's most important activities.

2. During 1967-68 CWA Education will make initial efforts on programs which meet these needs of activating and unionizing members for the challenges that lie ahead.

Section III

Goals of CWA Education During 1967-68

SUMMARY: During 1967-68 education programs in the CWA will:

assist local officers and stewards in learning the duties and responsibilities of union office.

emphasize Growth as the Number One need of labor in today's changing world.

encourage members and the growing number of new members to participate in union activities and to learn first hand the goals of the CWA.

A. DISTRICT WIDE SCHOOLS

These are week long schools planned and conducted in each District to support training efforts of staff representatives and locals during the year.

1. Community Union Builders Schools

During 1966 not as many Growth schools were conducted as should have been. As time continues, turnover and the need to reach new locals increase the importance of continued Growth training.

During 1967-68 one-week SCHOOLS FOR COMMUNITY UNION BUILDERS will continue as needed in each District to provide intensive training for local organizing chairmen and officers. Each District will determine the need for this training and announce schools.

In addition to this program, a program of two-day growth schools is being planned for the coming year (see Section B. below).

2. Local Leadership Week Long Schools

Schools for Local Leadership, conducted on a one-week basis, will be resumed in 1967-68. These will be similar to the programs conducted during 1963-65 and will be:

week long -- opening on Sunday and closing on Friday afternoon.
resident -- including in-town students.
held on a university campus or near university instruction resources.
budgeted board and room at $60 per student, instruction at $10, CWA staff participation at $15, and materials at $5.
registration fee of $5 per student.
between 20 and 80 participants at each school.
staff participants will be at school full week.
scheduled following the Convention.
second year school can be held separately or with a first year school.

The courses for a Local Leadership Week Long School in 1967-68 will be as follows:

FIRST YEAR	SECOND YEAR
Labor History and CWA Today (5 hrs)	Leadership Psychology (5 hrs)
Economics of Labor Issues (5 hrs)	Economics of National Issues (5 hrs)

This curriculum is similar to the 1963-65 curriculum, however, adds material on Growth, CWA goals, achievements of labor, and trends today.

3. Financing District Wide Schools

The budget will provide each district with funds for district-wide schools. The District will determine, based on its needs, how much it will use for Schools for Community Union Builders and how much it will use for Local Leadership Week Long Schools.

4. Evaluation of Growth Training

The Growth Training conducted at Schools for Community Union Builders will be fully examined in April 1967 to determine the topics and skills which proved to be most helpful to local organizers. The results of this evaluation will be used as a basis for materials prepared during 1967-68.

B. AREA SCHOOLS

Area schools are two day schools planned and conducted by the staff representatives with the coordination of the District Vice President to meet the needs of the locals in their area.

1. New Growth School

To reach locals who have not been participating in week long conferences, a two day Growth School outline will be prepared during 1967. It will take into account the findings of the evaluation of growth training made in the Spring, described above.

The course will cover the essentials of local external organizing and will be designed so it can be used for several locals or for an intensive course with the leadership of one local.

In order to reach the widest group of locals, financing will be provided for this program to cover the cost of necessary board and room, meeting rooms, speakers, and materials. These schools may be held on a one or two night basis, depending on travel arrangements. The schools will be budgeted at $40 per participant for these items and for 2,000 participants.

2. Local Officers Training

During 1968 the outline currently in use will be revised based on the experience during 1967. Classes will continue to be available during 1967-68 for locals not reached during the first part of 1967.

3. Steward Training Course

The outline and materials for the steward course will be completely revised during 1967.

C. COLLECTIVE BARGAINING TRAINING

To provide training during 1967-68 for members of negotiating committees of newly organized units, Collective Bargaining Schools will be conducted on a week long resident basis. The schools will cover the essentials of preparation for negotiations, effective bargaining, the content of bargaining, the scope of bargaining, and bargaining during the life of the contract.

These schools will be initiated by four inter-district introductory schools taught by CWA staff and outside speakers. Participants will be members of negotiating committees and local officers who bargain for units in their local.

D. LOCAL EDUCATION ACTIVITIES

Major goals during 1967-68 are to:

REACH EVERY CWA LOCAL WITH AT LEAST ONE EDUCATION ACTIVITY. There are some 500 locals not reached with existing programs.

ACTIVATE EVERY INTERESTED CWA MEMBER IN A UNION PROJECT. Activity here is especially aimed at the "New Generation".

PREPARE MEMBERS TO UNDERSTAND THE VALUE OF A UNION IN THE CHALLENGES THAT LIE AHEAD. Programs that emphasize "unionism" are included.

The following activities will be prepared to assist locals to meet these challenges:

1. Meet Your CWA

Develop a meeting to which every new CWA member would be invited. Every member present would be offered the opportunity to become active on a project. An outline would be prepared for the committee conducting this session. The meeting would be built around a 10 minute film which would explain the purpose and possibilities of CWA in today's world.

2. Speaker's Kits

A set of three kits will be developed on topics important to the CWA, which can be used in several ways: as speech topics in locally initiated public speaking classes, for officers speaking to public schools, or for Education Committees who want to inform members at a union meeting on issues of current interest.

Kits will be on topics such as: "The CWA Today". "The Right to Strike in the American Constitution", or "Why 14b Undermines the American System of Labor Relations".

3. Book Shelf

Preparation of a set of five books about unions which locals may purchase for presentation to local schools, libraries, veterans hospitals, or for local use.

4. Study Forum

A package of four study meetings will be offered to any group of 10 members who agree to organize themselves into a forum and meet four times. The topics of each discussion will be selected by the Education Department and will deal with current issues important to labor. They will be "issues" oriented rather than "duties" oriented.

5. Committee Chairman's Teaching Guide

To help committee chairmen train members of their committees and get their committees under way, teaching guides will be prepared. These will center around the committee's first meeting. Guides will be prepared for the chairman of the following local committees:

Legislative Community Services
Public Relations Education
Organizing
COPE

These teaching guides will make use of existing manuals, pamphlets, and other sources of committee information.

6. National Service

In the past five years, a number of educational activities have been created by the government and private agencies which are aimed at improving the progress and happiness of the nation. For example, VISTA, HEAD START, and UPWARD BOUND are Federal programs which require vast numbers of citizens to participate to make them effective. Junior Colleges provide quality education for many and call for citizen participation. The Council for Economic Education and the University Labor Extension Services are worthy of labor support.

During 1967/68 the Education Department will explore ways of motivating CWA members to participate in these programs and ways by which governmental funds can be utilized by CWA and CWA locals for educational activities.

7. Growth Handbook

For locals who have not participated in training schools and for the continuing references of all officers, a handbook will be prepared based on the experience in Growth, to date.

8. Futures Folder

During 1967-68 the Futures Folder, a set of information for members and their children about training and career opportunities, will be updated. This will include a check with members who received the current edition to learn how they used it.

Also during the year the Education Department and experts in the field of education, will explore ways in which CWA can be of further assistance to its members in aiding their pursuit to personal education goals.

9. Film Rental

The film needs of CWA have been studied and it has been found not practical for CWA to operate its own film library. Film usage arises in two situations:

FOR TRAINING OUTLINES. Several films are used with current course outlines. For this purpose prints of films included in the outline are increasingly stocked in area offices.

CURRENT LABOR ISSUES AT UNION MEETINGS. Films are desired on an occasional basis by locals at union meetings, schools, etc. For this purpose, a large source of current films is needed. The AFL-CIO operates a library with a nominal film rental which is available to all AFL-CIO affiliates. For this reason it is impractical for the CWA to duplicate this service.

The CWA film library will be discontinued during 1967-68 and the AFL-CIO Library will be used to supplement any film needs not met by prints available in the Area Offices.

E. STAFF TRAINING

1. During 1967-68 one week resident sessions for all CWA Staff will be conducted to provide an opportunity for discussion of current trends affecting labor.

   Two sessions will be held for the Area Directors and four will be held for other CWA Representatives.

2. As in the past years, an allocation will be included in the budget for participation by staff in specialized staff training sponsored by the AFL-CIO, universities, or other groups. Time study and collective bargaining have been two kinds of schools attended by CWA Staff.

Section IV

GETTING THE JOB DONE

A. MATERIALS PREPARATION

The key to many of these projects is materials that are carefully prepared, especially since several projects are "self starting".

To prepare for the 1967-68 programs the Education Department will set up a SUMMER MATERIALS PROJECT. Qualified teachers and experts with union experience will prepare materials for these programs. This preparation will include observing sessions now being taught and testing drafts with CWA groups before they are put in final form.

The use of the Summer Materials Project will enable many of the programs described in this report to get off the ground faster than is possible otherwise.

B. SCHEDULE FOR PREPARATION AND TRAINING

On the following sheet is a schedule for materials preparation and training. Most of the programs will be ready in the last Fall.

CWA ACTION CIRCUIT

Discussion Outline

"CWA ACTION CIRCUIT" TAPE

SOUND TAPE
FULL TRACK
7½ IPS

TITLE GRIEVANCES AND ARBITRATION TIME 15 min TAPE NO 2-68

INTRODUCING THIS SESSION
On this tape, President Beirne reports on the performance of the union grievance system. In our procedure, grievances are initiated at the local level and if not resolved are appealed to the International Union level and finally to arbitration. At arbitration, the Union and the company mutually agree on a person who hears the case and makes a decision based on the facts that is final and binding. Mr. Beirne also comments on our 30th Anniversary and President-elect Nixon.

DISCUSSION FOLLOWING THE TAPE
The questions are framed to be put to a panel of experts (the President, the Chief Steward, the Representative, etc.) taking additional questions from the floor as you go along.

1. Under our contract how is a grievance initiated?

2. What steps does a grievance go through in the local? Who participates at each step for the company? For the Union? What are the time limits? (This might be drawn on a blackboard or on a chart.)

3. During 1968, how many grievances were initiated in our local? How many were won? How many were appealed?

4. What steps does a grievance go through outside of the local? What recent arbitration cases over the past several years affected the members of our local?

CONCLUDING SUMMARY
In the CWA we have one of the best grievance procedures, which includes participation from the local and the International Union and brings to bear research and legal talent, and a final determination by an impartial arbitrator. For many members it has been a direct benefit, and for all of us it stands as a protection which benefits us each day indirectly.

HOW TO PREPARE FOR THIS SESSION....

HOW TO PREPARE FOR THIS SESSION

WHERE TO USE THIS TAPE

This tape contains information about CWA goals and activities. It is suitable for a wide variety of CWA meetings: union meetings, steward meetings, executive board meetings, new member orientation, and others. It is short so that the session can include a discussion, clarification, and questions.

EQUIPMENT

This is a full track tape to be played at 7½ inches per second. Any tape player that can function at 7½ ips will be able to play it. Equipment can be rented in most areas, however, many members have tape players.

PREVIEW

Whoever is handling the session should listen to the tape before the meeting with one or two other people. Think about these questions as you listen:

Will the tape raise questions with your members you need to anticipate?

Are there posters or pamphlets that would go with this subject you should bring to the meeting?

How should the session be introduced?

Would it be helpful to designate an "expert" to serve as a resource in answering questions after the tape?

WHEN TO USE TAPE

In a union meeting, the person handling the session should see the President and work out when to have the session. You need to plan about a half hour for the tape, introduction, and discussion. The session might be held—

1. As a communication at the beginning of the meeting.
2. As a part of the Executive Board report.
3. As a committee report (education, legislative, etc.)
4. As "good and welfare."
5. Before the formal beginning of the meeting.

TECHNICAL DETAILS

Can the tape be heard all over the meeting hall?
(the speaker on the tape player is enough for a small room but in a big hall it is better to have speaker connected by a jack.)

Has the person handling the session checked himself out on the equipment?

Do you need extension cords?

REPORT

To complete the "circuit" mail the report form NE-1124 after your session. Indicate on the card reactions of your group. Several NE-1124 cards are enclosed in this kit. USE A SEPARATE CARD FOR EACH SESSION.

1968 Theme Poster

This poster illustrates some of the ideas and issues that will be discussed at your school this year. It is named "Unionism Today".

WAYS TO USE THIS POSTER

★ Before the school, show it to your local officers and members at your work location. Get their ideas as to what new unionism includes.

★ Make a list of points you would like to discuss at the school and bring it with you. Other participants may have some of the same questions, so you may not need to raise every item on your list. But this is your personal set of learning goals for the week.

★ Use the poster after the school to help give your report at the membership meeting or to members at your work location. The poster may suggest several of the points you want to stress.

★ Keep the poster as a souvenir of the school.

•ABRAHAM, MARTIN & JOHN

(As recorded by Dion/Laurie)

DICK HOLLER

Has anybody here seen my old friend Abraham
Can you tell me where he's gone
He's freed a lot of people but the good die young
I just looked around and he's gone.

Has anybody here seen my old friend John
Can you tell me where he's gone
He's freed a lot of people but the good die young.
I just looked around and he's gone.

Has anybody here seen my old friend Martin
Can you tell me where he's gone
He's freed a lot of people but the good die young.
I just looked around and he's gone.

Didn't you love the things they stood for Didn't they try to bring some good for you and me
And we'll be free
Someday soon it's gonna be one day.

Has anybody here seen my old friend Bobby
Can you tell me where he's gone
I thought I saw him walkin' up over the hill with Abraham and Martin and John.

•ALL ALONG THE WATCH TOWER

(As recorded by Jimi Hendrix Experience/Reprise)
BOB DYLAN

There must be some way out of here
Said the joker to the thief
There's too much confusion
I can't get no relief
Business men they drink my wine
Plowmen dig my earth
None of them along the line
Know what any of it is worth
No reason to get excited
The thief he kindly spoke
There are many here among us
Who feel that life is but a joke
But, you and I we've been through that
And this is not our fate
So let us not talk falsely, now
The hour is getting late.

All along the watch tower
Princess kept the view
While all the women came and went Barefoot servants, too
Outside in the distance
A wildcat did growl
Two riders were approaching
The wind began to howl.

•CROWN OF CREATION

(As recorded by the Jefferson Airplane/RCA Victor)
KANTNER

You are the crown of creation
You are the crown of creation
And you got no place to go
Soon you'll attain the stability you strive for
In the only way that it's granted
In a place among the fossils of our time.
In loyalty to their kind
They cannot tolerate our minds
In loyalty to our kind
We cannot tolerate their obstruction.

Life is change
How it differs from the rocks
I've seen their ways too often for my liking
New worlds to gain
My life is to survive and be alive for you.

LENNON
MCCARTNEY

Say you wanna revolution
Well you know
We all wanna change the world
You tell me that it's evolution
Well you know
We all wanna change the world
But when you talk about destruction
Don't you know that you can count me out
Don't you know it's gonna be all right, all right, all right.

You say you got a real solution
Well you know
We don't love to see the plan
You ask me for a contribution
Well you know
We're all doing what we can
But if you want money for people with minds of hate
All I can tell you is brother you have to wait
Don't you know it's gonna be all right, all right, all right.

You say it's in the Constitution
Well you know
We all wanna change your head
You tell me it's the institution
Well you know
You better free your mind instead
But if you go carrying pictures of Chairman Mao
You ain't gonna make it with anyone anyhow
You know it's gonna be all right, all right, all right, etc.

Lady Madonna children at your feet
Wonder how you manage to make ends meet
Who finds the money when you pay the rent
Do you think that money was heaven sent.

Friday night arrives without a suitcase
Sunday morning creeping like a nun
Monday's child has learned to tie his bootlace
See how they run.

Lady Madonna baby at your breast
Wonder how you manage to feed the rest
See how they run
Lady Madonna lying on the bed
Listen to the music playing in your head
Tuesday afternoon is never ending
Wednesday morning papers didn't come
Thursday night your stockings needed mending
See how they run
Lady Madonna children at your feet
Wonder how you manage to make ends meet.

•THE YARD WENT ON FOREVER

(As recorded by Richard Harris/Dunhill)

JIM WEBB

Is everyone safe?
Has everybody got a place to hide?
Is everybody warm inside?
Hear them singing? All the women of Pompei
Standing with the Kansas City housewives in doorways
In volcanoes and tornadoes on Doomsday.

There were houses, there were hoses, there were sprinklers
On the lawn, there was an ironing board
And she would stand amid her understanding
And ask the children what they'd done at school that day
And the yard went on forever
There were blouses, with print roses, checkered shirts
And white levis, there was a frying pan
And she would cook their dreams while they were dreaming
And later she would send them out to play
And the yard went on forever.

Is everybody safe?
Has everybody got a place to hide?
Is everybody warm inside?
Hear them singing? All the women of Bombay
Standing with the Nagasaki housewives in doorways
In eruptions and destructions on Doomsday.

• (SITTIN' ON) THE DOCK OF THE BAY

(As recorded by Otis Redding/Volt)

STEVE CROPPER
OTIS REDDING

Sittin' in the morning sun
I'll be sittin' when the evening comes Watching the ships roll in
Then I watch 'em roll away again, yeah
I'm sitting on the dock of the bay
Watching the tide roll in
Just sittin' on the dock of the bay wastin' time.

I left my home in Georgia
Headed for the Frisco Bay
I had nothing to live for
Looks like nothing's gonna come my way
So I'm just sittin' on the dock of the bay
Watching the tide roll in
I'm sittin' on the dock of the bay wastin' time.

Looks like nothing's gonna change
Everything still remains the same
I can't do what ten people tell me to do
So I guess I'll remain the same
Just sittin' here resting my bones
And this loneliness won't leave me alone
This 2,000 miles I roamed just to make this dock my home
Now I'm sittin' on the dock of the bay
Watching the tide roll in
Sittin' on the dock of the bay wastin' time.

•MR. BUSINESSMAN

(As recorded by Ray Stevens/Monument)

RAY STEVENS

Itemize the things you covet
As you squander through your life
Bigger cars, bigger houses
Term insurance for your wife
Tuesday evenings with your harlot
And on Wednesdays it's your Charlatan analyst
He's high upon your list.

You've got air-conditioned sinuses
And dark disturbing doubt about
Religion and you keep those cards and Letters goin' out
While your secretary's tempting you
Your morals are exempting you from guilt and shame
Heaven knows you're not to blame.

You better take care of business Mr. Businessman
If you can
Before it's too late - and you throw your life away.

Did you see your children growing up today
And did you hear the music of their laughter
As they set about to play
Did you catch the fragrance of those Roses in your garden
Did the morning sunlight warm your soul
And brighten up your day
Do you qualify to be alive
Or is the limit of your senses so
As only to survive.

Spending counterfeit incentive
Wasting precious time and health
Placing value on the worthless
Disregarding priceless wealth
You can wheel and deal the best of them
And steal it from the rest of them
You know the score.

Eighty-six proof anesthetic crutches
Prop you to the top
Where the smiles are all synthetic
And the ulcers never stop
When they take that final inventory
Yours will be the same sad story
Everywhere
No one will really care
No one more lonely than
This rich important man
Let's have your autograph
Endorse your epitaph.

You better take care of business, Mr. Businessman
What's your plan
Get down to business Mr. Businessman
If you can.

JIM WEBB

I'm a lineman for the county and I drive the main road
Searching in the sun for another overload
I hear you singing in the wire I can hear you through the whine
And the Wichita lineman is still on the line.

I know I need a small vacation but it don't look like rain
And if it snows that stretch down south won't ever stand the strain
And I need you more than want you and
I want you for all times
And the Wichita lineman is still on the line.

And I need you more than want you and
I want you for all times
And the Wichita lineman is still on the line.

•DO YOU KNOW THE WAY TO SAN JOSE

(As recorded by Dionne Warwick/ Scepter)
HAL DAVID
BURT BACHARACH

Do you know the way to San Jose
I've been away so long
I may go wrong and lose my way
Do you know the way to San Jose
I'm goin' back to find some peace of mind in San Jose
L.A. is a great big freeway
Put a hundred down and buy a car
In a week maybe two they'll make you a star
Weeks turn into years
How quick they pass
And all the stars that never were
Are parking cars and pumping gas.

You can really breathe in San Jose
They've got a lot of space
There'll be a place where I can stay
I was born and raised in San Jose
I'm going back to find some peace of mind in San Jose
Fame and fortune is a magnet
It can pull you far away from home
With a dream in your heart
You've never alone
Dreams turn into dust and blow away
And there you are without a friend
You park your car and right away
I've got lots of friends in San Jose
Do you know the way to San Jose
Can't wait to get back to San Jose.

(As recorded by Billy Waller/ Monument)
BILLY WALKER

We're living in an age of worry
Living in a time of stress
A disappointment all around us
Very little happiness.

We're living in an age of worry
We're living in a time of fear
Life goes by in such a hurry
Tension mounting year by year.

We're living in an age of danger
No peace of mind to feed the soul
The whole world is quick to anger
Greed and power is its goal.

Somewhere there's got to be a rainbow
It's got to be in heaven up above
I'll keep looking for that rainbow
And I'll keep searching for his love.

We're living in an age of worry
Living in a time of stress
Disappointment all around us,
Very little happiness.

I think it's so groovy now
That people are finally getting together
I think it's so wonderful and how that people are finally getting together
Reach out in the darkness
Reach out in the darkness
Reach out in the darkness and you may find a friend.

I knew a man that I did not care for
And then one day this man gave me a call
We sat and talked about things on our mind
And now this man he is a friend of mine
Don't be afraid of love
Don't be afraid, don't be afraid to love
Everybody needs a little love
Everybody needs somebody that they can be thinking of

P. SAWYER
R.D. TAYLOR
F. WILSON
D. RICHARDS

You think that I don't feel
What I feel for you is real
In those eyes I see reflection
Hurt, scorn, rejected
Love child, never meant to be
Love child, born in poverty
Love child, never meant to be
Love child, take a look at me.

I started my life in an old cold rundown tenement slum
My father left, he never even married mom
I shared the guilt my momma knew
So afraid that others knew I had no name
This love we're contemplatin'
Is worth the pain of waiting
We'll only end up hating
The child we may be creating
Love child, never meant to be
Love child scorned by society
Love child always second best Love child different from the rest mmmmmbaby, mmmmmmbaby.

I started school in a worn torn dress that somebody threw out
I knew the way it felt to always live in doubt
To be without the simple things
So afraid my friends would see the guilt in me
Don't think that I don't need you
Don't think I don't want to please you
But no child of mine will be bearing
The name of shame it'll be wearing
Love child, love child never quite as good
Afraid, ashame, misunderstood
But I'll always love you, I'll always love you I'll always love you
I'll always love you, I'll always love you-ou-ou
You-ou-ou-ou
You-ou-ou-ou.

•STREET FIGHTING MAN

(As recorded by The Rolling Stones/London)

MICK JAGGER
KEITH RICHARD

Everywhere I hear the sound of marching, charging feet boy
'Cause summer's here and the time is right for fighting in the street boy
But what can a poor boy do
Except to sing for a rock and roll band
'Cause in sleepy London town
There's just no place for a street fighting man.

They think the time is right for a palace revolution
But where I live the game to play is compromise solution
(Repeat chorus).

They said my name is called disturbance
I'll shout and scream
I'll kill the King
I'll rail at all his servants
(Repeat chorus).

The people came and listened
Some of them came and played
Others gave flowers away
Yes they did
Down in Monterey
Down in Monterey.

The young gods smiled upon the crowd
Their music being born of love
Children danced night and day
Religion was being born down in Monterey.
The Byrds and the Airplane did fly
Oh Ravi Shankar's music made me cry

The Who exploded into fire and light
Hugh Masekela's music was black as night
The Grateful Dead blew everybody's mind
Jimi Hendrix people believe me set the world on fire
His Majesty Prince Jones smiled as he moved amongst the crowd
Ten thousand Electric Guitars were groovin' real loud
You wanna find the truth in life
Don't pass music by
And you know I did not lie, no I did not lie, no I did not lie
Down in Monterey.

Three days of understanding
Of moving with one another
Even the cops grooved with us
Do you believe me?
Yeah down in Monterey, down in Monterey.

•THOSE WERE THE DAYS

(As recorded by Mary Hopkin/Apple)

GENE RASKIN

Once upon a time there was a tavern
Where we used to raise a glass or two
Remember how we laughed away the hours
Think of all the great things we would do
Those were the days my friend
We thought they'd never end
We'd sing and dance forever and a day
We'd live the life we choose
We'd fight and never lose
For we were young and sure to have our way.

Then the busy years went rushing by us
We lost our starry notions on the way
If by chance I'd see you in the tavern
We'd smile at one another and we'd say
Those were the days my friend
We thought they'd never end
We'd sing and dance forever and a day
We'd live the life we choose
We'd fight and never lose
Those were the days, oh yes, those were the days.

Just tonight I stood before the tavern
Nothing seemed the way it used to be
In the glass I saw a strange reflection
Was that lonely woman really me
Those were the days my friend
We thought they'd never end
We'd sing and dance forever and a day
We'd live the life we choose
We'd fight and never lose
Those were the days, oh yes, those were the days.

Through the door there came familiar laughter
I saw your face and heard you call my name
Oh my friend we're older but no wiser
For in our hearts the dreams are still the same
Those were the days my friend
We thought they'd never end
We'd sing and dance forever and a day
We'd live the life we choose
We'd fight and never lose
Those were the days, oh yes, those were the days.

Didn't I make you feel like you were the only man
Didn't I give you everything that a woman possibly can
But with all the love I give you
It's never enough
But I'm gonna show you baby that a woman can be tough
So go on, go on, go on, go on and take another little piece of my heart now baby
Break another little bit of my heart now honey
Have another little piece of my heart now baby
You know you got it if it makes you feel good.

You're out on the street
And you know deep down in your heart that ain't right
And you never, never hear me when I cry at night
I tell myself that I can't stand the pain
But when you hold me in your arms
I say it again
So go on, go on, go on, go on
And take it
Take another little piece of my heart now baby
Break another little bit of my heart now baby
You can have another little piece of my heart now baby
You know you got it if it makes you feel good.

•HARPER VALLEY PTA

(As recorded by Jeanie C. Riley/Plantation)
TOM T. HALL

I want to tell you all a story 'bout a Harper Valley widowed wife
Who had a teenage daughter who attended Harper Valley Junior High

Well her daughter came home one afternoon and didn't even stop to play
She said, mom I got a note here from the Harper Valley PTA.

The note said, Mrs. Johnson you're wearing your dresses way too high
It's reported you've been drinking and runnin' around with men and going wild

We don't believe you ought to be bringing up your little girl this way
It was signed by the secretary, Harper Valley PTA.

Well, it happened that the PTA was gonna meet that very afternoon
They were sure surprised when Mrs. Johnson wore her mini-skirt into the room
As she walked up to the blackboard, I still recall the words she had to say
She said, I'd like to address this meeting of the Harper Valley PTA.

Well, there's Bobby Taylor sittin' there and seven times he's asked me for a date
Mrs. Taylor sure seems to use a lot of ice whenever he's away

And Mr. Baker, can you tell us why your secretary had to leave this town
And shouldn't widow Jones be told to keep her window shades all pulled completely down.

Well, Mr. Harper couldn't be here cause he stayed too long at Kelly's bar again
And if you smell Shirley Thompson's breath you'll find she's had a little nip of gin

Then you have the nerve to tell me you think that as a mother I'm not fit
Well this is just a little Peyton Place and you're all Harper Valley hypocrites.

No I wouldn't put you on because it really did
It happened just this way
The day my mama socked it to the Harper Valley PTA.

Small Time Laboring Man

As recorded by George Jones on Musicor

E. Montgomery and G. Jones

A dollar an hour, eight hours a day,
Will soon make a young man wither away.
I work for my family with my wrinkled hands,
For I'm a small time laboring man.

Six long days each week, I toil and I sweat,
But on Sunday, my family gives me comfort and rest.
Then again come Monday morning, I'll make tracks
in the sand,
For I'm a small time laboring man.

I'm a small time laboring man,
Fighting against trying moments again.
I fight for my country, with my calloused hands,
For I'm a small time laboring man.

Twelve months each year, my life stays the same, Making my honest dollar in the sun, snow and rain,
Though you don't see my family on the starvation plan,
For I'm a small time laboring man.

Say it Loud I'm Black and I'm Proud

As recorded by James Brown/King

James Brown

Say it loud, I'm black and I'm proud
Say it loud, I'm black and I'm proud
Some people say we got a lot of malice
Some say it's a lot of nerve
But I say we won't quit moving
Until we get what we deserve
We've been buked and we've been scorned
We've been treated bad, talked about as sure as you're born
But just as sure as it takes two eyes to make a pair
Brother we can't quit until we get our share.

Whoee out of sight tomorrow night it's tough
You're tough enough whooee it's hurting me
Say it loud, I'm black and I'm proud
Say it loud, I'm black and I'm proud
Say it loud, I'm black and I'm proud

I've worked on jobs with my feet and my hands
But all that work I did was for the other man
Now we demand a chance to do things for ourselves
We're tired of beating our head against the wall
And working for someone else
We're people we're like the birds and the bees
But we'd rather die on our feet than keep living on our knees.

People Got To Be Free

As recorded by The Rascals on Atlantic

F. Cavaliere and E. Borgati

All the world over, so easy to see;
People everywhere just want to be free.
Listen to you, listen, that's the way it should be,
Peace in the valley, people got to be free.

You should see, what a lovely, lovely world this'd be,
Everyone learned to live together. Uh-hu . . .
Seems to me, such an easy, easy thing should be,
Why can't you and me learn to love one another?

All the world over, so easy to see;
People everywhere just want to be free.
I can't understand, it's so simple to me,
People everywhere just got to be free.

If there's a man, who is down and needs a helping hand,
All it takes is you to understand and to pull him through. Uh-uh . . .
Seems to me, we got to solve it individually,
uh-uh . . .
And I'll do unto you what you do to me.

Shout it from the mountains or up to the sea,
No two ways about it, people have to be free.
Ask me my opinion, my opinion will be,
That's the situation for a man to be free.

Oh, what a feeling just come over me,
Enough to move a mountain with a blind man's lead.
Everybody got to see my heart is so free,
Peace in the valley, now it ought to be free.

See that train?
That's the train of freedom.
It's about to arrive any minute.
You know it's been long, long overdue.
Look out, coming right on through.

New York Mine Disaster, 1941

As recorded by the BeeGees on Atco.

B. & R. Gibb

In the event of something happening to me,
There is something I would like you all to see.
It's just a photograph of someone that I knew.
Have you seen my wife, Mr. Jones?
Do you know what it's like on the outside?
Don't go talking too loudly, you'll cause a landslide, Mr. Jones.

I keep straining my ears to hear a sound,
Maybe someone is digging underground.
Or have they given up and all gone home to bed,
Thinking those who once existed must be dead?

PAUL ANTHONY
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

A Council to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South

March 25, 1969

TO: CWA Staff in Southern and Border States

Hoagy Young, CWA Director of Education, has requested that your name be placed on the Southern Regional Council's publications mailing list. You will receive our quarterly, New South, and other occasional publications of the Council.

This first mailing includes two pamphlets that I think you will find of special interest: Radicalism: Southern Style and Voter Registration in the South, 1968.

Our schedule is such that you will soon get several other reports. In general, however, you will not receive so many so close together.

We are extremely pleased to have you receive our publications and trust that you will feel free to communicate with us about them.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via

president [illegible]
Workers since 1965, [illegible] named CWA secretary-treasurer to succeed William A. Smallwood, effective Apr. 1.

Smallwood, who served in the office since 1955, previously announced his resignation for "compelling personal reasons."

He was honored for his years of service by friends at a testimonial dinner in Washington Mar. 31.

The union's executive board, which selected Watts as Smallwood's successor, also named Gus C. Cramer, assistant to CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, to succeed Watts.

The full slate of CWA officers, including secretary-treasurer and executive vice president, will be subject to election at the union's convention in June. The assistant to the president is an appointive office.

GLENN E. WATTS

Watts came to serve CWA full-time in 1948 as president of the union's former Division 36, comparable to the present Local 2336 which represents telephone workers in the District of Columbia.

He was elected president of CWA District 2, covering five eastern states and the District of Columbia, in 1951. He was appointed assistant to the president in 1956 and has served as executive vice president since May 1965.

Cramer also came on CWA's staff in 1948, as assistant to the president of the union's District 6, embodying five southwestern states. He became a special representative in 1951, was named assistant to an executive vice president in 1958, and has served as Beirne's assistant since 1963.

ATLANTA, GA. VOL. I, NO. 7 FEBRUARY, 1970

Atlanta:

Leadership Crisis Over the Schools

INTEGRATION of Atlanta's public schools has created scenes reminiscent of smaller towns in the early 1960s. In a SOUTH TODAY Report, William Winn concludes that the city's leadership has faltered and its reputation has been scarred. Will responsible leadership now take hold? Pages 4, 5.

Child Nutrition? Food Industry First

CHILD NUTRITION programs become, at the state and local levels, "incoherent shambles," says a new report. Congress has "paid lip service to a moral responsibility for child nutrition," but the interests of the food industry come first. By Claire Brown. Page 2.

The Guns of Texas

South Leads In Killings

It happened nine days after Nixon administration spokesmen told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee there was no need for new gun control legislation. It happened, as coincidence would have it, six days after the president's Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence jarred the status quo with its recommendation that the federal government confiscate the 24 million handguns owned by private citizens. It happened where it usually happens, in a poor section of town.

Mrs. Nettie Loper, a 69-year-old widow and pensioner who for the past 14 years had lived in a predominantly white housing project in the predominantly black and brown eastside of Austin, stepped outside to empty her garbage and was killed by a stray .38-caliber bullet.

It was the first time Mrs. Loper ever had her name in the newspaper. The homicide obit attracted 10 paragraphs. In a slightly longer editorial the same newspaper, the Austin American-Statesman, reflected on the Violence Commission's report and observed that the president was being put in another of those "damned-if-he-does, damned-if-he-doesn't" situations. Caught in the crossfire, so to speak. . . .

Uptown Country Music

COUNTRY music "is probably the musical phenomenon of our time," Paul Hemphill says, and Nashville has become the world's second-largest recording center. 'Food Industry's Interests Placed Ahead of Nutrition for Children'

REPORT ON REPORTS

by CLAIRE BROWN

hy Child Nutrition Programs Fail, by Rodney E. Leonard for the Children's Foundation, Washington, D. C., is an interesting excursion into the bureaucratic muddle of the school lunch program. The basic flaw is a deep one.

"While Congress, both in the National School Lunch Act of 1946 and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966, paid lip service to a moral responsibility for child nutrition, the legislation and the form of its administration are predicated on economic interests. . . . As a result, the administrative structure of the child nutrition programs is a means primarily of distributing inadequate resources in such a manner as to minimize the possibility of fraud in the programs and, therefore, public censure, rather than to respond to human need. . . .

"At the state and local levels, where legal authority presumably rests, the child nutrition programs are incoherent shambles. One example of the gross mis-administration of the program by the states is the apparent diversion of millions of dollars appropriated to supply free and reduced-price lunches for needy children. Under Section 25 of the Agricultural Appropriations Act of 1968, engineered by Rep. Carl Perkins, an additional $45 million was authorized (for free lunches). . . . But most states apparently are using these funds to hold down the prices of regular school lunches—in effect, benefiting the middle-class youngsters and diluting a special effort to provide an adequate diet for the poor."

(According to the U.S.D.A. statistics, 32.6 million Perkins dollars were spent for an additional 400,000 free lunches daily; the total $45 million was supposed to provide at least 1.4 million additional free lunches daily.)

"More than seven out of 10 states did not provide free lunches to the equivalent of half of the children used to justify the amount of Title I (educationally disadvantaged) money the states receive. . . .

"The federal government, if it recognizes the problem, has done little about it. . . . The federal bureaucracy is . . . more responsive to its own internal dynamics . . . than it is to the Presidency. . . .

"The program forms and procedures which the (Food and Nutrition Service) agency uses are more important to providing the appropriation committees with a mechanical accounting than to informing the Congress whether the health and well-being of children are being protected. . . . The report of the hearings before the House Appropriations Subcommittee . . . is a realistic example. . . . No question was raised to determine if the funds were adequate, or whether the programs were reaching all the individuals who needed help, or how many individuals were in need of assistance. . . .

"While the appropriation committees tell the administration to go slow on child nutrition programs, there is no similar record on caution on funds to purchase meat when cattle prices fall. . . . The needs of the child nutrition program rarely enter into (commodity purchasing) considerations (though more than 10 per cent of federal resources are in the form of commodities). . . . Where considerations do enter, it usually is to reassure those making the purchase decision that the child-feeding outlets can use the food products which may be purchased. . . . Obviously, in the struggle to establish priorities, the human nutrition advocates failed to convince the Secretary that the person in need of food should be given equal recognition with producing groups and processing industries. . . .

"Program management is weak and program direction is unaggressive at the (federal) agency level. . . . (There is) a lack of clear administrative policy . . . (and) inadequate procedures for maintaining budgetary control. . . . (There is) no means whatever to detect when programs operating under a block grant begin to drift from their intended purpose (e.g., the Perkins funds). . . . There is no policy and planning section. . . .

"In addition, underscoring the casual attitude to these very real problems, appropriations . . . for the 1969-70 school year were not approved by Congress until mid-November and had not been signed by the President and thus released to the states even as Thanksgiving week began. . . .

"Short of forcing the program to be measured by larger standards, the federal response in child nutrition will continue in the pattern reflected by current appropriations and expenditures . . . as follows: Child feeding and nutrition goals are given secondary roles to the demands of the food industry; (and) . . . growth in program resources is a measure of public pressure and not any recognizable plan.

". . . If the states appear indifferent to the existence of hunger among children, the attitude may be a reflection of that at the highest levels of government."

or a more intimate look at the school lunch program, IMPACT! Reports sent Charles Remsberg to Floyd County, Ky., part of the congressional district of Rep. Carl Perkins. Floyd County has a single industry, coal mining, and a single school district, with 35 schools. Of these, 32 have lunch programs. Floyd county, like many of its neighboring counties, is an economically depressed area. In these areas, Remsberg discovered how the school lunch program is run:

Children are forced to work, in exchange for lunch, in violation of federal regulations. Children unable to buy or bring lunch are forced to sit, hungry, in the lunchroom as others eat. Parents keep children home rather than let them be hungry at school—and officials do not object. Promises of free school lunches have been used to buy votes. Students at some schools have no lunch program because teachers consider it "inconvenient."

In the absence of objective and uniform standards of eligibility, poor children are denied lunch on personal and arbitrary grounds by local principals. While parents complain, school officials blandly insist "all children who want to eat are being fed."

In particular, back to Floyd County: During the last school year, the county school district received $117,684 worth of government food supplies and $83,025 in reimbursements for school lunch programs. But non-participation in the lunch program was running as high as 45 and 50 per cent in some schools, in this low- and no-income area.

Superintendent Charles Clark feels that full compliance with federal regulations on eligibility for free lunches would wreck the system entirely: "If we do give free lunches according to federal guidelines," he was quoted in the local newspaper as saying, "no Floyd County school lunchroom would be open after two days and no child would be getting a free lunch. Not a child goes hungry, not a child will go hungry. But these lunchrooms must be kept in the black. We are feeding everyone who qualifies for it and wants a free lunch."

SOUTH TODAY A Digest of Southern Affairs

SOUTH TODAY is published by the Leadership Project of the Southern Regional Council, 5 Forsyth St., N.W., Atlanta Ga., 30303. The Southern Regional Council, founded in 1944, is a research and information agency devoted to the attainment of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South. President: Raymond M. Wheeler, Charlotte, N.C.; Vice Presidents: Josephine Wilkins, Athens, Ga.; Frank Smith, Knoxville, Tenn.; Charles G. Gomillion, Tuskegee, Ala.; Lucius H. Pitts, Birmingham, Ala. Executive Director: Paul Anthony.

Reese Cleghorn, Editor Katherine S. Griffith, Assistant Editor

Some of the articles used in SOUTH TODAY have been edited for length. We welcome clippings which may be of use. They should indicate the date and the publication from which they came.

Feedback

N its December issue, SOUTH TODAY reported that victims of Hurricane Camille on the Gulf Coast had been neglected and exploited. It summarized the findings of a team of investigators sent to the area by the Southern Regional Council and the American Friends Service Committee. The team had traveled 2,500 miles and talked to 250 people.

That issue also reprinted a New Yorker article by Calvin Trillin from the scene. We believe Senate subcommittee hearings on the coast, which resulted from the SRC-AFSC inquiry, have confirmed SOUTH TODAY's report and Mr. Trillin's. But there are other opinions. One was sent to us by Robert McHugh, associate editor of the Daily Herald of Biloxi-Gulfport. The following is from a column which he wrote for his paper:

"Scarcely a day passes that something doesn't turn up in print in the national media about the Mississippi Gulf Coast and its effort to recover from Hurricane Camille.

". . . Calvin Trillin of New Yorker Magazine took a casual look at Pass Christian from which he drew some rather bizarre conclusions. . . .

". . . Mr. Trillin seizes upon an unguarded comment by a Pass Christian cafe proprietor to imply that our normal condition is one of greed. In his article, Mr. Trillin passes on a second-hand report that somebody had stolen some American flags and had this cafe man muttering, 'The normal greed has started. It's just the normal greed.'

"In the New Yorker format, a blend of self-conscious sophistication and condescension, people frequently repeat themselves. Saying something twice instead of once somehow adds authenticity to the quote.

"Apparently, the formula is effective. A publication of The Southern Regional Council called SOUTH TODAY, A Digest of Southern Affairs, reprints Mr. Trillin's article. The headline display includes the errant quote in bright red script letters: 'Just Normal Greed.' . . .

"In that smooth New Yorker prose that has been imitating itself for the past 20 years with such phenomenal success, Mr. Trillin says our 'capacity for outrage seems limited.' . . . And he says this column sounded barely irritated when it discussed the makeup of the Mississippi Insurance Commission and commented on its decision to raise wind damage rates 50 per cent on the Gulf Coast.

"Our irritation was, indeed, barely discernible. This was probably because we went to the trouble to determine that the hazard rates on the Gulf Coast, even with the 50 per cent increase, would be less than the rates on the Louisiana and Texas Gulf Coasts and just a bit above those in effect on the Florida Coast. . . .

"And at the risk of giving currency to Mr. Trillin's charge that we are a complacent bunch, we will add that the New Yorker piece barely irritates us. Mr. Trillin's account is entertaining, if not penetrating, and we overheard a green-grocer in Biloxi saying of it:

'I liked that New Yorker piece. I liked that New Yorker piece.' "

Country Fiddles

Nashville and Its Singers Have Gone Uptown . . . Big

By PAUL HEMPHILL
In The Atlanta Journal-Constitution Magazine

Waylon Jennings at Country Music Hall of Fame.

ountry music was always the exclusive property of the white Southern working class. The intellectual had his Bach. The Negro had his Chuck Berry. The middle-age professional had his Glenn Miller. The suburban housewife had her Sinatra. The graduate student had his Brubeck. But the Southern farmer and mechanic and truck driver and route salesman had his Roy Acuff and his Lefty Frizzell and his Hank Williams, and when the steamy Southern Saturday came to an end you could find him mesmerized in front of a radio, the whole family huddled around a big stand-up Zenith, souls being cleansed, cares being whisked away, spirits being lifted, as the glorious sounds of the Grand Ole Opry crackled all the way in from Ryman Auditorium in Nashville, Tennessee.

Acuff singing about "The Great Speckled Bird." Williams, poor and tortured and lonesome Hank, doing "I'll Never Get Out of This World Alive." Lefty cracking his voice, sliding all over the scale, being aped by every good old boy in every gas station in east Texas. Country music was theirs because it talked to them. It told about hard times and drinking and Jesus and cheating hearts, which were always with the lower white Southern classes.

I remember riding over the Blue Ridge with my old man, the four-ton Dodge about to drown out WCKY Cincinnati as a girl singer named Jean Shepard belted out a song called "A Dear John Letter," all about a GI in Korea getting walking papers from his love back home. "Hell of a thing to do to some old boy, ain't it?" my old man would say afterwards, as though he had just heard the 6 o'clock news.

It was called "hillbilly music" then, something the rest of the country barely knew existed. It was a scratchy, undisciplined, backwoodsy cacophony of grating fiddles and twanging guitars and singers with head colds. The stars were country boys a half-step off the farm, musicians who couldn't read a lick of music and wouldn't admit it if they could. The arenas were the county fairs and the tent shows and the courthouse squares and the low-watt local radio stations of the rural South, radio stations represented by the frantic voices of jakeleg preachers and drawling disc jockeys wailing pitches for cure-all elixirs and plastic Jesuses into the night, and the boundaries of country music were the boundaries of the South.

It was the music of the South, by the South, for the South. The only time any Yankees came around was when they stopped off at the Opry, on the way to Miami Beach, to see what the freaks were up to.

Now, of course, country music is something else, indeed. It is probably the musical phenomenon of our time. During the 60s, the number of full-time country radio stations zoomed from 80 to more than 400—and every city outside the South, cities like Detroit and Philadelphia and Boston, had a country station that was making a killing in its area. More than a dozen stars had weekly television shows syndicated all over the country, some of them carried in upwards of 100 markets.

In 1968 and '69, the television networks brimmed with country music: weekly prime-time shows like Glen Campbell's and Johnny Cash's and "Hee Haw." Country stars were now performing at Carnegie Hall and at the London Palladium, in Japan and Germany, in Los Angeles and Chicago and Detroit (where a country show drew an all-time-high gross gate of $93,000 from 24,000 fans). Country stars had never had it so good—Johnny Cash grossed $2 million last year, Glen Campbell demanded $30,000 for a concert, and at least a dozen others earned more than $25,000 a year—but the same could be said of musicians in other branches who came running to Nashville to capture what had been coined as "the Nashville Sound."

Dean Martin and Frank Sinatra were cutting albums of Nashville-written songs like "Gentle on My Mind" and "Little Green Apples," Bob Dylan was recording an album in Nashville called "Nashville Skyline," and it was beginning to look like any pop star who didn't record "By the Time I Get to Phoenix" didn't really care about his career. Explanations of the sudden influence and popularity of country music zeroed in on the sociological and demographic events of the post-World War II period.

"The big thing was all of these people moving out of the South to make more money," says Dick Blake, the top booker of talent in Nashville, explaining how transplanted Southerners took their music with them and created a demand for it that ended in a compromise—Northern and Eastern big-city radio stations gave them "countrypolitan," a hybrid that was pleasing to Yankee and Rebel ears, a hybrid that has replaced the foot-stomping "hillbilly" music we once knew.

Whatever the causes, the effect has been to make Nashville the second-largest recording center in the world: "Music City, U.S.A.," the home of the Grand Ole Opry, spiritual center of every country boy who ever picked a guitar, chief benefactor of the $100 million a-year country music industry. For all of these years Nashville prided itself as a center of higher education and printing and other sophisticated pursuits. Until recently the city called itself the "Athens of the South," but now it is known, to the world at large, as Hillbilly Heaven. Three out of five mail inquiries to the Chamber of Commerce deal with country music.

Nashville's elite don't necessarily like the image, but they can't deny the facts.

"Sure, I love country music," is a typical comment. "It isn't every day you can pick up an industry like that." The boys on Music Row—the local term for the eight-square-block area about two miles from downtown, near Vanderbilt and the Negro slums, where the city's music industry is located—would be miffed at Elite Nashville if they had that kind of time. But the fact is, Music Row is too busy raking in cash to worry about things like that.

Scheduling their first recording session at 10 a.m. and finishing their last one of the day at 1 o'clock the next morning, the city's 21 studios (five years ago there were only 10) produce more 45-r.p.m. records than any other city in the world. There are more than 1,500 union musicians and an equal number of songwriters in Nashville, served by 29 talent agencies, seven record-pressing plants, 400 publishing houses, 53 record companies, offices for three performing rights organizations, and seven trade papers.

The name of the game now is money, and modernistic new buildings are sprouting along Sixteenth and Seventeenth Avenues South like spring-pea stalks. Leggy secretaries swish down the sidewalks. Shiny Cadillacs park close to the buildings, like fine hunting dogs hiding from summer heat under front porches. Johnny Cash sneaks in the back door of the Columbia studios, shades wrapped around his fierce eyes, going in to get himself another Gold Album. Agents arrange high-paying dates for their stars in Canada, telephoning on these new push-button phones in deep-carpeted offices. Refurbished buses that cost more than $50,000 and sleep nine wait in the alleyways, being revved up for 20-day one-nighter tours.

The sound of an 18-year-old star who is from Bastrop, La., and owns a Cadillac floats from a studio when somebody opens a back door during a session. Two stars, both of them wearing tight Western-cut flared trousers and striped turtlenecks, sit on the curb in front of RCA Victor's three-story building and argue the relative merits of owning stock in Minnie Pearl's Fried Chicken and something established like, say, Standard Oil. Okie-born star Merle Haggard, in from Bakersfield, Calif., for a week of howling among friends, kicks a beer can and points himself toward the Country Music Hall of Fame building, where they've got some of Jimmie Rodgers' things to look at.

Merle Haggard. It is important for me to say more, much more, about Merle Haggard now because he represents all of the things that are real and honest and good and true about country music. Or the country music that used to be and should be, but no longer is except in isolated cases. A lot of people don't realize how much country music has changed over the last 20 years, from the days when it was called "hillbilly" music, except to note that it is not, as one recording executive in Nashville told me, "so damned nasal, you know, whiny."

The real changes haven't been in technology, although the new recording equipment has made a big difference; or in subject matter, even though Roger Miller's swinging don't-give-a-damn hobo of "King of the Road" is quite a switch from the somewhat maudlin railroad bum of Jimmie Rodgers' time. The greatest change—the greatest loss—has been a very simple and a very critical one. It is, plainly, an absence of the feeling, the bared-and-stripped heart, the unabashed soul, that is, I think, causing country music to flatten out and become just another slightly unique branch of music—just like the South, itself, this South that was always so proud and defiant and singular, this South that allowed "hillbilly" music to nourish, has flattened out and lost, in its feverish grab at the brass ring, its identity.

ATLANTA: Schools Order Reveals A Crisis of Leadership

A SOUTH TODAY EDITORIAL REPORT By WILLIAM WINN

The failure of public officials to meet the responsibilities of their offices is an old, sad fact of life in the South. It was not particularly surprising, then, when public officials in Mississippi reacted angrily and irrationally to the "instant" desegregation order from the U. S. Supreme Court on Oct. 29. No one was surprised, either, that Georgia's Gov. Lester Maddox spewed his own peculiar, stammering rhetoric when the high court's decision finally worked its way down the legal ladder to apply to some Georgia schools.

Southerners have come to expect such reactions from the majority of their elected officials, and, all over the South, ambitious political luminaries dutifully responded to the federal court's immediate faculty and student desegregation order with florid invective and righteous indignation. It was, on the whole, too good an opportunity for them to pass up.

But what was surprising, to Southerners and to people all over the nation, was the reaction to the court order in Atlanta, a city widely publicized as a model of racial harmony in the South and possessing, for the past eight years, one of America's most respected public servants, Mayor Ivan Allen Jr.

Wasn't Atlanta the home of Martin Luther King Jr.? Wasn't it the city where Ralph McGill held sway over public opinion with his reasoned pleas for calm and racial justice? Wasn't it the city of the Atlanta Constitution and its Pulitzer Prize-winning editor, Eugene Patterson? The home of Julian Bond? The city which elected a Jewish mayor and a Negro vice mayor in October? Wasn't it the "city too busy to hate," the booming, glittering, seething metropolis that spawned the New South? Wasn't it the one city in the entire region where the public was certain to accept the integration order with wisdom and moderation gained from a decade of responsible leadership which had carefully and thoroughly educated the people in their duties and responsibilities as citizens of a changing nation? Well, wasn't it?

If it was, then who could explain the collapse of public leadership when, after 12 years of legal maneuvering and moral foot-shuffling, Atlanta was faced with the immediate prospect of having to fully integrate its public school system? Who could explain the unpreparedness of the city's residents and then the chanting, snaking line of white students demonstrating against integration, led, be it known, by their mentors, their educators, their teachers, in a racist promenade to the federal court and, finally, to their leader, Lester Maddox, the old Denunciator, who, in the moment of his glory, admonished students and teachers alike to boycott the schools and break the law of the land?

For those in Atlanta and across the nation who expected better of Atlanta, it was a little like hearing that Mary Poppins really is a junkie.

The commotion started in the second week of January, when 3,000 Atlanta students, some led by their teachers, took to the streets in 12-degree weather shouting "Hell no, we won't go!" and "We want Lester!" in protest against the U. S. District Court order to the city's Board of Education to prepare plans for immediate faculty integration. Actually, it should have been clear to everyone that such an order would be forthcoming ever since the U. S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals' Dec. 1 ruling in Singleton vs. Jackson, a landmark civil rights case, in which the Jackson (Miss.) Board of Education was ordered to prepare for faculty integration by Feb. 1, 1970, and for student integration by the fall. Yet, the Atlanta Board of Education did little more than wring its hands in the face of the court's decision, and nothing whatsoever was done to prepare the city's residents for what was coming. Perhaps Atlanta's board members were somewhat stunned by the Circuit Court decision and by the U. S. Supreme Court's ruling involving 30 Mississippi school districts. That was the ruling which struck down the "all deliberate speed" wording of the 1954 Brown decision and ordered an immediate end to segregation in the respective school districts. (See the Southern Regional Council's Special Report entitled "The Federal Retreat In School Desegregation," December, 1969.)

At any rate, on Dec. 16 U. S. District Judge Frank Hooper ordered the Atlanta Board of Education to be prepared for a Jan. 12 hearing, with plans for faculty and student integration. Although that order came in mid-December, it was the first week in January before Atlantans heard much about it, and the second week in January before the public's reaction, which seemed to be a mixture of anger, over not having been fairly warned, and disbelief, set in. In the meantime, there was little but silence from Atlanta's political, business, civic and religious leaders on the impending developments.

When they finally realized what was happening, many of Atlanta's teachers formed an organization to combat the Board of Education's plan for faculty integration, the students took to the streets, and even the system's athletic coaches got into the act, several of the more assured announcing they would quit rather than switch to another school. Atlanta School Supt. John W. Letson, hitherto a reticent moderate on the racial question, was moved to tell the students that their demonstrations presented a picture of "an outpouring of racism" to the nation, which indeed they did, and he publicly warned students and teachers that they would face disciplinary action if they disrupted orderly integration. Letson received little public support from his board, half of whose members were newly elected, and though great improvements over their predecessors, seemed cautious and unaccustomed to their power. He got no help at first from the council of the Parent-Teacher Association, which issued a unanimous resolution dubbing the court's faculty integration order "just as unconstitutional as making assignments on a segregated basis."

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals noted that 57 per cent of the city's teachers were black and 43 per cent white. To break the pattern of discriminatory hiring and discriminatory assignment that still prevailed, after 15 years of foot-dragging, it resorted to a sweeping order. It said every school in the city system must have a faculty 57 per cent black and 43 per cent white, by Feb. 1. To accomplish this, about 1,800 of the system's approximately 5,000 teachers would have to be transferred to other schools within the system.

It was during this critical period that Gov. Maddox, the balding, bespectacled former restaurateur, was calling for the students and teachers to boycott the schools, and daring Letson to take disciplinary action if they did. Maddox, who hopes to succeed himself as governor if he can legally overcome the Georgia Constitution's prohibition against second terms, used his State of the State address before the legislature to attack the "police state" tactics of the federal courts and urged parents to enroll their children in private schools. He also was busy preparing a bill to repeal the state's compulsory attendance law. (Georgia, it should be mentioned, leads the nation in school dropouts. Maddox, in fact, is a dropout himself.)

POLITICIANS

1970 is an election year in Georgia, and a number of gubernatorial hopefuls put their wares on display.

Compt. Gen. James L. Bentley, a recent convert to the GOP, declared that a student demonstration in protest of the faculty desegregation order was "the first demonstration at the State Capitol in 35 years that I have wanted to join." (Among the marches which have passed the Capitol during Bentley's tenure as state comptroller general was Dr. Martin Luther King's funeral procession.)

State Sen. Oliver Bateman, apparently Bentley's main competition for the Republican gubernatorial nomination, surprised a number of political pundits who had him pegged as a racial moderate. It looked as if both major GOP hopefuls in the Georgia governor's race are taking their cues from their segregationist Democratic governor.

In fact, Sen. Bateman publicly supported parents protesting school integration in Macon, his home town. He went to Washington on behalf of "slow-down" efforts and generally played the old Southern political game of holding out hope for a reprieve from enforcement of the law. Bateman suggested, however, that Maddox's call for a boycott of Atlanta schools and his support of student protest marchers were "disruptive and endangering the public schools in Georgia." He said the federal courts "have gone too far," but also said laws must be obeyed.

The only state politicians to speak out loudly, clearly and immediately for reason were former Gov. Carl Sanders, a Democratic gubernatorial candidate this year, and former Gov. Ernest Vandiver. Both men established somewhat shaky reputations as racial moderates during their terms. On the same day that Maddox was urging students and teachers to boycott the schools, Sanders called for an end to "mob rule" and said that Atlantans "just can't pull the house of education down on our heads." (Georgia politicians talk that way.) Vandiver, who was on the hot seat when Georgia was first ordered to integrate its schools (and who played a leading role in seeing that they remained open), issued the strongest statement of any political leader in the state or the city up to that time. Said Vandiver: "I urge the people in control, the local and state school superintendents, to work it out and explain it to the people . . . I think what the leaders should do is explain it to the people as best they can and do what they have to do . . . Taking to the streets I would not consider responsible, and leaders have got to be responsible."

The man who may be Sanders' principal opponent for the Democratic nomination for governor (unless Gov. Maddox does become a candidate), former State Sen. Jimmy Carter, also has been regarded as a racial moderate. But what he said on television sounded like the kind of statement segregationist politicians made during the 1950's. He said that "both black and white leaders recognize the natural desire of most students to associate primarily with others of their own background, interests and heritage," and he added: "Those who wish to associate with those not of their own heritage should have the right to do so but not be forced into it." Carter later made comments that sounded much less like a call to the defense of an illegal status quo, but, in the meantime, his position must have set well with George Wallace's admirers.

As of mid-January, residents of Atlanta had seen very little evidence of concern on the part of the city's leaders, who were, for the most part, strangely quiet. Neither new Mayor Sam Massell, a man with a liberal reputation who swept to victory in the October city election on a huge Negro vote, nor retiring Mayor Allen, who had bitterly opposed Massell, had had much to say. Massell, cautious in the use of his unfamiliar authority and perhaps anxious not to worsen a schism between his office and some of the city's more conservative business leadership, issued a firm but mild statement on Jan. 11 calling for a "positive approach" to compliance and asking that people "face this matter in a calm manner." Massell seemed anxious not to commit the powers of his office too soon in a situation which, privately, he knew might get worse when the actual integration began. Still, it was a questionable decision on his part not to intervene forcefully. For his part, Allen was mostly quiet. He spoke up once, noting that the people of Atlanta had always faced crises with "wisdom" and asking the court for a delay until March 4 for faculty integration. (Judge Hooper granted the delay.)

BUSINESS LEADERS

The relative quiet of both Massell and Allen was surprising, but the new-found taciturnity of the city's business leaders, particularly the leaders of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, was astonishing. It was the Chamber, so the story goes, that, through its mixture of business and civic leaders (almost one and the same under Allen), had reputedly forged the climate of racial tolerance in the '60's which was at least partially responsible for the city's great economic growth and for creating, nationally, Atlanta's reputation as the most progressive city in the South. Yet, here were the same business leaders, faced with a crisis of potentially city-wrecking proportions, and by mid-January all they had mustered was a sickly resolution, urging calm and support of the school board, which not all of the Chamber's board of directors would even sign. (Jesse Hill, a Negro who sits on the board, refused to sign because the resolution said Atlanta had an excellent school system, an assertion with which Mr. Hill and most Atlanta Negroes take violent exception.) Meanwhile, public officials and private citizens who went to the Chamber's offices urging that the Chamber take a position of strong leadership in the developing crisis were turned away with negative responses.

Some of the mainstays of the city's downtown business community were still smarting from the wounds of the October city elections. Politically victorious since 1937 in the mayoralty races, the "power structure" had seen its candidate, Rodney Cook, defeated by a combination that included black voters, white liberal voters and leaders of organized labor.

THE PRESS

While the city's business leadership licked its wounds, the Atlanta press, normally competent in dealing with racial questions after the fact, as late as mid-January still seemed confused at times as to what exactly was going on either in court or in the city's schools. It was a mixed performance, in part good and in part insensitive or careless, at least. On Jan. 8 the Atlanta Journal's eight-column headline in the late edition suggested a panic of teachers: "NUMBER OF ATLANTA TEACHERS APPLYING FOR JOBS IN SUBURBS." The story did not support what was, on the face of it, a "scare" headline." It revealed that no one knew the number of teachers who had applied and, from the facts in the story, the number at that point appeared to be small. The next day the Constitution had a sports-page story headlined: "City Faces Mass Coaches Walkout." Most of the coaches, according to the story, resented being transferred from schools at which they had established successful programs, but the story offered little evidence of a "mass coaches walkout."

On the positive side, Editor Reg Murphy of the Constitution wrote several columns, before leadership was much in evidence anywhere, strongly urging compliance. (He supplemented moral arguments with a familiar one: that Atlanta should ponder what the rest of the nation would think if it failed to integrate its schools peacefully.) And in the Journal, several strong editorials urged compliance with the law, on moral as well as civic and business grounds. Both papers' education reporters worked hard to explain the complex situation, and both did respectable jobs. Yet—and there seemed to be little argument among informed Atlantans on the subject—neither paper seemed to be playing the forceful role it had taken in some previous crises.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS

Procrastination on the part of the city's civic and business leaders provoked the wrath of Atlanta's Negro community. On Jan. 10, the Rev. Sam Williams, a Negro and Atlanta's "Clergyman of the Year," finally accused the city's traditionally timorous Christians of moral pussyfooting, and said they should come out positively for integration "because it is right . . . If they can't say that, then they ought to keep their mouths shut."

The next day, Atlanta Archbishop Thomas A. Donnellan announced that no public school students would be able to transfer to Catholic schools in the city to avoid integration. The statement came at the right time: many of Atlanta's white parents were trying to get their children into some of the city's northside private schools. Headmasters at Westminster and Lovett, two of Atlanta's best private schools, said they had capacity student enrolments, but one such institution of learning, Pace Academy, appeared eager to fill up its student quota any way possible. The administration there announced it would hold a "special test session" to accommodate students fleeing the public school system.

THE OLD BOARD

For their part, the city's Negroes had never been altogether certain where the business-political leadership stood, even during the administration of Ivan Allen. Behind the city's glossy "image," there were two Atlantas. A part of the bad Atlanta was the city's public school system. By Jan. 11, 1970, the Board of Education had been in court for exactly 12 years fighting to slow integration. During that period, the board's attorney, A. C. "Pete" Latimer, and his assistants had made more than 290 legal maneuvers designed, overall, to slow the movement of Negroes to white schools. In 1968 alone, the board was reported to have spent more than $61,000 in legal fees—most of it going to Latimer and his staff—to prevent faster change. While the Board of Education was spending huge sums to keep the system segregated, Atlanta's black children were being denied their rights to a decent education and, at the same time, Atlanta was being promoted all over the nation as "the city too busy to hate."

"How in the name of God," said a prominent Atlanta Negro leader during the January school crisis, "can the white people of this city be 'surprised' by integration? They've had 15 years to get ready for it. Fifteen years! And now they say they can't be ready by February or March or September. How can they say that?"

How indeed? How can a city's leadership, even one cast in the middle-class, suburban ethic of Atlanta, remain silent while so many of the city's people remain second-class citizens? What conclusions can one draw about such leadership? Was that leadership, like so many Southern Gothic romances, merely a creation of the middle-class white man's one-dimensional imagination? Was it a myth, fostered and promoted by the city's powerful and influential business community for the sole purpose of luring outside industry to Atlanta?

LEADERSHIP VACUUM

One thing was made quite clear by the city's recent racial turmoil. That is that Atlanta, for many months past, has been operating in a leadership vacuum. Too many of the city's leaders, men of spirit as well as foresight, have died or, made distraught at the inbred commercialism of Atlanta's civic soul, have moved elsewhere. Gone is Martin Luther King Jr., the man whose mere presence lifted the city out of the ordinary humdrum and whose spirit

SCHOOL BOARD PRESIDENT

seemed to infuse the black community with courage and determination. Gone also is Ralph McGill, a man whose daily column in the 1950's and early 1960's made an ordinary newspaper rise to distinction. McGill's powers and influence waned some years before his death in January, 1968, but he was, for many years, a man of substance and courage. More importantly, for the Negro leaders in Atlanta he represented a white man who had moved from racial prejudice to view all men, black or white, as equals, and his daily struggle to explain that transition to his friends and enemies was often gripping journalism. These two men, to a large degree, were the public conscience of Atlanta, and their deaths marked the passing of an era in the history of the city and the South.

Gone, too, is Eugene Patterson, editor of the Constitution, close friend of McGill; and a man who was able to jab the city's business community in its soft underbelly when it needed it, which was often. And gone are a host of journalists who tried to keep the city's people informed on what was really going on, and who paid the price. No city can lose men of the caliber of King and McGill and not suffer a decline in spirit. Nor can any city blandly reject its most talented and dedicated critics and hope to emerge with a fair view of itself.

As for the business leadership, the truth is that it has a poor track record of late, and some of its edginess is understandable. In the past two years, the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce failed in efforts to annex Sandy Springs, a relatively high-income suburb; lost in efforts to win voter approval for rapid transit funding; and saw highly-touted efforts in the arts move from national acclaim into deep financial difficulties. Concurrent with these defeats, was this leadership, in fact, giving way to younger leaders who were not antagonistic to the business-politcial powers of the 1960's but who were looking more than their elders to the 1970's?

YOUNGER LEADERS

Younger, generally more liberal behind-the-scenes Atlantans did play a significant role in the city's October election. The mayor's race, the Board of Aldermen and the Board of Education elections were all directly influenced by such groups of young lawyers, businessmen, and just plain interested citizens. In fact, two groups, Good Government Atlanta and Better Schools Atlanta, vitally affected the elections and may, between them, fairly claim to have set the course of the city's destiny for the next decade. Good Government Atlanta is predominantly white. Better Schools Atlanta, mainly white, nevertheless has had substantial black support. These two organizations would have had much less impact without the help of black voters and young black business, professional and political leaders. But, having that support, the two groups suddenly have had enormous influence on the city's future.

Good Government Atlanta, a small organization of young professional men (most of them lawyers), hand-picked candidates for the Board of Aldermen and the Board of Education, and with the support and vigorous backing of the Better Schools Atlanta group, put their candidates into office in what may be one of the most significant local elections in recent Southern history. In one election, the Board of Aldermen went from one Negro member (of 17) to six (of 19). The Negroes elected to the board were Q. V. Williamson (an incumbent), Joel Stokes, Ira L. Jackson, Marvin S. Arrington, H. D. Dodson, and Vice Mayor Jackson—several of whom had the backing of the Good Government organization. Good Government Atlanta also backed several other successful candidates for the board. Since the Atlanta aldermen are elected citywide, the October results were impressive, indeed.

The Good Government group, headed by attorney Michael Trotter, also played a leading role in getting better qualified persons elected to the Board of Education, a body which previously had distinguished itself mainly by earning the enmity of Atlanta's black community. Better Schools Atlanta, a group of private citizens who formed the organization in 1968 because of their concern over the state of public education in the city, also played a vital role in getting more progressive candidates elected. BSA, headed by Robert Tuve, was particularly effective in helping create an atmosphere of open debate (anathema to the old school board) and free discussion of the city's school problems.

In October of 1968, BSA released a report on the Atlanta School System which revealed the gross inequities in the city's public schools. The report, which was carefully researched and fully documented (through the help of a school board member who was able to supply information BSA might otherwise not have gotten), pointed out that as of March, 1968, 92.3 per cent of black elementary pupils attended all-black schools; 65 per cent of the system's elementary schools were totally segregated; and Atlanta's integrated elementary schools had a combined student body that was 22.8 per cent black, but a combined faculty only 5.7 per cent black. It also noted that by the eighth grade, pupils in black schools were more than four years behind their peers in white schools and pointed to a host of other ills that clearly showed the system's discrimination against Negroes.

For their troubles, BSA members were subjected to considerable ridicule and Tuve was even investigated by a school detective under the direction of the school board attorney, A. C. Latimer. There was a public outcry when the detective's role was made known by the Atlanta Journal, and Supt. Letson had to call a halt to that particularly unsavory expression of attitude on the part of the board.

What the BSA report revealed was a gross gap in communication between the school board and the Negro community, a finding that was subsequently verified by a special study of Atlanta's school system carried out by the National Education Association. The NEA report, which was released in August, 1969, was much broader than the BSA report and, if anything, was more condemnatory of the city's public school posture. The NEA found Atlanta schools mostly segregated or resegregated, unequal, subject to overcrowding in Negro neighborhoods, and generally designed to educate whites—not blacks. It also confirmed that a serious communications gap existed between the board and the city's Negro communities. Said the NEA: "Black residents of Atlanta complain that not only are white interests overly represented on the board but that the board majority is predominantly representative of banking and business interests, as well. The present composition of the board (this was prior to the October election) is as follows: three bankers, one educator, one federal loan agency head, one doctor, one housewife, one airline executive, and one Federal Housing Agency executive." This was the board that, on the whole, the voters rejected in the October election.

The election of the new board president produced a moment of quiet drama which, on the old board, would have been impossible. On the first ballot, Dr. Benjamin Mays, a noted Negro educator and retired president of Morehouse College, was elected chairman by a vote of six to four. A carefully worked out plan that would have elected him on the second ballot proved unnecessary, and Dr. Mays took the reins in a move which board member Jerry Luxemburger says "restored the faith of the Negro community in the board." The new board is made up of two housewives, a surgeon, two bankers, an airline executive, a lawyer, a real estate manager, and two college presidents (one retired and the other still active).

Bentley

"I think the fact that we were just coming into office when this thing broke had a lot to do with the way we handled it," said a new member. "On the other hand, thank God the board did change hands, because the old board could never have proposed a neighborhood integration plan. They would have been suspect in the black community, and it never would have worked."

THE FUTURE

There was little assurance by mid-January that the new board's integration plan would work, either. It is basically a zoning plan that, while heavily integrating the southside of Atlanta (where most blacks and low-to-middle-income whites live), leaves the plush northside largely untouched in student integration.

In the trying weeks that lay ahead, one could only hope that the city's public leadership would begin to assert itself. One could also hope that the real reason such leadership had been dormant was the difficulty attendant to the transfer of authority. It would be tragic if the new leaders, both public and private, proved less capable than their predecessors, less durable than the old business-civic coalition that ran the city for 30 years. If anything, the new leaders must be more durable, permanently attuned to the needs of all the people, and permanently ready to offer Atlantans something more than economic prosperity and a swinging national image.

Agnew's Forays Suggest Strategy

ice President Agnew, who suddenly has made his name a front-porch word in the deep South, unquestionably will be an asset to most Republican congressional candidates in the region next year. He will be, that is, unless his assignment is changed because of pained cries from middle-of-the-road and liberal Republicans elsewhere who could be damaged by an in-house George Wallace.

If they do cry, of course, and if President Nixon does revoke the Vice President's obvious assignment to capture the Wallace sympathizers, then Mr. Agnew will not soon again make the covers of the national magazines. (The more timid television networks, on the other hand, may give him more time to say less, and without much "instant analysis and querulous criticism" afterward.)

Mr. Agnew overnight has become a figure of political consequence in the South. In a mid-November Gallup Poll, according to Newsweek, 25 per cent of the Southerners questioned gave him a "highly favorable" rating; Mr. Wallace did only 3 per cent better. Nationally, the poll indicated a "highly favorable" score of 19 per cent, compared with 17 per cent in July.

Within the South, some explanations of the Agnew popularity are clear. His words about integration, liberal intellectuals, protest marchers, mass media and the South itself are almost indistinguishable from Mr. Wallace's except in their lack of southern-fried folksiness.

His New Orleans speech Oct. 19 was widely reported because of the heat of his words about anti-war demonstrators ("an effete corps of impudent snobs"). His subsequent criticism of television also created great interest. Less widely noted have been some of his comments aimed more directly at the segregation-minded part of the South.

He said, for instance, to the Southern Governors Conference Sept. 16 in Williamsburg, Va.: "Now, this administration favors integration, but not mandatory and forced, artificially contrived social acceptance. . . . I mean that if people live in a neighborhood, they're entitled to be associated together."

Mr. Wallace or Georgia's Gov. Lester Maddox could have said almost the same thing. They might not have said they favor integration, but they do not say they oppose it. They simply say what Mr. Agnew said: that it should not be mandatory and forced, a position which places him in direct opposition to civil rights laws and the federal courts. When Mr. Agnew makes such statements, the segregationist part of the South understands him perfectly. These are the same words that now are in vogue among even the most relentless segregationists.

The vice president said much the same thing at a rather astonishing but little-reported event Oct. 20 in Jackson, Miss. It was a $100-a-plate fund-raiser for the Mississippi Republican party. Some 2,600 people attended, contributing $250,000 to the party. Among those in prominent places (and apparently active in behind-the-scenes roles helping to raise the money) were some leading Mississippi Democrats, including Gov. John Bell Williams, always one of the South's most vociferous white supremacists.

Mr. Agnew's speech brought exuberant cheers. He said the South too long had been "the punching bag for those who characterize themselves as liberal intellectuals." Southern segregationists have been using the "punching bag" phrase for decades and to the Jackson audience the vice president must have sounded like a Mississippi gubernatorial candidate.

Mr. Agnew went on to say that the Nixon administration had done its best on behalf of Mississippi and its schools to gain additional time for desegregation. It was pitted against the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on this issue, he noted, in an effort to prevent the kind of haste that would amount to "destroying quality education." (The Supreme Court had not then ruled in the Mississippi schools case; its unanimous decision for immediate desegregation means, by the Agnew definition in Jackson, "destroying quality education.")

The vice president's rebuke of television news analysts and the subsequent extension of this critique to newspapers by Herbert G. Klein, the administration's communications director, also fell on receptive ears among Southern segregationists. Mr. Wallace, Gov. Maddox and others of their point of view have always succeeded in arousing audiences with acid comments about the "liberal intellectual" press.

In Southern constituencies where Republican candidates adopt moderate-to-liberal stances, of course, the Agnew approach may not be politically helpful. During Linwood Holton's successful campaign for governor of Virginia he was seeking the support of moderates and liberals, and an Agnew speech at a Holton fund-raising event apparently turned out to be embarrassing because of the heat of its attack on the "radical philosophy" of the national Democratic party.

But in most of the South, Republicans in 1970 will be running on the right side of their Democratic opponents. Undoubtedly the Agnew rhetoric, if it continues, will help them win over the Wallace voters.

In the 1968 presidential campaign, the Wallace percentage of the vote was 65 in Alabama, 63 in Mississippi, 48 in Louisiana, 43 in Georgia, 40 in Arkansas, 34 in Tennessee, 31 in North Carolina, 31 in South Carolina, 29 in Florida, 24 in Virginia and 19 in Texas. (These 11 states account for 128 of the 270 electoral votes now needed to elect a president and all but one—Texas, Lyndon Johnson's home—went for either Mr. Nixon or Mr. Wallace.)

Because of the general posture of the Nixon administration on racial matters and the conservative cast of the Republican party in most of the region, most GOP congressional candidates will have difficulty winning Negro votes. Most will hope, instead, to win the Wallace voters.

Cock Fight!

By PAT WATTERS

Drawings by Marge Manderson

I went once on a cold winter's day, with a bottle of Jack Daniels sour mash whiskey for sipping among three of us, to a backwoods clearing, the turnoff from the dirt road marked by a dead hawk hung on a tree, to a clandestine gathering of Southern country white men who still persist in the illegal sport of cockfighting. There was a barn fitted out with grandstands and a cement circle, and there was a crowd of men, mostly in overalls, and there were trainers and owners, and there were the cocks, every ounce of them belligerent.

I had expected to be sickened, to gaze once more in a new context into the depths of the ugly and demented side of the white South's psyche. I found something quite different. There was dignity in the people there, the dignity of aficionados (the cross-lingual reference is appropriate; what might the South be if its violence might be respectably ritualized?), and there was majestic seriousness to the undertaking, to the elaborate ritual of the actual pitting of the cocks against each other, and there was decorum through the long day of the contests with its constant and impressively large betting and its equally constant whiskey sipping, and there was camaraderie, again dignified and decorous, among all of us there so involved together, and there was, most of all, the expression, abstractly, of the virtues of the crowd, of a people, a culture, expressed by the fighting cocks—the chickens, the crowd called them, "That red chicken's a game un," "Get 'im yeller, git 'im yeller chicken:" ferocity, braveness, endurance, stubbornness, stubborn refusal to lie down, to die, gallantry.

I went expecting to scorn, to find the cocks in their ritual suffering, ritual death of a higher order of animal than the men pitting them against each other, a reproach to them. I found instead a real bond between the men and the game cocks—the trainer gently, lovingly, picking up his downed bird and literally breathing life back into him, the limp head in his mouth, then thrusting, throwing the revived warrior back into the battle, neck arched, feathers ruffled all over him, silent and deadly purposeful, like as not, to win.

The realization came early that the birds were bred to battle, delighted in it, had no other meaning. The realization came slower of all the care and love of this spectacle that was expressed even in the construction of the grandstands, the fighting pit, a feeling not to be found in the physical constructions centered on art and culture in the South. The final realization was a matter of years in coming, the understanding of why, in this barbarous, illicit setting, I had felt more rapport with, more respect for my fellow white Southerners than I ever had before, and more strongly experienced that old, gnawing wish—that somehow, somehow they might find the way to the true dignity and majesty of what they are.

Mr. Watters is information director of the Southern Regional Council. This article is from his book THE SOUTH AND THE NATION, just published by Pantheon Books.

gone out with smallpox and yellow fever. They no longer have a place in our society."

Houston papers take note of the fact that they are the murder capital of the world by including at the bottom of each homicide story a box score showing how the bodies stack up compared to this time last year. They stack up pretty good. About 240 a year — or more than the countries of Australia (61), Canada (99), Denmark (6), England and Wales (24), Scotland (3), and Sweden (8) combined.

"Urban dynamics!" cautions Frank C. Daniel, secretary of the National Rifle Association of America. "What would be good policy for New York City would not necessarily be good for Tombstone, Ariz. Urban dynamics. Local custom . . . practice . . . tradition." Until the revolutionaries [leftwing] and counter-revolutionaries [rightwing] came on the scene a few years ago the NRA was out there alone fighting the battle to arm the population. For pure organizational force there is no propaganda machine anywhere approaching the NRA's not even the various lobbies representing the $1.5 billion firearms industry.

In defeating the contention that low homicide rates in England and Wales (24 murders in 1968 against 5,126 in the United States, a country with only four times the population) can be attributed to tough gun laws, a Nixon appointee in the Justice Department scores neatly: "This ain't England. England doesn't have 10 million licensed hunters. Who hunts in England? Land barons . . . counts . . . a few privileged commoners. On the other hand we're a wild, woolly, free-wheeling, gun-toting frontier society. I'm not defending it, but we have to deal with reality."

Mr. Cartwright, an Austin novelist and journalist, is author of THE GREAT ISSUES DEBATE, which will be published this year by Doubleday. He is a contributing editor of The Texas Observer.

Since the 20,000 state and local laws now on the books are virtually meaningless without a federal law to control the flow of firearms from one state to another the target is always in sight. The target, it turns out, is the United States Senate. That is where gun laws are shot down. "Not the House," says a Washington lawyer who has worked on gun legislation for the Senate, "The Senate! In the history of our nation two meaningful gun control laws passed the United States Senate. One in 1934 banned machineguns, and one in 1968 attempted to control the interstate movement of firearms."

In the first seven months after the passage of the 1968 Gun Control Act, Texas and 27 other states passed "contiguous" laws which in effect took the wind out of the federal law. Anyone who is sober and looks to be older than 18 can buy a gun in Texas. There is no waiting period, no screening procedure, no questions. Only in eight states—Hawaii, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, and certain counties in Virginia—is a permit required to purchase a handgun. Illinois requires an identification card for the acquisition or possession of any firearm. Mississippi requires that handguns be registered.

New York and Massachusetts are the only states which have enacted legislation permitting police to screen and control handgun applicants. You can make what you want out of the resulting data, but in New York the percentage of gun use in violent crime is 23 per cent below the national average and in Boston 28 per cent.

Those 24 million handguns that the commission wants the government to buy up, where are they? Who owns them? No one really knows, but they seem to be in stockpiles (in 51 per cent of the households there is no gun of any kind, the commission reports), and more of them seem to be turning up in the cities, particularly in trouble areas. NRA members own an average of 11 firearms. To a warning that lists of gun owners would play into the hands of demonic enemies of the republic one critic observed: "The best damn list in the country is right there in the NRA building."

Says Dan Lewis, a legislative assistant to Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D.-Md.), probably the strongest anti-gun voice in Congress: "You don't have to convince the people of New Jersey that gun laws are needed. The problem is convincing the rest of the country—especially the South, Southwest, and Far West—that the urban areas need their help."

Help is not coming. For example, in Texas, where a citizen can carry a loaded rifle or shotgun down Main Street, where he can legally shoot his wife's lover if he catches him in a compromising position, there were two "gun bills" introduced last spring. Although neither of them passed or even came up for a vote (politicians conveniently sidestep and thereby neutralize the gun issue by keeping it off the floor) it is interesting to examine the philosophies of the two men who carried these bills.

Representative Graves of Houston is serving his second term in the Texas House. He was the first black elected to the statehouse since Reconstruction. Politically ambitious (he was an unsuccessful candidate for mayor of Houston this fall), Graves nevertheless put it on the line with one of the strongest gun bills ever considered in Texas.

"I pointed out," Graves is saying, "that 40 per cent of the killings took place the same day the gun was purchased. So the key provision of my bill was a 10-day waiting period . . . a cooling-off period. The other provision was a license, something like the Texas driver's license with the applicant's picture, name, address, sex, height, weight, date of birth. They would be issued by local or state police agencies. It wasn't an arbitrary power: the only people who would be refused were felons and nuts.

"Then I told them that in a one-block stretch between the [Houston] courthouse and Main Street there were three places a man could buy a pistol for under $3."

What happened next is what happens anytime gun control measures are introduced in this country: the NRA published the proposal in its official magazine, The American Rifleman, and in the week that followed Graves was harangued with 960 letters "accusing me of being a communist, a Nazi, a traitor, even a nigger lover."

Graves shook his head: "They said I was trying to take the pistol away from the American sportsman." . . .

The other Texas legislator is Russell Cummings: white, middleaged, middleclass, also from Houston. Without saying it, Graves and Cummings seem to agree on the point: the gun issue has racial overtones.

This past spring the Texas Legislature, by unanimous votes in both houses, approved legislation granting Texans the right to purchase rifles, shotguns, and accessories by mail from adjoining states. The new statute was necessary to exempt Texans from coverage of federal legislation that prohibits buying firearms by mail out-of-state. The measure was sponsored by liberal Sen. Charles Wilson of Lufkin and conservative State Rep. Rayford Price of Palestine.

J. Edgar Hoover in particular and law enforcement people in general favor such permissive firearms' controls as registration although they are divided on the more restrictive practice of licensing. Existing agencies such as the Texas Dept. of Public Safety aren't budgeted to handle such a load: experience has taught them to be wary of bright ideas.

Texas' top lawman, Colonel Speir, says, "I agree that we need strict controls, but a better approach would be strict penalties. Let me repeat what I've said so often, if a person is dead set on killing he'll find a weapon. You've got to have a society willing to discipline itself: we've been too lax for too long." Speir, a large man who looks like a Texas Ranger miscast as Judge Stone in an Andy Hardy movie, went on to point out that the courts have become "too technical," this greased by the fact that "here in Texas we haven't executed anyone in five years."

"I would be all for some kind of waiting period," Speir said as an afterthought. "It would give us time to check on who's buying the guns." . . .

The Violence Commission has stumbled onto a puzzle in the pattern of our paranoia. Why the handgun? Why not the shotgun, which is more menacing and versatile, easier to aim and less likely to kill?

The answer is pop psychology: the pistol is to the shotgun as John Wayne is to Walter Brennan. A pistol is sexy. In his thoroughly documented book, A Right to Bear Arms, gun opponent Carl Baker records this conversation with a psychiatrist friend, Dr. Alfred J. Siegman:

"Is such symbolism attached to the [hand] gun because of its size and shape?"

"Well, not only for that reason," he said. "It pierces, it penetrates, it discharges, much like the penis." Cowboys strapped it around their waists: it occupied their thoughts. In modern times it is concealed. Instead of being attracted by the light its sexual renaissance is moving toward the shadows.

In a fit of black humor one Washington gun control crusader observed recently: "What we need to get this [gun bill] off the ground is a few more assassinations."

This is no doubt an accurate reading of conditions. The Nixon administration takes the position that "the results of the 1968 act are still inconclusive." They are likely to remain that way. Besides, a spokesman told a congressional hearing a few days before the Violence Commission report, "Federal registration and licensing proposals . . . constitute an unwarranted invasion into the province of state and local government."

Back in Austin, I drove to the eastside, past Mrs. Loper's apartment where a man in a tan service uniform was mopping up, making the unit ready for its first new occupant in 14 years. I talked for a while to a woman who runs the housing project and she pointed out where the killer lived. You could see it from Mrs. Loper's place.

The killer was a 62-year-old blind black pensioner named Tom. Tom had lived down the street longer than neighbors could remember, longer than Mrs. Loper had been a neighbor. If you can call someone you've never met a neighbor. But there were kids playing in the street, white kids and black kids, just as there had been that night Mrs. Loper was killed.

Tom told police he was sitting on his front porch behind a field of bedsprings, old tires, and dry waist-high Johnson grass, just rocking and enjoying the view, when he heard something rustling in the weeds. Some kids had been making fun of him, throwing rocks and threatening his wife, so he had bought a gun. It was in his lap on the night in question, he heard menacing noises, he raised the gun, and he fired.

Two hundred and ninety-three feet away Mrs. Loper bent over a garbage bin, emptying her last pail of garbage.

According to local custom Taylor was bound over to the grand jury, which immediately indicted him for second degree negligent homicide. In Texas, first degree negligent homicide is the taking of a human life while committing a legal act (such as driving a car). The penalty is two years or $2,000. Second degree NH is the taking of a human life while committing an illegal act (in Taylor's case discharging a firearm in the city limits) and the penalty is three years or $3,000. Since Taylor and his invalid wife existed on less than $3,000 a year, what followed was more local custom: Taylor was held without bond in county jail.

I asked Austin Sgt.-Inv. James Freeman about Taylor and the pistol and the whole freaky mess.

"Man's got a right to defend his home," said Freeman.

"I guess so."

"You can't no more outlaw guns and keep people from getting one than you can dope."

"Even if he's blind?"

"It's against the First Amendment!" another detective said bluntly, as though it really were.

"You mean the Second Amendment?"

"Whatever the hell it is!" the detective said, anger swelling in his strawberry pudding face. "All that nigger did wrong was pull the trigger. He shouldn't of ever pulled that trigger."

The South Sets the Pace

The South leads the nation in murders and non-negligent homicides. Texas, although one of the national leaders, has its peers within the region.

Federal Bureau of Investigation statistics for murders and non-negligent homicides in 1968 show a national figure of 6.8 per 100,000 population and an 11-state Southern figure of 10.6. (The figure for the Northeast, by comparison, is 4.8.)

Southern states and their rates per 100,000:

Georgia, 13.9; South Carolina, 13.6; Florida, 11.9; Alabama, 11.8; Texas, 10.6; Mississippi, 9.9; North Carolina, 9.7; Louisiana, 9.5; Tennessee, 8.7; Virginia, 8.3; and Arkansas, 8.1.

'Beautiful Bogalusa'

By BRUCE GALPHIN

In The Washington Post

Bogalusa.

Beautiful Bogalusa," reporters used to scoff when racial violence erupted here in 1965 and again in 1967.

This East Louisiana paper mill town of 25,000 was a stronghold of the Ku Klux Klan as well as the birthplace of the militant black Deacons for Defense. It took repeated interventions by the Justice Department and other federal aides to restrain the troublemakers and restore the peace.

When it came time to "unitize" the school system—under federal pressure to get rid of the last visible vestiges of segregation—Bogalusa could reasonably have been expected to be a tough town.

Yet Bogalusa today has the most methodically integrated schools in Louisiana, and possibly in the nation. Enrollments not only in every grade, closely match the two-third white, one-third black of the population.

This city's performance is all the more remarkable in light of what has happened elsewhere in small-town Louisiana this fall as freedom-of-choice has been swept aside by federal courts and replaced by plans forcing widespread integration.

During the first few days of the fall term, an estimated 27,000 children, including some blacks, were boycotting schools throughout the state. School board members were being harassed and intimidated at stormy public hearings, by anonymous telephone calls and by acts of vandalism. In four parishes (counties) the pressure was so great that boards ordered schools closed, though their actions subsequently were overruled by the courts.

Two months later Louisiana presents the full spectrum of response to court-ordered integration, from the total compliance in Bogalusa to boycotts by more than half the whites in four Southern parishes.

As in other Southern states, segregated private "academies" are springing up so fast and so informally that nobody has an accurate count.

Hundreds, and perhaps even thousands, of children simply are not going to school at all. Again, it is impossible to know how many. Some children are taking advantage of the state's free textbook-loan program even though they are not enrolled in any kind of school. Some apparently are establishing addresses and attending schools in neighboring parishes.

Gov. John McKeithen has stated openly that Louisiana's compulsory school attendance law will not be enforced, and officials are not keeping tabs on delinquents.

Public school enrollment in Bogalusa has dropped slightly as a result of this year's "unitizing." A few whites may be crossing into neighboring Mississippi to attend classes, and city school superintendent Moise J. Israel says enrollment at two local segregated nonsectarian schools has increased.

But there has been no extensive boycott. One group that originally had called for a boycott reversed itself and said it would continue the fight in court. A second group vowed to carry on, but its efforts have not been successful.

Classes are not the only integrated part of life at the Bogalusa schools. Faculty segregation also has been ended. The band is about half black. The thoroughly integrated football team has been leading its division and winning thoroughly integrated cheers from local spectators.

The most serious trouble the schools have had this year resulted from election of the high school homecoming queen and her court. White students had enough votes to elect a white queen, but instead of allowing the black runner-up to sit on the court, rules called for a separate election for the court. (Similar situations have triggered disturbances in several Southern schools this year.)

Black students staged a sit-in in the halls. They were enjoined and scolded by the federal court.

The greatest irony of what is being called a model of integration may be the fact that the school superintendent who helped devise it doesn't like it.

"We're still for freedom of choice," Isarel said, "and a great many black are too... I think the right to choose your own school is the ultimate in constitutional rights."

Israel has been superintendent for 31 years. Prominent among the books behind his desk in Carleton Putman's Race and Reason, a controversial study alleging inherent racial differences in learning ability.

"We decided we had to make the best of the situation with the goal of fulfilling the responsibility to furnish the best possible education to the children," the superintendent said. He is proud of the fact that the ultimately adopted plan "was not handed down to us from Washington."

After freedom of choice was ruled out by the courts, the Bogalusa board proposed closing Negro elementary schools and sending black pupils to the white elementary schools. It also suggested merging the existing black and white elementary upper grade facilities into a junior high, intermediate school and high school.

The Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee objected that some of the black elementary schools were superior buildings, and that only black children would be bused out of their own neighborhoods. But the board's plan achieved such total integration that the court bought it.

LCDC lawyer George Strickler of New Orleans believes white school boards in the South generally are reluctant to send white students to schools formerly indentified as black. Closing black schools has been a widely used devise for "unitizing" school systems—and incidentally has led to a number of black boycotts.

Israel insists that the board's sole reason for closing the black schools was to "move the blacks into an environment that was more conducive to learning."

But why so little trouble in Bogalusa?

One lawyer believes the cumulative effect of past Justice Department action may be a reason. The department since 1965 has obtained injunctions against the Klan and against job discrimination at Crown-Zellerbach, the chief employer in Bogalusa. And it obtained an order instructing city police and the local sheriff to protect persons exercising federally protected rights.

Israel believes the experience of integrated working conditions at the local mill has blunted racial tensions.

It is almost certain, too, that Crown-Zellerbach, which pays 60 per cent of the city's property taxes and employs 31 per cent of its work force, exercises 'subtle' restraints on violence.

Significantly, Israel said the board tried to avoid thrashing out integration plans at large public meetings, which he said were prone to be dominated by two extremes. Instead, he said he had "informal talks with the leadership."

Israel's caution is understandable in light of other school systems' woes. In St. Landry Parish, for instance, 2,000 angry whites turned out last summer to protest the school board's court-approved desegregation plan. The board bowed to their demands and voted to close the schools indefinitely.

Similar action was taken in Evangeline and West Baton Rouge parishes, and for portions of Ascension Parish.

Federal court orders forced reopening of all four systems.

West Baton Rouge, St. Landry, Evangeline and Pointe Coupee Parish public schools are at present the objects of the most intensive white boycott campaigns in the state with more than half and as much as 90 per cent of their normal white enrollment affected.

"We've got teachers in our own system preaching boycott," one superintendent complained.

The boycotts could cripple these school systems' finances, because state support is based on average daily attendance during the first 60 days of the year.

School Superintendent Nat Manuel of Evangeline Parish, site of a large new private segregated academy, said he hopes the state will alter its method of allocating funds. Total public school enrollment there is down from last year's 8,800 to 5,951 last week.

Public schools appear to have weathered the worst of the storm for this year. But next year is the deadline for final elimination of dual schools, and many officials fear this fall's flare-up was only a preview of even greater troubles.

Gov. McKeithen and Lt. Gov. C. C. Aycock recently said in a joint statement that they are not even sure the legislature will continue support for public education after integration orders are implemented statewide.

Both boycotts and private schools have been supported by Concerned Citizens for Quality Education, the core of organized resistance to massive integration in Louisiana. Concerned Citizens has "about 150,000" members in 33 parishes, says its leader, Louisiana Polytechnic Institute chemistry professor Donald Roberts, "but we have a lot more political muscle than that."

Roberts insists that the ultimate aim of the group, however, is not private schools but public neighborhood schools operating under freedom of choice.

According to Roberts, freedom of choice "allows the high quality Negro student to transfer to a white school. We are opposed to mixing two substantially different student bodies as far as educational ability is concerned."

Civil rights advocates, of course, have a different interpretation of the gap between white and black achievement test scores. The lower black scores are largely the heritage of a century of inferior schools, they argue, and the gap will never be closed until the dual school system is abolished.

That is an argument the Supreme Court bought in 1954. And now, 15 years later, the court has said there can be no more delays in implementation.

Roberts and many educators hope the court will change its mind again. Other educators hope time will change its mind again. Other educators hope time will work to prove the private academies and the boycotts impractical. It is a painful period of adjustment for Louisiana and the rest of the Deep South.

TEN STEPS TO SUCCESSFUL EXTERNAL ORGANIZING

1	The External Organizing Committee is created.
2	The green card is given to the membership and its use is encouraged.
3	Information on the green cards is analyzed and companies to survey are chosen.
4	House calls are made to people named on green cards; yellow cards are filled out; work locations in target plant are noted on plant layout.
5	The decision whether or not to organize the place is made.
6	An inside committee is selected from information supplied by the yellow cards and house calls.
7	White pledge cards are signed.
8	Voluntary recognition is requested. If there is a refusal, the National Labor Relations Board, if it has jurisdiction, is petitioned for an election.
9	If there is an election, a campaign is organized to contact all workers and promote the union.
10	The election is held.

ARTHUR A. CHAPIN TO COORDINATE
LABOR DEPARTMENT CIVIL RIGHTS

Washington, D.C.--Arthur A. Chapin, Special Assistant to the Secretary of Labor in manpower matters, has been given additional responsibilities and designated Special Assistant for Equal Opportunity in Manpower Programs in the Office of the Manpower Administrator.

Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced that Mr. Chapin in his new role would be responsible for coordinating Manpower Administration responsibilities implementing Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Department's Nondiscrimination in Federally Assisted Programs Regulations. Mr. Chapin is authorized by Administrative Order to review actions taken by operating agencies of the Manpower Administration--Bureau of Employment Security, Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training, Office of Manpower, Automation and Training; and Neighborhood Youth Corps. He is empowered to achieve compliance through review, processing complaints, investigations and other necessary actions.

He is also charged with the responsibility of assisting the operating agencies in obtaining qualified personnel and in providing leadership in development and operation of training programs and research programs designed to improve the utilization of minority group workers in the nation's labor force.

Complaints may be filed by individuals or any specific class of individuals within 90 days of the alleged discrimination, with any office of the operating agency or with the Special Assistant.

Mr. Arthur Chapin was appointed Minority Groups Consultant to the Department of Labor and the Bureau of Employment Security by the Secretary of Labor, February 20, 1961, and later appointed as a Special Assistant to the Secretary of Labor as manpower specialist.

Mr. Chapin attended the public schools in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania where he was born. He served from 1947 to 1958 as Assistant to the President of the New Jersey State CIO Council, specializing in drafting of state legislation dealing with Civil Rights, housing, minimum wage, and unemployment compensation.

During his years with the New Jersey CIO, he served as trustee for the New Jersey Hospital Service Plan. He was appointed by former Governor Robert B. Meyner to the Governor's Committee on Housing, and by the late Commissioner of Labor Carl Holderman as a member of the State Wage Panel for Restaurant Employees.

Prior to his appointment by the former Secretary of Labor, Justice Arthur J. Goldberg, he served as the Assistant to the Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the late Paul M. Butler.

As Special Assistant he advised the Secretary on matters affecting the Department of Labor and the Department's efforts to promote equal job opportunities and is responsible for the Department's attention being directed to specific problems as they relate to employment and other manpower problems. Mr. Chapin has received meritorious awards for leadership and service from the former Secretary of Labor, Arthur Goldberg, and from the present Secretary of Labor, W. Willard Wirtz.

EDWARD SYLVESTER NAMED TO DIRECT LABOR DEPARTMENT'S OFFICE OF FEDERAL CONTRACT COMPLIANCE

Washington, D. C. -- Edward C. Sylvester, Jr., Deputy Administrator of the Bureau of International Affairs in the U.S. Department of Labor, has been appointed Director of the Department's newly established Office of Federal Contract Compliance.

Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, in announcing the appointment today, said that Mr. Sylvester would be responsible for carrying out a program to assure nondiscrimination in employment practices by Government contractors, and subcontractors, including contractors engaged on Federally assisted construction work.

These responsibilities were assigned to the Secretary of Labor by Executive Order 11246 of September 24,1965, which abolished the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

Mr. Sylvester, born, raised and trained as a civil engineer in Detroit, Michigan, was appointed by Secretary of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg as Assistant to Assistant Secretary of Labor for International Labor Affairs George L-P Weaver in August 1961. In March 1963, Secretary Wirtz appointed him as Deputy Administrator of the Bureau of International Affairs. He was awarded the Labor Department's Meritorious Service Awards by former Secretary Goldberg in 1962 and by Secretary Wirtz in 1963.

(MORE)

In his new capacity as Director, Office of Contract Compliance, Mr. Sylvester will be responsible for:

- Carrying out all responsibilities assigned the Secretary of Labor by Executive Order 11246;

- Developing and recommending to the Secretary rules and regulations necessary and appropriate to achieve the pruposes of the Executive Order;

- Coordinating with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the Department of Justice on matters relating to Title VII of the Civil Richts Act of 1964, and maintaining liaison with other agencies having civil rights and equal employment opportunity activities;

- Providing regular reports to the Secretary of Labor concerning the activities of the Office and problems requiring the Secretary's attention.

Prior to his appointment to the Department of Labor staff, Mr. Sylvester, a graduate of Wayne State University, was for seven years a civil and structural engineer for the City of Detroit where he supervised a staff of engineers and draftsmen working on Detroit's expressway system and water treatment facilities. Early in 1958, he was instrumental in forming the Liberian-American Enterprises, Inc., was the president and manager of this company which was the first commercial lumber company in the interior of Liberia.

During 1960 - 1961 he served on the national staff of Senator Stuart Symington and of the Democratic National Committee.

He has been the Labor Department's representative on the Board of Examiners, Department of State. He was Chairman of the U.S. Delegation to the Seventh Session of the Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works Committee of the International Labor Organization at Geneva, Switzerland, in May 1964. In October 1964, he was Chairman of the U.S. Delegation of the Second Meeting of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council's Special Committee VII of Labor Matters, which convened in Buenos Aires, Argentina. He has traveled in Africa and Asia.

Mr. Sylvester, a Registered Professional Engineer in the State of Michigan, was elected a Member of the American Society of Civil Engineers in 1954, belongs to the National Society of Professional Engineers, et al. He is a member of and has served as president of many civic and similar organizations in Detroit and Washington, D.C., including the Wayne State University Civil Engineers Alumni Association.

During World War II, Mr. Sylvester entered the U.S. Army as a private and was separated as a first lieutenant. He served in the European and Pacific Theatres, received three Battle Stars and was Executive Officer when his company received the Meritorious Service Award.

He is married, has three children and resides in Washington, D.C.

NEWS DIGEST from U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR
W. Willard Wirtz, Secretary

Week of October 18, 1965

SECRETARY WIRTZ LAUDS SYLVESTER AS DIRECTOR AND DELINEATES FUNCTIONS OF COMPLIANCE OFFICE

Washington, D. C. -- Secretary of Labor W. Willard Writz in a press conference called to announce establishment of the new Office of Federal Contract Compliance within the Department of Labor, praised Edward C. Sylvester as he announced his appointment as Office Director. In answer to questions asked by newsmen he outlined the duties and authority of the Office.

The Secretary stated:

"About 10 days ago, President Johnson issued Executive Order 11246, which transferred to the Department of Labor the Contract Compliance responsibilities as far as Federal contracts are concerned. This is the function which has been previously in the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. It involves the enforcement of the non-discriminatory program with respect to Government contractors.

"It is my very real pleasure to announce this afternoon the appointment as head of a new office which has been established, in the Department of Labor, to carry out these functions Mr. Edward C. Sylvester, Jr., who is here. What some of you know and what I am delighted to have this opportunity to confirm is that he has been one of the real initiators and administrators in the Department of Labor. It is a matter of very real personal as well as official pleasure to announce his appointment as Director of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, within the Department of Labor.

"I repeat that this involves the administration of those responsibilities which have previously been in the hands of the President's committee. I say that particularly because there has been some exaggeration of this matter in one or two places. These responsibilities are solely and entirely those which have previously been exercised by the President's committee, and there has been no expansion of those funcitons.

"I would like to make only this one other comment about it. We have been talking so such about civil rights that we have, I think, sometimes forgotten that the real pay-off proposition is not civil rights at all; it is civil results. I think of the program in which Mr. Sylvester will now be engaged as a civil results program. It is all well enough to pass a fair employment practices act and to give people a broad right. You don't live by rights alone and the result is to see to it that there is equal employment opportunity and equal employment without regard to race. That is part of what we are doing as far as this program is concerned."

In answers to questions put by newsmen, Secretary Wirtz indicated that:

- The staff of the new Office under Mr. Sylvester's direction would number 20 to 25 persons with assistance from the regular Labor Department staff. Separate from this staff is the Plans for Progress staff of about 10 persons mostly from private industry.

- The new Office will of course have power to bar contractors from contracts or bidding where there is discrimination. Although the sanction has never been used to the point of actually cancelling a contract, it has been used to the point of taking up very seriously with contractors questions which were presented. "It has been used in the sense of its being there as something which would be done if something else weren't done."

- There would be and there is, under the Executive Order, a particular kind of situation in which proceedings could be instituted through the Department of Justice against either a contractor or a union to cease and desist from the actions which are involved. But I make it quite clear that we would expect to exhaust every possible alternative remedy before we resorted to that one, or to the cancellation of a contract.

- The President's Committee handled during the four to four and a-half years of its existence about 3,000 cases involving government contractors and then under a different branch of its responsibility, three to four thousand cases involving government employees. The non-discrimination provisions with respect to government employment under the most recent Executive Order go to the Civil Service Commission. Under the part of the program which we are talking about here, there have been in about four years about 3,000 complaints handled. In about two-thirds of those, there has been affirmative action taken which has resulted in the removal of the basis of the complaint. The other third are cases in which it was found that the complaint was not supportable.

- There will be steps taken to be sure that there are not two investigations of the same situation in cases which may involve a violation of both the Executive Order and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act. Conferences of the various government agencies and commissions concerned with civil rights are being held to insure that there be no conflicting regulations or actions.

ANNOUNCEMENT

We are happy to announce that Mr. Frank Fletcher has been appointed director of SCEF's Southern Mountain Project (SMP). Mr. Fletcher, who has had wide experience in the labor movement and in community organization, is also acquainted with the folk traditions and music of the mountain area. He will fill the post left vacant by the tragic death in July of Mr. Bruce Moore, who was fatally injured in an automobile accident.

The Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth, SCEF president, said the next great problem confronting the civil rights movement is how to organize poor Negroes and poor whites to fight together for a better world. The struggle is not black against white, but people against injustice.

The SMP is one modest step in that direction. Staff members work on a subsistence basis. The entire project costs less than $1,000 a month. This pioneer project in Appalachia is one activity your contribution to SCEF makes possible.

In recent weeks, the SMP staff has been harassed by police and the Klan, hence your financial and moral support would be especially meaningful at this time.

EMPLOYMENT QUALIFICATION WORKSHOP

MOTTO: Nothing Succeeds Like Success

Introduction:

There is a job with a future in your future. General Telephone Company of Florida is financing this first-class workshop as a corporate venture between private industry and local government. The company, with the assistance of the Tampa Commission of Community Relations, is taking steps to help you obtain gainful and rewarding employment. In the event you become an employee of the company, you will learn about the company and the contributions you can make. You should also know about the functions of the Commission of Community Relations so that you can appreciate the role it plays in the community progress.

THE CITY OF TAMPA COMMISSION OF COMMUNITY RELATIONS

Its Background

Upon recommendation of the Mayor's Bi-Racial Committee, in 1964, Mayor Nick Nuccio appointed the Commission of Community Relations as a full-time agency of city government. The appointment was confirmed by the City Council. It is supported by both the City Council and the County Commission through appropriation of funds and endorsement of its goals and programs.

Its Role in Brief

1. Keeps the lines of communication open between the Negro and White community.

2. Recognizes and assesses discontent in the Negro community and recommends corrective steps.

3. Mediates and promotes smooth transition of positive social, economical, and educational changes within the community.

4. Relates to governmental and private agencies problems that cause racial tension and suggests ways of alleviating these situations.

5. Works with educational agencies in assisting Negroes to better qualify for the world of work.

6. Works toward assuring equal opportunities in employment, education, and other areas of past injustices.

INFORMATION ABOUT THE WORKSHOP

Why it is Necessary

Disappointment and frustration often mark the efforts of many people in securing gainful employment. This is especially true in relation to Negroes and other minority groups. It is observed and pointed out all too frequently by employers in private industries and public agencies that these groups do not pass qualifying tests as readily as do other potential employees.

It is further noted that often the inability of these groups to pass various employment tests is the only barrier to their selection to available jobs. In many other instances, however, there are personal qualities lacking in varying degrees which prevent these groups from obtaining jobs they desire and need.

It is ironic, at a time when so many new jobs are available to persons of all races, that such barriers to employment still exist. It is against this background that this unique workshop has been established. It is designed to assist employable persons, mainly Negroes, in meeting special employment qualification standards, such as passing tests and interviews, which they experience difficulty in meeting.

Cultural backgrounds and educational experience of these groups are frequently attributed to being unrelated to the exacting demands of their present world of work. Whatever the cause, earnest efforts are being made to solve the problems.

How the Workshop Became a Reality

This workshop--from its initial planning stages through its projected successful conclusion--represents affirmative cooperative action by many persons to which references are made in other sections of this brochure. Through a series of conferences and planning sessions which began about one and one-half years ago, the following accomplishments have been realized:

1. General Telephone Company is taking positive and novel steps to employ more Negroes in all of its departments.

2. The Company has requested and received full cooperation from the Tampa Commission of Community Relations in establishing all necessary machinery to assist Negroes in meeting the Company's job qualification standards.

3. The Company has made a commitment to hire, as soon as possible, those participants who successfully complete the workshop and meet employment qualifications.

4. A staff of qualified persons has been chosen to conduct the workshop. Each member of the staff is intimately acquainted with the special problems confronting Negroes in their efforts to obtain employment. They have also toured the various departments within the Company and are familiar with job demands.

5. Workshop participants, all of whom are high-school graduates, have been selected.

YOU WERE CHOSEN BECAUSE YOU HAVE THE POTENTIAL TO SUCCEED. NOTHING SUCCEEDS LIKE SUCCESS.

What the Workshop Proposes to Accomplish

General objectives for the program as a whole:

1. To help you, the applicants, qualify for employment by the Telephone Company or by any other company that has similar jobs to fill and similar qualification requirements.

2. To help each of you develop basic understandings and attitudes so you can: (a) continue to improve yourselves after this short training period is over, and (b) succeed on the job, both in terms of satisfactory work, and cordial relations with fellow employees and supervisors.

3. To help the Company develop better tools and procedures for selection of applicants likely to succeed on the job.

How the Workshop is Organized

The workshop for female participants is divided into three major areas of concentration:

Quantitative Skills Area
Verbal Skills Area
Job Success Area

For male participants there will be generally two areas, Quantitative and Job Success, with limited instruction in the Verbal Skills Area. These areas will be fully defined during the orientation session.

One hundred women trainees will be divided into three groups. Three teams each composed of one instructor from each of the major areas will work with the three separate groups during the eight class nights of 2½ hours each. Within each group the teachers will work with smaller groups of 10 each with individuals on a rotational basis.

The twenty men trainees will receive instruction from a team of two instructors each night.

This type of organization has several unique advantages. One major advantage is that it will allow each teacher to provide small-group instruction while limiting the total number of students each teacher will work with. The men students will receive separate instruction mainly because test requirements for men are different. More quantitative skills and less verbal skills are required.

The teachers and planning staff recognize there is no short cut to education. Your instruction has been designed to give you basic skills and techniques needed to meet job entry requirements.

Schedule of Dates

Workshop sessions will be held from 7:00 P. M. to 9:30 P. M. on Tuesday and Thursday nights.

January 10, 12, 17, 19, 24, 26, 31; February 2, 1967.

THE WORKSHOP - AN OPPORTUNITY AND A RESPONSIBILITY

This Employment Qualification Workshop is not an automatic venture. As has been pointed out, it is an opportunity awarded you because you are deserving. In a sense it is experimental. It represents a new approach. It is designed to be highly successful, but a major portion of the success of this project depends on you.

In accepting this opportunity, you are also committing yourself to accept responsibility. The following guidelines are suggestive of what will be expected of you as a participant:

1. Show enthusiasm for your work. Know everything that is expected of you and be willing to go "beyond the call of duty".

2. Know the value of time. Be prompt at all times. This will be an important part of your evaluation.

3. Attend ALL sessions faithfully. A good attendance record indicates that you are reliable and devoted to duty.

4. ELIMINATE CARELESS HABITS IN ALL DETAILS OF YOUR WORKSHOP TRAINING. There is no place in the workshop or on the job for carelessness, which can be justifiably called laziness.

5. Use your personal qualities to help you advance. You are judged first by your appearance. You are also judged by your social and business manners as well as by your ability and performance. Outstanding performance assures you of success.

LOOKING FORWARD TO THE JOB AHEAD

Craft Starting Positions in Which Most Vacancies Occur with General Telephone Company

OPERATOR: Toll - Place long distance calls for customers by using a number of devices she has before her--cords, keys, a key pulsing set, a calculagraph clock, billing tickets, and a bulletin showing the rates and routes to about 95 per cent of all frequently called places. Must be able to work split shifts, some night and Sunday work.

Information - Answers inquiries from local customers for telephone numbers from a specially prepared directory which is corrected daily. Must be able to work split shifts, some night and Sunday work.

SERVICE REPRESENTATIVE: Maintains records for a number of customer accounts. Also, handles billing inquiries, orders for new service, changes in services, complaints and adjustments, and customer telephone requests.

PLANT CLERKS: Perform various clerical functions in the plant service center which is responsible for coordinating all the work in the local Plant Department required to give telephone service. Repair service work requires working split shifts, some night and Sunday work.

CLERK (General): Various clerical duties may consist of filing, typing, tabulating data, computational and compilation of data for reports, light bookkeeping, receiving and giving information over the telephone, etc.

TYPIST: Uses manual or electric typewriter to address envelopes, type orders, letters, reports, and statistical tables. Must be able to type at least 45 WPM. Also, a spelling accuracy of 85 per cent on 100 words is required.

STENOGRAPHER: Takes dictation in shorthand and transcribes notes on a typewriter. In addition to a typing speed of 45 WPM as well as a shorthand speed of 80-100 WPM, a spelling accuracy of 85 per cent on a 100 word test is required.

DRAFTSMAN: Prepares working plans and detail drawings for engineering purposes; consisting primarily of electrical, mechanical and map drafting work.

MACHINE OPERATOR: Basically knows how to run the following machines: a key punch, for punching cards; a sorter, for grouping and counting cards; a collator, for selecting cards; a reproducer, for copying a punched card; an interpreter, for printing on a card the meaning of the punched holes; and an accounting machine, which makes the printed table showing the results of the various counts.

Positions - Cont'd.

LINEMAN: Installs and maintains aerial, underground, and buried cable systems. Job consists of placing and climbing poles, stringing wires and cables, as well as providing maintenance for these facilities.

CABLEMAN: Joins together insulated copper wires in telephone cables. Work involves pole climbing, splicing and sealing techniques of aerial, underground, and buried cables, and detection together with location of cable faults.

INSTALLER-REPAIRMAN: Places telephone equipment for customers in homes and some businesses. Job requires ability to communicate with the public. This man is responsible for the installation of telephone service from the cable to the phone.

EQUIPMENT TECHNICIAN: Works in central offices repairing and maintaining the various switches and associated equipment needed for telephone communications. Previous electrical knowledge is desired.

EQUIPMENT INSTALLER: In central offices, installs steel frames, the switching bays and their associated equipment, as well as the miles of intricate wiring needed to tie the maze of equipment together.

Positive Steps to Employment Within Workshop Framework

In brief, the following is an outline of your steps to employment with General Telephone Company.

1. Pass initial screening.
2. Participate successfully in Qualifications Workshop.
3. Pass final interview.
4. Pass final examination.
5. Pass physical examination and background investigation.

These are all steps within your reach. A number of Negroes are already employed by General Telephone Company. Some were employed after passing the initial screening, interview, and battery of tests which eliminated the necessity of this workshop training. You, too, can look forward to employment.

IAM Convention Delegates Bring Peace to Chicago

A jam-packed 1968 IAM convention was gaveled to order in the famed Conrad Hilton Hotel at Chicago this week. The city was just recovering from the war protesters and an organized hippy-yippy effort to disrupt the Democratic National Convention.

The Conrad Hilton had served as Democratic Party headquarters, winning it the nickname of Fort Hilton because of the number of National Guard troops in evidence during that turbulent week.

This week, IAM delegates registered in what had been the hospitality room for Vice President Hubert Humphrey, the new Democratic Party standard bearer.

Welcome signs

The Humphrey signs were gone. Instead, the IAM delegates were greeted withan 84-foot sign:

"Welcome, IAM Delegates—You Represent the Best Workmen in the World."

More than 2,000 elected delegates came from 49 of the 50 states (all but North Dakota), seven of the 10 provinces (all but Alberta, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan), from Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia.

The delegates constitute the supreme governing body of this trade union. Their task is to examine and revise IAM law, to consider and act on IAM policies, and to adopt a program to advance the interests of IAM members over the next four years.

They face two weeks of hard work in daily meetings that begin at 9 a.m. and end at 5 p.m. A Saturday morning session is scheduled. Many delegates will also be asked to serve on one of the convention's 28 committees. In the committees proposals and ideas are given a preliminary sifting and weighing before being brought to the floor for final approval by the delegates.

The Chicago convention climaxes four years of growth under the leadership of IAM President Roy Siemiller, General Secretary-Treasurer Matthew DeMore and the other members of the IAM Executive Council.

Go-go union

The Officers' Report to the convention put it this way:

"In these changing, fast-moving years, the IAM has been a changing, fast-moving trade union. Since our last convention we have made more progress in pursuit of more goals than in any four-year period in our history. In a go-go age, we have become the go-go union."

The officers recounted the problems the union faced four years earlier when expenses exceeded income, when staff had to be cut and services to the membership trimmed.

In 1966, the membership voted to increase the IAM per capita tax, thereby increasing the Grand Lodge income. As a result, the officers reported:

"On-the-spot service to the membership has been strengthened by the net increase of 99 new local and district lodge representatives, 13 airline chairmen, 52 grand lodge representatives, seven special representatives" and 41 local and district organizers.

The establishment of a Government Employees Department in place of the old District 44, and a complete reorganization of the air transport department are cited as contributing to the IAM's new look since the last convention.

Membership climbed over the 1,000,000 mark for the first time this year. The net gain in good standing members since the last convention amounts to 210,000.

Pointing out that changing times and new challenges require a fresh approach, the officers called attention to a number of new bargaining developments benefiting many members:

They cited coordinated bar-

"During the past four years we have aimed to build not merely a bigger union but a better one. If we have succeeded, it is because thousands of dedicated, devoted officers, stewards, business representatives and staff serve our union at the grass roots. In almost 2,000 locals and 174 districts these men and women further and fulfill the IAM's day-to-day mission in the work places of the United States and Canada.

They serve without fuss and fanfare and often without thanks. But it is they who write the real record of our union. It is they—in the locals and districts—who organize the unorganized, negotiate contracts, settle grievances and provide such special membership services as medical clinics, eye care centers, apprenticeship programs and job placement centers.

It is they—in the cities, towns and villages of two great nations—who provide the spark for labor's support of community drives, little league baseball teams, retirement clubs, scholarship programs and a multitude of other community activities.

It is they who have made the IAM not merely a bigger union but a better union."

The American labor movement faces governmental attacks on many of its hard-won gains under the incoming Republican administration of President-elect Richard M. Nixon, RWDSU Pres. Max Greenberg warned delegates to the Alabama RWDSU Council meeting here earlier this month.

The Council held its meeting Nov. 10, at the union's headquarters here.

After a special Dairy Workers Conference chaired by C. T. Daniel, Council Pres. Frank Parker opened the regular meeting. Chaplain John Wright read the invocation, followed by Exec. Sec. Gloria Lovoy who read the minutes of the last meeting. Parker then called upon the Council's special guest, Pres. Greenberg.

Pres. Greenberg declared it was inevitable that a new and more conservative Secretary of Labor would be appointed. Other changes would include a new Attorney General, one dedicated to "law and order." As vacancies occur, the composition of the Supreme Court would probably take on a more conservative tone, and this might well be reflected in future decisions.

Pres. Greenberg also told the delegates the country must be prepared for a cutback in aid) education, and in the enforcement of civil ghts.

The delegates heard reports from various committees, and a progress report on the status of ıe Birmingham and Gadsden building funds.

A highlight of the conference was the award-...g of certificates to RWDSUers who passed a course on unionism given by the University of Alabama's extension division.

In a concluding ceremony Pres. Parker awarded a plaque to Clarence Williams, chairman of a unit in Selma, for the great contribution he has made to the Council's efforts,

REPORT: SCME EXECUTIVE BOARD

December, 1968

Washington

Following are the actions taken by the International Executive Board which met here December 2 through 4, 1968:

PRESIDENT'S REPORT

Department of Organization: The report on Organization was presented by Secretary-Treasurer Joseph L. Ames, Field Staff Director P. J. Ciampa and Assistant Field Staff Director Robert Klingensmith.

The report included membership growth figures and a summary of collective bargaining elections. During the period covered by the report, AFSCME won 24 elections and lost six. Director Ciampa gave a special report on the elections in Baltimore. Assistant Director Klingensmith reported on the current organizing program in New Jersey.

Motion to accept the report adopted.

Department of Education: The report on Education was presented by Director of Education Girard P. Clark.

The report covered two types of local union training programs (teacher training and direct training of shop stewards), the leadership development program, staff training, and a new training program for new staff members. The report also covered participation by Education Department staff members in programs sponsored by several councils.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

Department of Research: The report on Research was presented by Director of Research Donald Wasserman.

The report covered Fair Labor Standards Act problems, a record of work stoppages, computerization of wage data; a review of 1968 court decisions, attorneys-general opinions and labor board rulings on collective bargaining; and assistance to councils.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

Publication and Public Relations: The report of the Department of Publication and Public Relations was presented by Director Sam Marshall.

The report covered changes and planned changes in The Public Employee and AFSCME Insight. The report also included Department involvement in strike and organizing situations and work in progress on two new manuals for council and local use.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

Department of Legislation and Community Affairs: The report on Legislation and Community Affairs was presented by Secretary-Treasurer Ames. (Department Director Robert Bollard was absent, attending a meeting of the COPE Operating Committee.)

The report covered involvement in Congressional affairs including civil rights, housing, antipoverty, education and welfare, grain standards, inter-governmental exchange of personnel, consumer protection legislation.

The Department assisted members of Panama Canal Zone locals on problems with various agencies.

The report also covered assistance in collective bargaining legislative problems in various states and meetings with federal agencies including the departments of Labor, Health, Education and Welfare, Housing and Urban Development, Bureau of Employment Security, Office of Economic Opportunity, and the Neighborhood Youth Corps.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

Personnel: Secretary-Treasurer Ames presented the report on personnel changes covering the period June 1, 1968 through October 31, 1968.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

Jurisdictional Disputes and Article XX Cases: The report on Jurisdictional Disputes and Article XX Cases was presented by Robert H. Hastings, executive assistant to the President.

The report covered 16 cases involving SCME since July. Of these, eight are still pending and eight have been closed. Motion to accept was adopted.

Charters Issued, Disbandments, Mergers, and Changes in Names and Jurisdictions: The report was presented by Robert H. Hastings, executive assistant to the President.

During the period, July 1, 1968, to November 15, 1968, 38 locals were chartered, six locals and one council merged, 36 locals had name and/or jurisdiction changes and 11 locals disbanded.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

SECRETARY-TREASURER'S REPORT

Financial Report—October: Secretary-Treasurer Ames presented the financial report for the month of October, 1968.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

Year-to-Date Budget Comparison: Secretary-Treasurer Ames presented the budget comparison for the first four months of the fiscal year. The report showed income as $7,662.00 below anticipated income; expenditures, $166,690.00 below the budgeted figure, and a combined figure of $159,298.00 better than the budgeted figure.

Motion to accept the report was adopted.

Investments: Secretary-Treasurer Ames reported that, as of October 31, 1968, the Federation had investments as follows: (1) General Fund Investments—$609,218.46, (2) International Relation Fund $55,710.34, and (3) Building and Social Purpose Fund—$25,084.49. Total Investments—$690,013.29.

Oberbeck elected judicial panel member

Robert J. Oberbeck of Madison, Wis., has been elected to the SCME Judicial Panel by the International Executive Board.

He succeeds John Zinos of Milwaukee in the judicial post. Zinos has been named SCME area director for the states of Wisconsin, Illinois and Indiana.

Oberbeck, 51, is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin Law School. He has served as director of Wisconsin City and County Employees Council 40 since 1956. He has been a member of SCME for more than 20 years and is active in civic affairs.

He has served as treasurer and vice president of the Madison Community Welfare Council, the Citizens Advisory Committee to the Mayor and is a member of the advisory committee to the Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission.

The seven-member Judicial Panel hears and decides on intra-union disputes and trusteeships.

Victor Solito named to executive board

Victor Solito of Houston has been elected an SCME vice president by the International Executive Board to fill the unexpired term of Don McCullar who resigned to become International area director for the state of Texas.

Solito, 58, is vice president of Local 1550 in Houston. He works as a senior appraiser for the city. He has served as a steward and a member of the local's negotiating committee.

He was a delegate to the last two SCME conventions.

In Houston, he and McCullar served on the city's pay raise committee for three years. The pay raise committee has obtained significant raises for members in Houston. He is a member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles and has served on the Grand Jury Association.

Former Vice President McCullar said he had worked closely with Solito on many projects and that "he will be a definite asset on the executive board." McCullar served on the board since May, 1964.

Solito is an avid hunter and fisherman. He is married and father of one daughter.

Zonarich Announces Staff Changes That Effect Southeast

N. A. Zonarich, organizational director of the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO today announced staff changes effecting the Southeastern Office of the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO. The announcement was made from the Washington headquarters of the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO.

James M. Pierce who has served as Southeastern coordinator for the Industrial Union Department since early in 1963 has been moved to the position of Southern area director for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employes, AFL-CIO. Harold D. McIver will assume the position of southeastern coordinator effective immediately.

Pierce was appointed the IUD coordinator at the time the Industrial Union Department expanded its operation in 1963. At that time he replaced Joseph Applebaum who had been the southeastern coordinator from the beginning of the Industrial Union Departments pilot program in 1961. Applebaum was transferred to Boston, Massachusetts to set up the IUD organizing program in the northeast. He later was made national director of organizing for the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers, AFL-CIO.

In his new assignment Pierce will direct the affairs of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employes in an 11 state area of the South, with headquarters in Charlotte.

McIver, 37, of Atlanta, Ga., has been with the IUD since the program was expanded in 1963. He is a member of the United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO and an international representative of that union. McIver was one of the principal representatives of Industrial Union Department in the planning and execution of the IUD organizing campaign in the L-P COUNCIL CONFAB: Delegates representing several thousand RWDSUers in the Sunshine State gather in Orlando to establish new RWDSU body.

ORLANDO, Fla.

Delegates from RWDSU locals in Florida met here June 7 and 8 and formed the Florida Council.

The delegates adopted a constitution and by-laws, applied to the International Union for a charter and elected a slate of officers.

RWDSU Vice-Pres. Frank Parker served as temporary chairman until the Council officers were elected.

The officers are John L. Parker, Local 595, Ft. Myers, president; John Hinson, president of Local 43, Dade City, secretary-treasurer; Helen Mackey, secretary-treasurer of Local 1020 in Orlando, recording secretary of the Council, and William Wallace, president of Local 243, Haines City, chaplain.

Elected as trustees were Harold Reedy of Local 43, Louis Alvarez of Local 890 in Tampa and Tommy Edenfield of Local 1025 in Plymouth.

Int'l Sec.-Treas. Alvin E. Heaps installed the officers.

A recommendation was made that each local pay $1 per month for each member to the Council. The delegates also approved the formation of permanent committees, including a strike fund committee, an education committee, a constitution and by-laws committee and a COPE committee. Each local will select one member to serve on each of the permanent committees.

Citrus pacts boost pay and benefits

PLYMOUTH, Fla.—Several hundred workers at two large citrus associations have won new contracts which feature substantial wage increases and a wide range of improvements in benefits, many of which are unique to this industry.

At the Plymouth Citrus Growers Ass'n here, the Local 1025 workers won a total 11 percent wage hike over the two-year life of their contract. Several workers won additional gains of from 5 to 16 cents per hour, as a result of job upgradings.

The contract also provides for two additional paid holidays, Labor Day and Dec. 31, bringing the total to eight; season-end bonuses for seasonal employees, amounting to two percent of gross pay after one complete season, and four percent after five seasons; a new paid vacation system which gives the worker full credit for overtime.

Taking into account the rapidly rising cost of living, the agreement assures workers that management will absorb all health insurance increases over the life of the pact, in addition to its normal two-thirds contribution to the program; and that if c-o-l rises reach the five percent mark, wage talks will be reopened.

At the Fort Pierce Growers Ass'n in the city of that name, Local 576 won a one-year agreement providing a minimum wage boost of ten cents an hour. Many workers received more when they were brought up to the $2 an hour level and then granted the dime. Piece-work packers received a ¼ cent per fruit increase.

The pact also doubled the firm's previous five cents an hour contribution to the International Pension Program, and a parallel doubling of benefits, from $60 to $120 per month; an additional paid holiday, Good Friday, bringing the total to seven; and a new job-bidding clause to insure workers already working at the plant that their promotions will not be endangered by fresh hiring to fill higher-level vacancies.

Florida Council Pres. John Parker, who headed negotiations at both associations, was assisted at Fort Pierce by Local 576 Pres. Lenore Harris, Shelley Galbreath, Jewel Richardson, Otis Smith, Leon Briggs, Mrs. Dingler, Gay Christmas, and John Williams; and at Plymouth, by Local 1025 Pres. Al Nesmith, John Todman, Needa Lefew, Geneva Coon, Nola Harper, William Dydell, and Mary Duncan.

Coffee loaders lift pay, fringes

NEW ORLEANS, La.—Local 389 and the Kentucky Coffee Warehouse have recently concluded negotiations for a contract renewal in behalf of a unit of loaders.

In addition to an hourly wage increase of 38 cents, to be distributed in three annual steps, the workers won an additional five-cent company contribution to the pension program, thus bringing the total to 15 cents per hour per worker.

Ala. Mid-South Council Rep. Joe McCullough was assisted by Charles Washington, who is both shop chairman and local president.

Discount Center hit by strike

PORT ARTHUR, Tex.—As The Record goes to press, 64 members of Local 587 are still out on strike against Gibson's Discount Center here.

The union participated in an election at Gibson's, Dec. 23, 1969, but the result was inconclusive due to the number of challenges. Some time after the election the company fired the employee who led the organizing drive. Int'l Rep. Jake Stewart filed unfair labor practice charges, and during the summer, the union picketed the store.

With the company refusing to bargain in good faith, the workers again went out on strike Nov. 22.

Stewart said there are reports that Gibson's may be sold shortly, and he feels that any new ownership must be aware that they "are buying a strike."

'503' installs officers

Lifesaving milkman

ARTHUR ALEXANDER, left, Local 101-A milk driver employed at White Dairy in Birmingham, Ala., has been cited by President Nixon "for exceptional service to others in the finest American tradition." One early morning last January, Alexander detected gas as he made a delivery. Prolonged and persistent pounding on the customer's door finally aroused a family member. All occupants of the house were in a dazed condition as Alexander escorted them outside. For his alert action Alexander has also been presented the Liberty Mutual Life Insurance Co.'s Life-Saver's Award, and the Milk Industry Foundation's Pasteur Award for 1970. Shown congratulating Alexander is C. T. Daniel, Ala. Mid-South organizing director.

Cafeteria card check gains recognition

MERIDIAN, Miss.—The RWDSU has won recognition by card-check at the McCain Naval Station cafeteria, which is owned and operated by Space Service of Georgia.

This marks the latest of a series of organizing victories among base cafeteria workers in Florida, Georgia, and Alabama.

Int'l Rep. Henry Jenkins, who headed last month's victory drive at the Corry Navy Base in Pensacola, Fla., also conducted this campaign. Negotiations are expected to get under way soon.

Refuses to tip-toe through picket line

COCOA BEACH, Florida (PAI) —When Tiny Tim came here with Miss Vicky to do a show at the Cape Kennedy Convention Center of the Cape Kennedy Hilton Hotel, he found pickets of Local 709 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees marching around it.

"A million dollars in cash right in front of me, I would not cross a picket line to do a show," said Tim.

A fine slowdown

ATLANTA, Ga.—An accumulatin of unresolved grievances provoked the Fraternal Order of Police, which represents 600 of the city's 900 men in blue, to order a slowdown.

How do cops conduct a slowdown? By not making any misdemeanor arrests, thus cutting the city off from the revenue it receives on misdemeanor fines.

SUBJECT: 1966 GULF COAST LABOR SCHOOL

I'm attaching a list of the registrations for the Gulf Coast Labor School. I spoke to Barney Weeks today and he feels that there may be an additional ten registrations. THIS IS THE LARGEST GULF COAST SCHOOL we have had to date!

If possible I hope you can be registered in at the Sheraton-Battlehouse Hotel, Mobile, Alabama, by 4 p.m. Sunday, August 14. There will be a good deal of work to be done in organizing the classes and workshops for a group this large. Who knows, you may have to teach the same class two or three different times.

AUG 8

Dear George:

As of today, we have received 69 credentials to the Southern Labor School, 58 of which are paid. The five delegates from Steelworkers Local 1466, Bessemer, Alabama, listed in my letter of July 29, to you, will not attend since officers of this local will have to be in Chicago at that time due to contract disputes. Due to the Governor's race in that state, Treasurer Louise Dean will replace W. H. Montague as delegate from the Georgia AFL-CIO. Following is a list of the credentials:

Ala. State Assoc. of Barbers	Tuscaloosa, Alabama	Walter B. Boyd
Georgia State AFL-CIO	Atlanta, Georgia	Mrs. Louise Dean

Mobile, Ala. Regional Office United Papermakers & Paperworkers	Tuscaloosa, Ala. Mobile, Ala. Memphis, Tenn.	Clifton King Al Dunaway Jack Hydrick

The last eleven listed above are those which have not as yet paid their registration fee. However, Truitt L. Crunkleton of the Bookbinders 96 in Atlanta, Georgia, is waiting to receive my letter of today letting him know the cost of tuition only and said he would mail his check on in.

The Atlanta Regional Office of the Laborers' International Union sent a letter with their credential stating that tuition had been paid direct from their Washington office, but we have not as yet received the check from Washington.

We received a letter from the Regional Office of the Papermakers stating Representative Jack Hydrick would pay his fee upon arrival, making no mention of the other two representatives listed on their credential.

All other credentials stated registration fees would be paid on arrival at the school.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Barney Weeks
President

Mr. Paul Anthony Director
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsythe Street, N.W.
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Mr. Anthony:

This will confirm arrangements made with your office in connection with the program being implemented by the Trade Union Exchange Programs Division, Bureau of International Labor Affairs, U.S. Department of Labor.

The entire period of time the visitor(s) will spend in your area is outlined in the enclosed city program including the date and the time of the visit.

We deeply appreciate the time you are devoting to this program. We are confident its results will have a long-term effect in advancing the objectives of the United States throughout the world.

Sincerely yours,

Walter Sanford.

PROGRAM OBJECTIVES

This group of six Turkish women trade unionists representing three Turkish unions, including textile workers, food, and tobacco workers are in the United States under the auspices of the Agency for International Development (AID), U.S. Department of State. Their program is being arranged by the Trade Union Exchange Programs Division of the Bureau of International Labor Affairs, U.S. Department of Labor. Their presence here attests to the increasing role of women in industry as well as in the Turkish labor movement.

The members of this team originate from unions affiliated to the Turkish Confederation of Trade Unions (Turkiye Isci Sendikalari Konfederasyonu) - Turk-Is, the national trade union center of Turkey, comprising some 476,000 members, affiliated to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

Unlike most Moslem countries in the Middle East, women gained emancipation in the 1920's when Mustafa Kemal Ataturk established a constitutional republic in 1923. As industry developed, women migrated from Turkey's predominantly rural areas into the cities and assumed an important role, especially in the light consumer industries. However, despite both statuatory and technological developments, cultural habits and mores of the old order still linger and in many rural areas, women are still accorded an inferior role in the life of the community. With universal education and the dimunition of illiteracy, women are rapidly emerging as a force in Turkish political, social, and economic life.

As Turkey continues to industrialize, more and more women will be brought into the work force and from the experience gained in many European countries and in America they will undoubtedly be concentrated in those industries where women have proven more adept than men. With this prospect for the near future, it is important to the Turkish labor movement that the women be prepared to accept their full responsibilities as leaders and members.

The primary objective of the team's visit is to provide them with a comprehensive view of the role of American women in industry, and especially in those comparable industries and unions from which the team members originate. Emphasis will be directed towards demonstrating how women, like men, can play a significant role in organizing unions participating in contract negotiations and sharing in policy decision-making.

To effectuate these objectives, the team will undergo an orientation period in Washington to be followed by corresponding field visits to leading industrial cities on the Eastern Seaboard. Here they will observe such basic union practices as record keeping, grievance procedures, the steward system, and collective bargaining techniques and practices. Industries and shops selected for observation will be those carrying a major complement of women. Subsequent visits will be made to selected mid-Western cities and particularly to those unions having specific programs, especially directed towards enlisting the maximum participation of women in the political, legislative, and economic life of the community. Likewise, the role of union women in civic, social, and welfare activities will also come under review.

Dear Mister Via !

As in previous years we want to write to you at the turn of the year. And so as usual we will follow the old custom of sending Christmas Greetings.

It is a year now since we moved into our new house. Consequently because of the removal we were unable to dispatch our Christmas Greetings in time. But now we have settled down. There is still a lot to be done, but we all feel very comfortable in our house and fathers roses have already been in bloom.

Antje has been attending secondary school since Easter. She is making every effort to learn English and that is very hard sometimes.

Elke will celebrate her fifteenth birthday on December 19th. She is gradually becoming a young lady. She is a member of the school orchestra now and very proud of this.

Inge tolerates us with patience. So we all are very well. There is a new member of our house-hold, Felix, the tom-cat.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

He has whiskers like those of Mr. Whiskers at Mary Joe in Bouldes.

Now we look forward to a few quiet days during the Christmas season.

We spend our holidays this year at the Baltic sea. The weather was very nice. In June Inge and I were in Israel. It was a very impressive journey.

As in earlier years I would like to make some comments on the political events which have been taking place in my country.

For two years now our national government has been based on a great coalition of CDU and SPD. The first months of this coalition were not easy for the SPD. It turned out that all the voters who voted for the SPD earlier just out of protest are now refusing to vote for it. So we have lost some supporters, but we have gained some new. I am satisfied with the work of this government. It has solved some difficult problems. What would have happened, had we not had a social democratic Minister for Economic Affairs? The unemployment figures would probably have topped the million mark.

Economic stability was already restored at the end of last year. The boom started at the beginning of this year. Last year the gross national product did not grow. This year it will grow by about 6,5 %. There are four situations vacant for every one unemployed person. Wages will increase, pensions will be raised by 8 % during the next year. Our higher standard of living and social security have cut the ground from under radicalism a lot.

The unrest of the young generation has clearly decreased. At Easter the climax was reached. The attempt on student-leader Rudi Dutschke's life induced thousands of young people to demonstrate in the streets. These demonstrations disturbed many people. It was the first time that people were killed by stones thrown by demonstrators. The Police had to be called out to protect life and property.

The election results in Baden-Württemberg just after Easter indicated the reaction of the people. There was a remarkable swing to the right. Meanwhile the internal situation has become better. The start of peace-negotiations on Vietnam also had a positive influence. We hope that this terrible problem may soon be solved.

In September a new Communist Party was founded. It is called the German Communist Party (DKP) instead of the banned Communist Party of Germany (KPD). It has published a program which is seemingly within the terms of our constitution.

The NPD lost many voters in the last elections. I think that its popularity is on the decrease. At the moment a discussion is taking place as to whether an application should be made to the Supreme Court for the banning of the NPD.

Events in Czechoslowacia have also influenced Germany's political development. The proportion of armed forces has been changed. Today there are more soviet divisions on the borders of the Federal Republic than there were before August 21st.

Concerning our politics with the East one thing is quite clear now. Every degree of détente depends on Moscow. The Czechoslowacian events have shown us that all efforts for bilateral détente are not very promising. It is Moscow which decides how far an east european country may be allowed to go in developing contacts with the West. The crisis also demonstrated how necessary Nato is for the defence of Western Europe. No country is able to defend itself.

Probably even the policy of détente in Germany will suffer from this latest crisis. We are still advocating the normalisation of relations between both parts of Germany. Over a year ago Mr. Kiesinger wrote a letter to the east german government. He suggested that secretaries of state should hold discussions. But to this day the letter has not been answered. We are still prepared to consider any talks anywhere if we see a chance to normalise and to better the lives of our people.

We cannot however recognize the other part of Germany as a foreign country. All Germans will have to decide democratically whether they want to be reunited or not. If one day the East German people freely decide that they do not wish reunification we will accept their decision. But no German Government can accept a situation which has been brought about by soviet bayonets. Bayonets are of course facts, but history has proved that they have a limited life-span.

This year has shown that the disturbers of peace sit in East Berlin. DDR troops took part in the occupation of the CSR. Moreover the East German Government was one of the main advocates of the occupation. Now as before there are pressures on Berlin and on the access routes. The most tragic result of the east german policy however is that 163 people were killed when trying to flee to the West.

In 1969 two important elections will take place. The Federal President will be elected. The SPD candidate is

Mr. Gustav Heinemann, at present Minister of Justice. Nobody knows how the electors will vote, but we hope that our candidate will be successfull. The general elections in October will lead to a discussion about the work of the social democratic ministers. I am convinced that the voters will recognize the success of our policies. Nevertheless next year will be one of great challenge and also I hope of much success.

So we say Good-bye for this year.

We wish you very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Yours sincerely

Heinz + Inge Rühmann

Dear Emory:

Thank you for your help in taking care of our television team from Spain.

I regret very much that they screwed up your schedule by coming in late but they did tell me that they got a lot of information from you. They also got some very good sequences in Atlanta, as well as a fine interview with Martin Luther King, Sr.

You know how much I appreciate your assistance. Next time I ought to send you teams from Sweden. When they say they will be there at 10:00 a.m. they get there a half hour early and stand outside your office until the clock strikes ten!

Warm regards.

Cher Monsieur,

Me voici de retour parmi les miens, après vous avoir quittés bien à regret. J'ai passé quelques jours à PARIS, avant de rentrer chez moi et je pense bien souvent à cet agréable entretien que vous m'avez accordé. Grâce à vous, j'ai pu pénétrer et comprendre les principaux problèmes de votre grand pays et cette rencontre m'a été, vraiement, des plus profitables.

Soyez assurés, vous même et tous les gens charmants qui vous entourent, que je n'oublierai jamais ma visite aux Etats-Unis, bien trop courte à mon gré et dès que l'occasion s'en présentera, je m'empresserai de revenir auprès de vous.

En attendant cet heureux moment, permettez moi de vous adresser tous mes remerciements pour votre si aimable hospitalité et tous mes souhaits de bonne santé pour vous et tous les vôtres.

Recevez, Cher Monsieur, mon amical souvenir.

JUN 2 1972

Dear Sirs,

Allow me to ask your attention for the following introduction and questions. I am a Dutch historian, professor of American history at Leiden University, since years interested in the South. In 1956 I wrote a history of the Negro in the US which was brought out by Ballantine Books in 1960 entitled The People that Walk in Darkness and since then I have worked on other publications, in Dutch, on the Negro and Southern problems.

This fall I hope again to visit America, with a grant from the ACLS and my plan is to spend some time in the South, especially in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama and Georgia. To make the most use of my travels I would very much like to meet some people who are well known in the South and well versed in its problems. What I certainly would like to do is to come to your office and get a better idea of your work. But coming from the West it is easier for me to start my Southern journey in Louisiana and from there move eastwards. What I very much would like is to meet people like Aaron Henry and Fanny Hamer in Mississippi, that is, if possible. I don't want to intrude, my interest is genuine. Do you have an office in New Orleans where I could start?

As it looks now I shall be in Louisiana at the end of October and I have about a month or five weeks to spend, which is not too much but still could give me some impression of the deeper South, which I don't know. I have studied at Vanderbilt long long ago and followed some courses at Fisk, but I never saw the heart of the South.

I hope you will forgive me this letter - bold as it is, but if you can help me, please let me know.

I shall leave my country on July 1st and visit the Far East, and from there arrive in the U.S. in September. So if you could help me, would it be possible to write back before July 1st. If you want information about this Dutch traveller, you could write to some of my American friends, like dr R Basler, head of the Reference Dep't of the Library of Congress or Prof John Hope Franklin of the Dep't of History of the Univ of Chicago.

I shall be grateful to hear from you

Yours sincerely

Protest march of grape pickers lasted 25 days, wound through California vineyards to Sacramento. Attention it got led up to triple breakthrough for union.

Farm union reaps first California victory

Its recognition in Schenley and Christian Brothers vineyards and election offer by DiGiorgio Corp. give organized labor an entry on farms—though so far it's only a toehold

California's $3.5-billion agriculture industry watched with stunned apprehension this week as organized labor prepared to harvest the first fruit of its long but heretofore unsuccessful drive to bring trade unionism to the farm.

Not since Congress in 1935 specifically excluded agricultural workers from the protection of the Wagner Act had labor tasted the kind of triumph that burst upon the California scene last week in two stages:

(1) In Los Angeles, Schenley Industries, Inc., which owns the Roma and Cresta Blanca wineries, yielded to boycott pressure and agreed to recognize the unaffiliated National Farm Workers Assn. (NFWA) as sole collective bargaining agent for 450 vineyard employees.

(2) In San Francisco, DiGiorgio Corp., a giant among corporate farmers, proposed state-supervised elections to determine which, if any, union would represent its 1,163 employees on four California farms. President Robert DiGiorgio backed up the proposal with a pledge to bargain in good faith with any union that polls a majority.

The Christian Brothers of California kept the pot fermenting this week by volunteering, in the interest of "social justice . . . for our California agricultural workers," to recognize NFWA as bargaining agent. Brother U. Gregory, president of Mont La Salle Vineyards, also revealed that the religious order had proposed to other vintners last February "that an employer group be formed to bring collective bargaining to vineyard workers," but said the proposal was rejected. Christian Brothers employs 25 in its two vineyards.

Bigger than it looks. The low employment figures listed for the three groups cast a deceptive light on the possible impact of these developments. At the peak season the companies employ many more workers.

Average employment on California farms last year, for all seasons, ran to 305,110, according to the State Dept. of Industrial Relations. Among these, 91,000 were farm owners and their families, 92,000 were hired annual workers, and 119,000 were hired seasonal workers.

On the national scene, farm employment is 3,780,000, according to the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics.

In winning the Schenley and Christian Brothers recognition and eliciting DiGiorgio's voluntary tender of the olive branch, labor has barely dipped a toe into this vast manpower pool. And the NFWA, a grass-roots outfit composed mainly of Mexican-Americans, could still fall flat, as its predecessors have in the past 20 years.

But, to labor, the Schenley and DiGiorgio developments came as an encouraging break in farm organizing. William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO organizing director, was in California and helped arrange the Schenley deal, supporting the independent NFWA. An aide in Washington said: "Our guys are going to move in behind the break. This may give us the impetus to crack open the whole farm worker field. But we're still going to have to fight like hell to do it."

Colorful march. The Schenley and DiGiorgio developments occurred last week as a scant handful of the Mexican-Americans, borrowing a page from the notebook of civil rights demonstrators, trudged dusty back roads of the San Joaquin Valley in the final stages of a 25-day march on the state capital in Sacramento.

In rural town after rural town, sympathizers fell in behind the colorful banners of the marchers to walk with them for a few miles and to offer them the hospitality of their homes. It was an orderly, well-organized pilgrimage to the seat of government, appealing for help in a struggle for recognition and higher wages. Instead of the prevailing $1.20-an-hour for picking grapes, NFWA wants $1.40 plus an incentive rate of 25¢ a box.

Wide backing. Unlike earlier attempts to arouse California farm laborers, this one has succeeded in avoiding accusations of Communist infiltration.

Clergymen of many religious persuasions have bestowed a benign smile on the little union's efforts to prosecute a strike against some 30 vineyards in Kern and Tulare Counties at the southern tip of the valley. California's eight Roman Catholic bishops collaborated last month in a formal appeal to a Senate subcommittee probing the farm labor problem. They asked for amendment of the federal labor code to extend to farmers and their employees all the rights accorded workers in other industries.

Responsible in no small part for this tactical advantage is a dynamic 39-year-old former migrant farm worker with the colorful name of Cesar Estrada Chavez, who pulled the NFWA together in 1962 as a social service organization. Chavez, according to his biographer, gives his members not only a trade union but also an insurance plan, a credit union, and a retail co-op. With Latin fervor they idolize their "Cesar."

Chavez has survived the scrutiny of the clergy as well, and priests from the East who have visited California to inspect this phenomenon of the soil have been quoted in the Catholic press in laudatory phrases rarely accorded a layman.

Line-up. The NFWA is not the only union in the field. In 1959 AFL-CIO set up the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AWOC) in Stockton, Calif., but gave it little financial muscle. How it survived against grower antipathy, worker resistance, and AFL-CIO lukewarmness is a mystery.

Still a third union has hoisted its banner—the Tulare-Kern Counties Independent Farm Workers Union (IFWU). DiGiorgio Corp. addressed its election proposal to all three. By midweek it had received responses from none, although Chavez fulminated to the press that the proposal was hemmed in by "unacceptable preconditions" and a spokesman branded the IFWU a "company union."

Chavez launched his strike of grape pickers last September in sympathy with an AWOC walkout of farm workers in the Delano area of Kern County. Although the harvest and pruning seasons are long past, the strike—"huelga" in the mother tongue—is still in force. The march to Sacramento was intended to dramatize the fact and bring public and governmental pressure on the growers to yield recognition.

Climax. On the steps of the Capitol last Sunday afternoon, Chavez lifted his face to the light sprinkle of rain that greeted his triumphal completion of the 300-mile "peregrinacion" and beamed at the roar of "Viva Cesar" and "Viva huelga" that rose from an emotional throng of several thousand gathered on the steps. Around him were the 30 or so who had made the full trek.

There was no question about the militancy of this Easter audience, but also no way of judging how many were farm laborers and how many were sympathizers from other unions in Northern California.

Chavez proclaimed the end of the boycott against Schenley (which then set up the beer and tequila for the fiesta that followed a religious ceremony at a local Catholic Church). But he hurled defiance at DiGiorgio with a call for boycott of the company's S&W and Tree-Sweet food products. (DiGiorgio's wines are sold by the tank car to private label bottlers.)

Shortfall. Two unrelated events conspired to deny Chavez the full measure of his triumph, but he gave no sign that it was less than total. One was DiGiorgio's conciliatory proposal, which let some steam out of the dramatic march three days before its climactic arrival in the capital. In effect, DiGiorgio offered more than the union asked for—provided the union could win a bargaining agency election.

The other event cast doubt on Chavez' tactical flexibility. He had demanded that Governor Edmund G. Brown be on hand to hear the marchers' grievances when they arrived in Sacramento. Brown, though he is running for reelection and is publicly on record in support of the grape pickers, refused to give up an earlier commitment to spend Easter with his family in Palm Springs 350 miles away. The governor offered to meet the marchers on Saturday, when they were camped across the Sacramento River 10 miles from the capital, or on the following Monday.

Chavez' insistence on a Sunday confrontation won the admiration of his followers—their chant of "We want Brown" reverberated against the portico of the empty Capitol—but it gained little yardage with others. Even Brown's political foes resented the issuance of an ultimatum to the friendly governor of the biggest state.

Questions. Whether Chavez is the man of destiny his given name suggests remains to be seen. Schenley's capitulation to him instead of to AWOC, but in the presence of AFL-CIO officials and a special representative of Teamster President James Hoffa, was unexplained. It gave rise to rumors that Chavez plans an alliance with AFL-CIO.

Although not now affiliated with AFL-CIO, his union has one powerful friend, Walter Reuther, in the federation's hierarchy. Reuther visited the vineyard pickets in Delano last December and pledged $5,000 a month of United Auto Workers funds to the cause. Should Chavez succeed on a grand scale, he and his members would be welcome allies for Reuther in the rivalry of his Industrial Union Dept. with the craft unionists of the AFL-CIO. End

Thirty states are using tax-exempt bonds to lure industry; they call it "development," labor calls it "piracy."

LABOR

On the trail of runaway plants

AFL-CIO bounces back from its Taft-Hartley 14(b) defeat with new attack on 'right to work' states. Target is federal tax-exemption on bonds used to lure industry

Labor leaders who failed in a legislative campaign against Taft-Hartley Sec. 14(b), which allows states to bar union-shop contracts, have opened a new attack on many of the "right to work" states. The objective is a change in federal tax policies that help states woo new industry.

Federal laws grant state and local governments the right to issue tax-exempt bonds. This legislation was designed to ease the way for financing public facilities—schools, hospitals, roads, and the like. Securities could be sold at a low interest rate.

Rush for bargains. But in recent years state and local governments and their development commissions have used the tax-exempt securities in their competition for new industry. Bond money has been used to construct industrial or commercial facilities for sale or lease to private concerns. And companies in their rush for cheaper money, have taken advantage of the offered opportunities; industrial development bond totals are soaring.

What bothers the AFL-CIO and its affiliates is this: There are laws against compulsory unionism, under T-H Sec. 14(b), in 19 states; for years, union growth has been inhibited in these states—they are among the most sparsely unionized in the nation; and, so far this year, the same states are at the top of the list of those that have raised money for industrial development by tax-exempt security sales.

To AFL-CIO, this is "subsidized plant migration," with "all American taxpayers underwriting the subsidy . . . a perversion of the intent of the tax-free bond privilege."

Although the federation's worries are particularly about the use of tax-exempt bonds by the so-called "right to work" states, some 30 states are now using the financial practice.

Controls sought. AFL-CIO wants Congress to impose tighter controls over tax-exempt bonds. It doesn't want to bar "legitimate" use of such bonds, it says, but it does want restrictions to keep industry from reaping financial rewards possible by shifting plant sites to areas that use "cheap money" from tax-exempt bonds as a lure.

Labor's lobbyists are at work on this on Capitol Hill now. They are urging legislation this session. They see more possibilities of action in 1967, when curbs on tax-exempt bonds will be a prime labor legislative objective. More will be heard of it, probably, than of repeal of 14(b).

AFL-CIO's drive to eliminate the "right to work" clause from the federal law is by no means dead, but it's on a back burner and likely to stay there in 1967.

Few will say so publicly, but many labor leaders believe that—from a practical standpoint—legislation curbing tax-exempt bonds might help unions more, immediately, than repeal of 14(b). Eliminating the "right to work" clause would help psychologically, but slowing shifts to little-unionized, lower-wage areas would stabilize jobs.

'Piracy' assailed. Recently, I. W. Abel, president of the United Steelworkers, told the National Governors' Conference in California that "plant piracy" through tax-exempt bonds has been a major factor in the loss of 60,000 steelworkers jobs in the last three years [BW Jul.16'66, p50].

Abel added: "The files of the AFL-CIO provide additional proof that hundreds of thousands have been victimized by plant piracy spurred by sweatshop wages, substandard state labor and welfare laws, and the inducement of governmentally subsidized industrial bond financing." "Labor," the Steelworkers' chief said, "is determined to fight such practices, and we must win."

Abel was a spokesman for the AFL-CIO on the points raised about industrial development bonds; much of his material came from a detailed—and worried—study made for the federation by Frank L. Fernbach, its assistant research director.

I. Unlikely alliance

AFL-CIO fought for 14(b) repeal more or less in isolation, but the federation isn't alone in its campaign to remove the tax relief granted industry through industrial bond financing. It is in alliance with such unlikely partners as the Investment Bankers Assn. The Treasury Dept. is preparing its own support for a legislated end to the practice, a technique that Secretary Henry H. Fowler has predicted will eventually become self-defeating.

Congress is considering a spate of bills that seek to restrict the practice of granting tax relief to corporations. Among the pending measures is one offered by Representative Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) that would prohibit a company from deducting as a tax liability rent or other payments for facilities financed by industrial bonds. Another would remove the tax exemption on industrial or commercial facilities but would continue it for bonds sold to finance urban renewal or other public projects.

In joining the fight, AFL-CIO lobbyists add labor's legislative weight to a campaign that is expected to advance rapidly and that could bring action next year.

Motives vary. While the proponents share the same goals, their reasons aren't necessarily alike. The AFL-CIO attack is aimed particularly at Southern communities that have used bond financing to attract unionized plants from the North with offers of low-cost facilities that could be manned by low-wage, nonunion workers.

Labor has fought "runaway-shop" lures for many years, but its emphasis has been on 14(b) repeal to eliminate the appeal of nonunion wage differentials. But 12 years ago, before the AFL-CIO merger, AFL alone made an extensive study of "subsidized industrial plant migration" at a time when only eight states, mostly in the South, were using the tax-free bond to lure new industry.

At that time, AFL said, "Another measure widely used to attract industry into an area is the issuance of municipal bonds to build factories, which are then leased at low rates to companies induced to locate in the community. The advantages to such a company are obvious; its funds are not tied up in capital expenditures and it gains plant facilities at a limited cost. In addition, the municipally owned plants are exempt from local property taxes, and those companies taking advantage of these plants thus receive an indirect tax exemption."

Rejuvenated drive. While labor had long complained of the industrial-bond practice, it only now sees a good prospect of legislative action. This prospect has resulted in the revived and rejuvenated campaign and given the AFL-CIO a chance to salvage something from its abortive drive for 14(b) repeal.

The new impetus stems in part from the spread of the practice from eight to 30 states, but even more from the recent rapid growth of tax-exempt bond financing to attract industry. In 1965, this amounted to $213.5-million, while in the first four months of this year the total jumped to $227.8-million. Abel predicted the total would be between $500-million and $1-billion for all of 1966 if the present rate continues.

No longer are the Southern states the only ones in the field. They have been joined by Northern industrial states and cities that feel the competitive need to attract industry. Ohio and Delaware are already on the list, along with Iowa and Kansas.

According to Representative Reuss, "Altogether, some 38 states have prepared or are preparing to use tax-exemption privileges for industrial purposes, and the stage is set for an escalation of unfair competition to nationwide industrial warfare."

Appeal to South. The obvious result, supporters of legislative curbs are quick to note, is that the advantage of industrial-bond financing is being lost by the Southern states that started the program. This, it is believed, should help to win the support of regional Congressmen who have resisted such legislation in the past.

One obvious target of such an appeal is Representative Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), influential chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee. His panel would handle the legislation. Mills' own state has been highly active in such bond financing in the past. But, says one labor official, "Once he sees that everybody's doing it, he may well decide this is the time to act."

Most of the stepped-up industrial-bond financing, AFL-CIO officials agree, is not directed at plant pirating, as such, but at building and expanding facilities. The tax advantages are going to companies building in their own areas.

Prospect of struggle. Still, Reuss predicts that "plant pirating, uneconomic location, and job shifts will accelerate. Not only will the Northern states battle the hitherto advantaged states of the South, but the struggle between the great industrial cities and, indeed, between a city and smaller communities in the same state will intensify."

II. Another approach

While the "runaway plant" is the target of labor's support in the effort to restrict industrial-bond financing, AFL-CIO is attacking such plant movements in other ways. Another legislative approach is aimed at denying use of federal funds to retrain workers in plants that have shifted from one locality to another.

One campaign is being led by Local 1102 of the International Union of Electrical Workers, which fought to block a proposed $91,000 federal retraining program for employees of Western Electric Co. at Mount Pleasant, Iowa. Local officials accused the company of shifting 254 jobs from the company's St. Louis plant, where Local 1102 represents workers.

Plea rejected. In an appeal to Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz, the local urged that training funds be withheld under the "anti-pirating" clause of the Manpower Development & Training Act. However, Wirtz denied the appeal on the ground that the shift did not result in job losses at the original site, as required for an affirmative finding.

The local contended that the additional jobs were "totally nonrelated" employment. With AFL-CIO support, it is seeking a change in the "loose language" of the anti-pirating section of the Manpower Act that would bar manpower training funds at relocated plants. End

Second-Class Citizens:

Big Gap in Labor Law Denies Protection to Farm Workers

The following is excerpted from an address by William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO director of organization, to the Washington chapter of the Industrial Relations Research Association.

THE FARM WORKER knows, as all the poor have known, that to move forward calls for joint action with his fellow workers—and that means organizing; and organizing—for workers—means unionism and collective bargaining.

The first obstacle he faces is the fact that the coverage of the federal law which covers millions of other workers and has for over 30 years—is denied him.

Mind you, farm workers are not denied the right to have unions and engage in collective bargaining. They are merely denied the protection and procedural assistance of federal law, as enjoyed by other citizens, in their efforts to attain them and, once established, no protection. This means that there are no labor-management restrictions upon their employers in their actions resisting the farm workers' organizing efforts. Union recognition and bargaining, therefore, must occur through the voluntary willingness of the employer.

Employers have traditionally shown themselves willing to voluntarily recognize unions when (1) they have the major say in the kind of union it is, or (2) alternatives to recognition are made more distasteful and/or economically dangerous than recognizing and bargaining with the union.

It is clear, therefore, that the farm worker is faced with building a "company union" or resorting to strikes and boycotts. Thus, the legislative situation inflicts upon the farm worker the procedures of striking and boycotting as his only method of building an honorable union.

The unfairness of this is magnified by the fact that built into the system are two factors which make successful strikes extremely unlikely. One is only indirectly related to a bad national policy but the other, and more important one, is a direct result of our immigration policy.

The first has to do with the impact of general hostile local, state and municipal courts which are able, without a federal law, to take immediate jurisdiction of any matter in the labor-management relations purview which comes before them. Because this is farm labor, such matter

Such injunctions have even taken the union loudspeakers away so that a lonely picket could not even call for help effectively, let alone communicate with the workers in the field.

But an even more critical detriment to effective strikes is the U.S. immigration policy which permits (almost encourages) an endless supply of "scabs" and "strikebreakers" from the other side of the border to any U.S. farms within 350 miles of that border.

How does it happen? Easy! The visa which an alien gets in order to enter this country, and which carries with it his pledge to become a U.S. citizen, is treated like a "work permit" at every entry point on the Mexican border. Visa holders, referred to as "green carders" because of the color of the visa card, commute back and forth across the border without anyone ever questioning the relationship of their pledge to seek citizenship with their commuter habits. It is estimated that in certain seasons the daily commuters are as high as 60,000 per day.

It must also be pointed out that these loose practices are precisely what is responsible for much of the great population growth in the northern cities of Mexico, which has been substantial. The extreme depths of economic disadvantage suffered by the Mexican in native employment usually makes even the lowest-paid U.S. employment very attractive to him.

After three painful years of striking against all of these built-in government instigated obstacles which weigh the scales so heavily against the farm workers' chances, the farm workers union has realized that without some kind of meaningful effort on the part of the U.S. Government to give them an element of "fair play" balance in their struggle to organize, the strike has, at least, only a contributory role to play in the organizational process.

All of this leads to the last piece of machinery which the worker can hope will help him get from his present position of abject unorganized weakness to a position of some organizational form upon which he can begin to build the collective bargaining procedures for self-help and economic progress which have been available to other American citizens for so long. That machinery is the

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE WERE A NUMBER of things about the recent election that ought to serve as a warning to the American people that all is not well in the presidential election machinery.

- There was the panicky uncertainty for far too long that the election might be thrown into the House with all the political chicanery that such a calamity might well have entailed.
- There was also the obvious failure of the Electoral College vote—302 for Nixon and 191 for Humphrey—to reflect the exceedingly narrow margin, a bare 300,000 votes out of 72 million, by which Pres.-Elect Nixon won.
- And there was a lot of worry that neither Nixon nor Vice-Pres. Humphrey might attain the needed Electoral College majority and that George Wallace might seek to bargain with the 45 Electoral College votes that were his.

Undoubtedly efforts will be made in the forthcoming 91st Congress to change the current system.

Some reformers would tamper just a little bit with the Electoral College by binding the electors to vote for the ticket on which they run. They are not so obligated legally.

Others would go a step farther and divide a state's Electoral College vote on the proportion of the state's vote that each candidate gets instead of the all or nothing system that now prevails.

Finally, there are those who would do away with the whole Electoral College business and elect future Presidents by a national popular vote.

How far any of these proposals will get in the next Congress is open to question. All of them would require constitutional amendments and Congress is traditionally loath to enter the constitutional thicket.

BUT THERE WAS one failure of the election about which all Americans can do something without waiting for Congress to act—that is the dismal failure of too many Americans not to vote at all.

On the basis of virtually complete returns only 60 percent of the eligible voters in the country voted—the lowest percentage since 1956.

An Associated Press analysis of the national total shows that only about 72 million Americans out of 120 million of voting age went to the polls and registered their political choice in an election that held vital importance for all of the 120 million and their children.

There were some unusual aspects to the 1968 statistics. The Southern states—largely because of heavy Negro registrations and white "backlash" votes—produced bigger turnouts than usual. Some of the big states didn't do too well at all.

California grew by almost a million during the past four years, employer.

Employers have traditionally shown themselves willing to voluntarily recognize unions when (1) they have the major say in the kind of union it is, or (2) alternatives to recognition are made more distasteful and/or economically dangerous than recognizing and bargaining with the union.

The first has to do with the impact of general hostile local, state and municipal courts which are able, without a federal law, to take immediate jurisdiction of any matter in the labor-management relations purview which comes before them. Because this is farm labor, such matters will occur in the agricultural or rural areas. The courts and the judges there are part and parcel of the agriculture-dominated "power structure."

THE FARM WORKER expects little justice under such circumstances, and that's about what he gets. So a strike which starts among 10,000 acres of grapes today is likely to find itself enjoined against any kind of effective picketing tomorrow, including the limitation and placement of pickets on a one-per-gate ratio in such a way as to separate and isolate them completely from their fellow workers and thereby expose them to the brutal violence of the company supervision and hired goons.

much of the great population growth in the northern cities of Mexico, which has been substantial. The extreme depths of economic disadvantage suffered by the Mexican in native employment usually makes even the lowest-paid U.S. employment very attractive to him.

That machinery is the consumer boycott.

Today a national boycott against nearly all California table grapes is the major organizational machinery of the farm workers' union.

The farm workers union is established and it is here to stay. It's leadership is dedicated to its furtherance, whatever the personal sacrifice.

The labor movement of this nation—all segments of it—is united on this. Of all the things you can find about which the various elements within the house of labor can, from time to time disagree about—one thing upon which there is complete and total unanimity today is the importance of the farm workers succeeding in their effort to build their union.

Finally, there are those who would do away with the whole Electoral College business and elect future Presidents by a national popular vote.

How far any of these proposals will get in the next Congress is open to question. All of them would require constitutional amendments and Congress is traditionally loath to enter the constitutional thicket.

California grew by almost a million during the past four years, yet only about 30,000 more votes were cast in 1968 than in 1964. Illinois cast 172,000 less votes in 1968 than in 1964 although it had grown by almost 200,000 during the same period. Ohio produced 23,000 less votes in 1968 than in 1964 although it had grown by 235,000 in the interval. New Jersey, which grew by 264,000 between 1964 and 1968 could produce only an extra 6,000 votes in 1968.

These were all states that Vice Pres. Humphrey lost by narrow margins and a few more votes—even that famous one extra vote per precinct—might have made a difference in the outcome.

The importance of a big voter turnout has never been lost on labor—which, perhaps, more than any other group in the country has devoted time, money and effort to persuade voters to register and vote.

It is clear, however, that labor needs to be joined by other civic minded organizations in the country in the campaign to impress upon voters the importance of registering and voting.

This is at least one job Americans can do for themselves without waiting for the Constitution to be changed.

Question of Human Dignity:

Grape Pickers in Semi-Slavery, Woman Strike Leader Reports

A MOTHER OF SEVEN children, who is a union official, charged that California grape growers hold workers in "semi-slavery."

Vowing that workers will fight "on and on" to build their union, Delores Huerta, vice president of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee declared, "It is not just a question of wages."

"It is a question of human dignity, of equality," she asserted, on the network interview, Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays at 7:45 p.m., EST, on Mutual Radio.

Mrs. Huerta pointed out that "most of the field workers are Mexican-American, Filipino, Negro and Puerto Rican." The growers, she said, "try to get the idea over that workers are sub-human . . . play one race against the other . . . and actually perpetrate racial prejudice."

She noted that farm workers are denied the rights and protections other workers have under the National Labor Relations Act. They are "absolutely powerless . . . have no control over their conditions . . . no job security," she said.

"If a worker tries to find out who he is working for . . . or what his wages are going to be for the next day, he is fired," she said.

"SO MUCH VIOLENCE (was) perpetrated against our strikers and our pickets" that the union was forced to launch the nationwide boycott against table grapes, as the "safest weapon we have," she explained. Telling effects of the boycott on the table grape market, she said, are evident in shipments "far below normal" and prices substantially lower than last year.

She urged union members and others who are sympathetic to the farm workers to provide "visible, physical support" and financial contributions. "Sympathy alone," she said, "just isn't going to make it."

Reporters questioning Mrs. Huerta on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Stanley Levey of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alex Uhl, of Press Associates, Inc.

"HUMAN DIGNITY and equality"—not just wages—are the aims of farm workers in building their union, Vice Pres. Delores Huerta of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee told reporters Stanley Levey of Scripps-Howard Newspapers, left, and Alexander Uhl of Press Associates, Inc., on Labor News Conference. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays at 7:35 p.m., EST, on Mutual Radio.

Violent Anti-Union Drive Pushed on Grape Growers

By RUTH STACK

WASHINGTON (PAI) — It's do or die for the nation's farm corporations on the union organization front. They're pulling together a powerful coalition of conservative forces to counter the organized labor's effective boycott of California table grapes.

But while the growers aim their propaganda barrage at the grape strikers, their focus is on America's other big crops and the spectre of organization of all farm workers.

The American Farm Bureau Federation is the latest big gun to fire on the grape strikers. Delegates to the recent Farm Bureau convention sat at tables munching California grapes while Jose Mendoza, the growers' handpicked "farm worker" warned that if union efforts were successful in the grape strike they could spread to other products throughout the nation.

Mendoza who is really a labor contractor in the San Joaquin Valley says he, not Cesar Chavez, speaks for the farm workers of California. Mendoza is director of the Agricultural Workers Freedom to Work Association — a company "union" — and is on the payroll of the National Right to Work Committee.

The head of the Farm Bureau, Charles B. Schuman, expressed his concern over the boycott by urging delegates to stop patronizing the Jewel Co. stores in Chicago because they refused to handle the struck grapes.

The Farm Bureau's concern is echoed by the John Birch Society. They recently frightened readers of American Opinion by saying the UFWOC would unite "American agricultural workers in a single union under the control of revolutionary leaders — known Marxists and identified Communists. The goal, simply put, is control of America's for farm workers and California Gov. Ronald Reagan allowed as he might consider a vote sometime under certain conditions.

For years the nation's wealthiest farmers and corporate farms have reaped the benefit of U.S. farm policies. The Department of Agriculture has conducted research and discovered techniques that have revolutionized farming. Any citizen can make use of the special harvesting equipment, new seeds, new fertilizer, and new insecticides developed by USDA, but it's the biggest farmers that get the most benefit.

USDA inventions and other mechanization have made the big growers also less dependent on the field workers. Labor leaders have warned that a serious new social crisis will develop as tens of thousands of Mexican-American and Negro farm workers are left totally unemployed and rootless in the near future.

The farm workers are turning to the union. The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee has the support of the entire labor movement. The grape strike is one of its efforts, a strike by Texas farm workers is another. AFL-CIO organizers reported a dramatic response to organizing efforts among Florida migrant workers.

Some Louisiana sugar beet workers are organized in the Amalgamated Meat Cutters. Cannery workers, closely related to workers on the field, are organized by the Meat Cutters, the Teamsters and other labor groups.

The growers' worry that they may have to share the wealth with farm workers is not an idle one. There was a strong movement in the last Congress to give farm workers the right to organize under the National Labor Relations Act.

During the last election campaign President-elect Nixon made an attack on the grape boycott that could backfire. He told farm workers to vote for a union, if they wanted one, instead of boycotting. Nixon apparently forgot farm workers are not covered by the National Labor Relations Act and that mistake could haunt him for the next four years.

There's even been a break among the grape growers. One West Coast grower said he'd be for organizing rights the entire labor movement. The grape strike is one of its efforts, a strike by Texas farm workers is another. AFL-CIO organizers reported a dramatic response to organizing efforts among Florida migrant workers.

In that last-minute rush of shopping for gifts, baking cookies and cakes, wrapping gifts and trimming the tree, trade unionists are reminded of those special symbols that should be an important part of their holiday season.

These are the emblems of the products and services of union men and women — union labels that identify quality goods made under quality conditions. When shoppers give top priority to the union label they add millions of fellow workers to their Christmas list. Buying with an eye on the label gives these union members the gift of added buying power and job security.

Gift-buying is only the symbol of loving and giving that makes Christmas such a favorite holiday. Store windows gleam with tinsel and toys; candy and candles are on our tables and sidewalk Santas ring their bells. Lighted trees and shining stars beam out a message of joy — all symbolic of our festive spirit.

Grape boycott spurs farm worker drive for election on union bargaining rights

BY RUTH STACK

It's do or die for the nation's farm corporations on the union organization front. They're pulling together a powerful coalition of conservative forces to counter the organized labor's effective boycott of California table grapes.

But while the growers aim their propaganda barrage at the grape strikers, their focus is on America's other big crops and the spectre of organization of all farm workers.

The American Farm Bureau Federation is the latest big gun to fire on the grape strikers. Delegates to the recent Farm Bureau convention sat at tables munching California grapes while Jose Mendoza, the growers hand-picked "farm worker" warned that if union efforts were successful in the grape strike they could spread to other products throughout the nation.

Mendoza who is really a labor contractor in the San Joaquin Valley says he, not Cesar Chavez, speaks for the farm workers of California. Mendoza is director of the Agricultural Workers Freedom to Work Association—a company "union"—and is on the payroll of the National Right to Work Committee.

The head of the Farm Bureau, Charles B. Schuman, expressed his concern over the boycott by urging dele-

Grapes: 'Another Kind of Boycott'

By JAMES E. BYLIN

SAN FRANCISCO — How do you fight a boycott that's "a cruel hoax, a blackmail tactic and a violation of moral law"?

With your own boycott.

Such has been one reaction by a number of farm and farm-oriented groups opposing the national boycott called by the AFL-CIO's National Farm Workers Organizing Committee against California's big fresh-grape industry in its effort to secure collective bargaining contracts with growers.

Their target: San Francisco, far from the dusty vineyards of California's central valley.

Last year, the San Francisco Board of Supervisors approved a resolution endorsing the boycott, a resolution that Mayor Joseph Alioto signed somewhat reluctantly. This action has triggered about a dozen farm groups to date —more than 10,000 money-spending delegates —to cancel their San Francisco-scheduled conventions and move them elsewhere. These groups include the American Farm Bureau Federation, the California Grape and Tree Fruit League, the California Beet Growers Association and the California Cattlemen's Association. Others may be following suit.

The groups criticize the boycott—and San Francisco—in pretty much the same language as Robert Durbrow, secretary of the Irrigation Districts Association of California, another San Francisco dropout, who labels the boycott as a cruel hoax, blackmail tactic and violation of moral law.

"We sincerely regret the necessity to use this means to express our displeasure with the grape boycott resolution . . .," Mr. Durbrow continues. "But our members' concern for protecting California agriculture from ruthless coercion was the executive committee's prime incentive in taking this action."

The question hence arises: Aren't these farm-rural groups adopting the same tactic they're denouncing?

Says one major grower and food distributor, "It's just another kind of boycott and as far as I'm concerned, any boycott is vicious. Carry a boycott to its logical end and it could be a very dangerous thing, opening a veritable Pandora's Box. Why, we could refuse to buy autos from Detroit because the city also endorsed the grape boycott."

Another highly placed farm official, who agrees that "there is some inconsistency in this thing," says most growers don't see it that way. They argue, he says, that the trouble with the grape boycott is that it's secondary in nature, aimed at keeping grapes out of markets, thus denying the housewife the right to buy grapes or boycott as she wishes. Their boycott, he distinguishes, is primary.

But then he also acknowledges that these groups may well be hurting many innocent victims by boycotting San Francisco, including the hotels, restaurants and retailers. (The San Francisco Convention and Tourist Bureau, which has asked the supervisors to revoke the resolution, says several million dollars in convention business may be lost.)

"This is an exertion of pressure to reach a goal or ideal," the farm official says. The apparent goal: To get the supervisors to change their minds even though, he shrugs, the politicians have no real, direct impact on the sale of grapes. Adds the grower-food distributor, "That's just another form of blackmail."

During the long grape boycott, now dating back more than a year, growers and their allies have constantly charged union organizers and their supporters with misrepresenting the facts. Yet, they may be dabbling in some of the same in regard to the San Francisco boycott.

Like others, for instance, the president of one group pulling out of San Francisco refers to the "unyielding position of the San Francisco mayor and board of supervisors. . . ."

"They've misinterpreted Mayor Alioto all along," says the farm official. "I guess they've felt he should have been more pro-agriculture." (Along with his lucrative law practice, Mayor Alioto has been the highly paid president of the rice growers association, a big cooperative.)

In fact, Mayor Alioto initially shied away from the resolution. He attempted to use his offices to at least initiate discussion between grape growers and union officials. This failed, according to an aide, when growers balked at the idea. Mayor Alioto subsequently signed the resolution, but with reservations, claiming the supervisors were actually condemning all growers, his aide explains.

Why did Mayor Alioto sign the resolution at all? According to his aide, "What the mayor was critical of was that growers refused any attempt to bring a solution or even to discuss the issues with the farm workers. This simply heightened tensions not only in farm areas, but in the Spanish-surname communities in the larger cities as well." San Francisco counts more than 100,000 Spanish-surname residents among its 800,000 population.

The grape growers contend their workers aren't out on strike, that the trouble is the work of outside agitators. They picture themselves, too, as innocent victims. What, then, could provoke their action against San Francisco? As the big grower-food distributor puts it, "If vengeance is their motive, then it's a good move."

Notable & Quotable

Dennis Altman, creative director of Altman, Bratrude & Soforth, speaking to the Junior Women's Advertising Club of Chicago:

. . . While the leaders of other industries excoriate the poets and painters of the love generation, (advertising agencies) employ them. And when we hire hippies, we do it to learn from them, not to "straighten them out." When we hire Negroes, we don't ask them to be white. We want them black. We need blackness for its genius, not its appearance. . . .

Contrary to all the Madison Avenue fables about martinis, gray suits and country club connections, the advertising business thrives on people who make waves, rock boats and shake foundations. We live on change. We feed on it. And we encourage it every way we can.

government ... the city, but Ottawa pays the bill. That decision touched off a vitriolic dispute between the two governments, an exchange of insults that perhaps reached its nadir when Mr. Trudeau said he thought Quebec Premier Jean-Jacques Bertrand was "off his rocker."

Decisions and Divisions

New life has also been breathed into Ottawa politics by Mr. Trudeau's permitting his ministers to express personal opinions before cabinet decisions are made. In the past, traditions of cabinet solidarity were interpreted to mean divisions of opinion couldn't be allowed to surface. Thus, before the NATO decision was made, some ministers publicly stood for or against a pullback and the prime minister said such statements didn't constitute a breach of cabinet solidarity when made before government policy has been decided. Now Finance Minister E. J. Benson is considering bringing in outside consultants to help prepare his budgets, a process that always has been conducted by a handful of departmental officials in utmost secrecy.

In other ways, though, Mr. Trudeau has imposed tight secrecy, notably on what happens within cabinet sessions. This is a reaction to the squabbles that frequently surfaced during the Pearson era. Officials scrupulously decline to talk about anything that happens within the cabinet room, including what color turtleneck the prime minister was wearing last weekend.

With this emphasis on secrecy until decisions are reached, it's difficult to tell just how much of the iceberg is likely to rise above surface before the Commons rises in June. Almost every department boasts of several task forces. But judging from the rate at which ideas and legislation have been coming to the surface lately, Mr. Trudeau realizes that his honeymoon is just about over. Now Canadians will see what living with him really like.

EV — Grape Strike

California's Sour Case of the Grapes

2/13/69 . . . Wall St. Journal . . . . . .

By JAMES E. BYLIN

SAN FRANCISCO—Since September 1965, the shouts of "huelga"—strike—have been ringing through the dusty vineyards around Delano in California's lower central valley. For more than a year, union leaders fighting for collective bargaining contracts with growers have been leading a national boycott against all California fresh grapes.

Superficially, at least, growers and the AFL-CIO's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, headed by the controversial 41-year-old Cesar Chavez, remain today as far apart as ever. About the only thing on which they do agree is that the boycott to date hasn't been a success. The simple proof: It hasn't brought the growers to the bargaining table.

Yet, the seeds sowed by the boycott may be ripening into a resolution. No one knows what that resolution may be, though the decision may finally rest with the weather-hardened grape pickers themselves.

Waiting for Harvest

California's $100 million fresh grape industry—the state produces some 90% of the nation's grapes—is now between seasons. Only a few grapes, relatively speaking, remain in cold storage for sale until May when the first harvests begin in Southern California's Coachella valley. The bulk of the grapes are disgorged during the summer and fall from central valley vineyards stretching several hundred miles from south of Delano to near Sacramento.

For the outsider, the true nature of the boycott and labor dispute is extremely difficult to unravel. The embittered growers and UFWOC can't agree on even the most basic facts. Along with language problems at the source—the farm workers—the barriers include complicated patterns of farm labor and fresh produce marketing and pricing.

The biggest discrepancy centers around UFWOC's impact in Delano, which remains the focus of the dispute though all California's several thousand fresh grape growers are involved in the boycott. Growers contend that 90% of the more than 5,000 workers at peak harvest live in the Delano area, and have regularly picked the grapes in defiance of the union. UFWOC's picket-line threats and intimidations have turned the workers against the union, growers hold. Moreover, they claim, UFWOC's muscle is flexed by student activists and clergymen—not farm laborers—who wrongly consider the dispute a civil rights protest.

UFWOC doesn't deny the outside support. In fact, the union argues, with little fear of contradiction, the strike probably would have lived and died in obscurity if Mr. Chavez hadn't lured the students and clergymen to Delano in late 1965. Mr. Chavez likes to call the dispute "la causa"—the cause.

UFWOC bristles at the contention that farm workers don't support it, too. Since the strike began, according to the union, untold thousands of workers have been convinced to leave Delano and work in non-struck crops, with growers continually replacing them with "strikebreakers."

UFWOC cites a graduate student's study that indicates 60% of the work force actually are migrants, many tilling the vineyards for the first time. Mr. Chavez has placed UFWOC's dues-paying members at 17,000 in the past, but the union now declines to release a figure. "Growers take us to the cleaners on the membership issue—it fluctuates so much," admits James Drake, a top union aide.

As evidence of inroads among vineyard workers, UFWOC points to a key election at the ranches of big Di Giorgio Corp., which raises fresh grapes and other foods. Di Giorgio, which formerly sold processed foods nationally under the S&W Fine Foods label, was an early boycott target. Unlike most other growers, it agreed to an election.

In the August 1966 election, UFWOC defeated the rival Teamster's Union, then making a short-lived fling at organizing farm workers. Only 2% of the voters cast their ballots for "no union." A contract was signed in 1967 after long arbitration.

Mr. Drake also points to turnover figures prior to the Di Giorgio election as evidence of union support. He contends that the work force at the company's Delano ranch was 1,100 during the harvest-time election, but that the number eligible to vote was about 2,600. The balance included workers who left after the strike was called the previous September. The company says it's impossible to determine the number of eligible voters, but its election records do indicate a total vote several hundred above employment at the time.

This union breakthrough may not prove permanent, however. Di Giorgio, which sold its S&W subsidiary, has also been under court order to divest its farm lands. Arbitrators writing its contract with UFWOC denied a "successor clause" which would have committed buyers of the land to union representation. Di Giorgio is now negotiating the sale of its final 6,100 acres, portending the end of the contract. UFWOC has also succeeded in winning a few other agreements, mainly with wineries, and claims 11 contracts covering 3,000 workers at peak season.

Most growers, though, resist the union and hotly deny charges they are exploiters. They counter that their harvesters are much better paid than most farm workers, averaging about $2.50 an hour. This is considerably above California's $1.70-an-hour average for farm workers in 1968. California, in turn, ranks with Washington and Connecticut as paying the highest farm wages in the nation.

If Delano workers are better off than their counterparts elsewhere in California and other states, why is the battle raging around the normally tranquil town? For one thing, many union leaders feel that if they're ever going to be successful in organizing all farm workers, they must make a major breakthrough at the top of the economic strata in agriculture rather than the bottom. They also maintain that even with a steady rise in farm wages—one grower estimates his average worker earns 85% more presently than five years ago—the gap between farm and industrial pay still is widening.

As far as harassment charges are concerned, UFWOC grumbles it's been the victim—by local police and sheriff's officials, particularly during the first year of the strike. "We had well over 100 people arrested and never convicted," says Mr. Drake. Nevertheless, as one top grape industry official puts it, "growers are convinced they are right—that their workers really don't want the union."

To hear growers tell it, they weathered the boycott quite nicely this past year. The boycott, one major grower-shipper allows, did effectively seal off the major New York and Boston markets and cut sales in such other big cities as Chicago, Atlanta, Detroit, Minneapolis, Milwaukee and San Francisco. However, he says, the crop was indeed sold and at "very satisfactory" and profitable prices, some the highest ever, except during August when historically they're depressed by large supplies hitting the market at one time.

Explaining a Paradox

How does he explain the seeming paradox of market losses and generally profitable prices? Conceding "We're not entirely certain," he speculates that "knowing we didn't have New York and Boston, we sought out new markets we didn't previously use in the South and Midwest. We extended more effort."

Predictably, the union has a different version. James Drake acknowledges that growers did find safety valve markets to circumvent the brunt of the boycott. But Mr. Drake also figures growers had to drop prices to break into these markets. He guesses the boycott cost them some $15 million, a figure industry officials dismiss as "hilarious."

Mr. Drake, meanwhile, says the union is intensifying the boycott and will carry it into cities where growers found their new markets, a maneuver that has some growers privately worried. "Will we get by with a more intensified boycott?" one major grower ponders.

Concern over a more effective boycott may yet persuade growers to modify their opposition to union certification elections in the fields. No machinery now exists by which a union could legally force such an election. The National Labor Relations Act provides such procedures in most industries, but the act excludes farm workers.

Ironically, this exclusion—long backed by farm owners—also undercuts charges by growers and their supporters that the grape boycott is illegal. The Labor Relations Act does outlaw secondary boycotts by labor organizations, but its definition of such organizations excludes agricultural workers.

Joseph M. McLaughlin, a southern California lawyer who represents major supermarket chains in the area, recalls that he was once able to use provisions of the act to settle a UFWOC boycott against a winery. In that case, the act applied because the union included not only field workers but also some non-excluded packing-shed work[illegible] they [illegible]

In that case, the act applied because the union included not only field workers but also some non-excluded packing-shed workers. "Then they got smart," he says, and divested themselves of the packing-shed workers. He notes, however, that stores still can get some relief by asking courts to limit and control picketing.

Gov. Reagan's Position

Gov. Ronald Reagan, who in general has backed the growers solidly, says he favors state legislation to provide machinery for elections to determine if field hands want a union. Many growers still don't want to talk about such proposals. The union, which distrusts the Governor, is adopting a wait-and-see attitude until the actual bills start to grind their way through the legislature.

Union officials would oppose legislation that would limit elections to year-round farm workers, who may be more apt to side with employers. They note that Gov. Reagan supports unemployment insurance only for year-round workers.

An even bigger stumbling block may center on Gov. Reagan's call for legislation to prohibit strikes and work stoppages at harvest times. Growers claim their major fear is a strike at harvest time that could wipe out a year's crop. They argue they can't tool up again as a struck manufacturing plant can. But the union also is adamant that it won't talk about a non-strike clause — except at the bargaining table.

The need for some kind of legislation is clear, if only to settle the problem in the mind of consumers who are being asked by unions and, in many cases, their churches to refuse to buy grapes. Growers claim the boycott is nothing more than a "blackmail" attempt to force them to the table against their—and their workers'—will. The unions rebut the boycott is necessary since they can't legally force elections. The Delano dispute is 3½ years old.

It would seem time for the legislature to crank up the machinery needed to settle the issue. And time too, for both sides to adopt the attitude expressed by one top industry official pondering his side's claim that the workers do not want a union, "If you believe this, you put your money where your mouth is."

REVIEW and OUTLOOK

The Cause Syndrome

We've always been a little skeptical of causes, and likewise of the people who aren't happy unless they're crusading for one or another of them. Causes and crusades are such black and white things, and in our experience the color of the truth is usually gray.

In the last few years, a most popular and curious cause has been boycotting grapes. Indeed, "la causa," it is called among labor union organizers trying to win the right to represent farm workers who tend and pick grapes in California. Other unions, many churches and various good liberal groups have been waging holy war, threatening with some effect to picket any grocery store that fails to quit stocking California table grapes.

Now, we think the union organizers have a point that there should be some machinery to resolve representation disputes in agriculture, which is not covered by the National Labor Relations Act election procedures. But the farmers also have a point: Just as it was necessary to stop railroads from charging whatever the traffic would bear at harvest time, so some procedures will be needed to prevent farm unions from doing the same thing. Working out legislation reflecting both of these equities is going to take a little time and a lot of compromising.

Such ambivalence strikes us as strange stuff from which to make a cause, and all the more so when the cause is tainted by so questionable a tactic as a secondary boycott. Supporters of the boycott make the debater's point that just as the grape growers escape the NLRA provisions for forcing elections, so the other side escapes its provisions outlawing such boycotts. But the anti-boycott provisions are not intended to balance the rights of the parties to the dispute; they were enacted for the excellent reason that secondary boycotts injure a lot of innocent bystanders.

The grape boycott has been no exception. An anti-boycott group is currently sending around, along with a lot of less thoughtful propaganda, reprints of a Washington Post article by Rep. B. F. Sisk, who represents part of the California grape country in Congress. He is, not so incidentally, a liberal Democrat who claims a voting record about 95% approved by the AFL-CIO.

Rep. Sisk points out that the labor disputes over grapes actually involve a few huge growers, whose farms are concentrated in Kern County. There have been practically no such disputes in the other seven counties of the San Joaquin Valley. In these seven counties, indeed, the average table grape farm includes only 36 acres. If the NLRA did apply to agriculture, most of these farms would remain exempt as too small. And while the boycotters are boycotting every last grape grown in California, the Kern County farms account for only 23% of the crop.

"In other words," Mr. Sisk continues, "in order to get jurisdiction over farm labor employed by 5% of the table grape growers who produce approximately 23% of California's table grapes, the farm union is willing to destroy the other 95% of the growers who raise the other 77% of the crop!"

Even if the boycott goes beyond its middling success so far, the large growers may have the financial reserves to weather it. This is not true of the typical grower, however, "men with calluses on their hands and mud on their boots." Rep. Sisk observes: "All they have to show for a lifetime of labor is a modest home and a big debt." He concludes that "they resent the abuse and vilification which has been heaped upon them by labor leaders, public officials, college activists and a host of other citizenry who seem unwilling to take the time to find out just exactly what the implications of the boycott are."

Much the same thing is true, we suspect, of most causes. Some people are psychologically fulfilled by the contagious enthusiasm of such pursuits as buttonholing people on street corners, collecting signatures of petitions, carrying picket signs and whatnot. Apparently it makes them feel virtuous.

This exuberant enthusiasm, though, is seldom compatible with any real understanding of the facts at issue. Or at least so it seems to us curmudgeons, who find that most political disputes are inherently ambivalent. The more you learn about them, the more the certainties fade away. And causes and crusades are blunt instruments, not adaptable to the qualifications, caveats and hints of doubt that strike us as marks of an honest search for truth.

What those picket signs for grape boycotts and such need is a little line of fine print: "Caution: There are probably two sides of this argument."

Grape Strike

Good Friday, 1969

E. E. Barr, Jr.
President
California Grape and Tree Fruit League
717 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Mr. Barr:

I am sad to hear your accusations in the Press that our union movement and table grape boycott have been successful because we have used violence and terror tactics. If what you say is true, I have been a failure and should withdraw from the struggle; but you are left with the awesome moral responsibility, before God and man, to come forward with whatever information you have so that corrective action can begin at once. If for any reason you fail to come forth to substantiate your charges then you must be held responsible for committing violence against us, albeit violence of the tongue. I am convinced that you as a human being did not mean what you said but rather acted hastily under pressure from the public relations firm that has been hired to try to counteract the tremendous moral force of our movement. How many times we ourselves have felt the need to lash out in anger and bitterness.

Today on Good Friday, 1969, we remember the life and the sacrifice of Martin Luther King, Jr. who gave himself totally to the non-violent struggle for peace and justice. In his Letter from Birmingham Jail, Dr. King describes better than I could our hopes for the strike and boycott: "Injustice must be exposed with all the tension its exposure creates, to the light of human conscience and the air of national opinion before it can be cured." For our part I admit that we have seized upon every tactic and strategy consistent with the morality of our cause to expose that injustice and thus to heighten the sensitivity of the American conscience so that farm workers will have without bloodshed their own union and the dignity of bargaining with their agri-business employers. By lying about the nature of our movement, Mr. Barr, you are working against non-violent social change. Unwittingly perhaps, you may unleash that other force that our union by discipline and deed, censure and education has sought to avoid; that panacean short cut: that senseless violence that honors no color, class, or neighborhood.

You must understand—I must make you undertsand—that our membership and the hopes and aspirations of the hundreds of thousands of the poor and dispossessed that have been raised on our account are all above all, human beings, no better, no worse than any other cross section of human society; we are not saints because we are poor, but by the same measure neither are we immoral. We, are men and women who have suffered and endured much and not only because of our abject poverty but because we have been kept poor. The colors of our skins, the languages of our cultural and native origins, the lack of formal education, the exclusion from the democratic process, the numbers of our slain in recent wars —all these burdens generation after generation have sought to demoralize us, to break our human spirit. But God knows that we are not beasts of burden, we are not agricultural implements or rented slaves, we are men. And mark this well, Mr. Barr, we are men locked in a death struggle against man's inhumanity to man in the industry that you represent. And this struggle itself gives meaning to our life and ennobles our dying.

As your industry has experienced, our strikers here in Delano and those who represent us throughout the world are well trained for this struggle. They have been under the gun, they have been kicked and beaten and herded by dogs, they have been cursed and ridiculed they have been stripped and chained and jailed, they have been sprayed with the poisons used in the vineyards; but they have been taught not to lie down and die or to flee in shame, but to resist with every ounce of human endurance and spirit. To resist not with retaliation in kind but to overcome with love and compassion, with ingenuity and creativity, with hard work and longer hours; with stamina and patient tenacity, with truth and public appeal, with friends and allies, with mobility and discipline, with politics and law, and with prayer and fasting. They were not trained in a month or even a year; after all, this new harvest season will mark our fourth full year of strike and even now we continue to plan and prepare for the years to come. Time accomplishes for the poor what money does for the rich.

This is not to pretend that we have everywhere been successful enough or that we have not made mistakes. And while we do not belittle or underestimate our adversaries, for they are the rich and the powerful and possess the land, we are not afraid or cringe from the confrontation. We welcome it! We have planned for it. We know that our cause is just, that history is a story of social revolution, and that the poor shall inherit the land.

Once again, I appeal to you as the representative of your industry and as a man. I ask you to recognize and bargain with our union before the economic pressure of the boycott and strike takes an irrevocable toll; but if not, I ask you to at least sit down with us to discuss the safeguards necessary to keep our historical struggle free of violence. I make this appeal because as one of the leaders of our non-violent movement, I know and accept my responsibility for preventing, if possible, the destruction of human life and property. For these reasons and knowing of Gandhi's admonition that fasting is the last resort in place of the sword, during a most critical time in our movement last February, 1968, I undertook a twenty-five-day fast. I repeat to you the principle enunciated to the membership at the start of the fast: if to build our union required the deliberate taking of life, either the life of a grower or his child, or the life of a farm worker or his child, then I choose not to see the union built. Mr. Barr, let me be painfully honest to you. You must understand these things. We advocate militant non-violence as our means for social revolution and to achieve justice for our people, but we are not blind or deaf to the desperate and moody winds of human frustration, impatience and rage that blow among us. Gandhi himself admitted that if his only choices were cowardice or violence, he would choose violence. Men are no angels and the time and tides wait for no man. Precisely because of these powerful human emotions, we have tried to involve masses of people in their own struggle. Participation and self determination remain the best experience of freedom; and free men instinctively prefer democratic change and even protect the rights guaranteed to seek it. Only the enslaved in despair have need of violent overthrow.

This letter does not express all that is in my heart, Mr. Barr. But if it says nothing else it says that we do not hate you or rejoice to see your industry destroyed; we hate the agribusiness system that seeks to keep us enslaved and we shall overcome and change it not by retaliation or bloodshed but by a determined non-violent struggle carried on by those masses of farm workers who intend to be free and human.

Sincerely Yours,
Cesar E. Chavez

in jail and keep him in jail for the length of time — likely to run into months—it takes to bring one of his cases into court . . . and this absolutely regardless of whether he is guilty of either crime.

This power should not be given to the police. We all know of incidents wherein the police have displayed an amazing determination to "get someone," whether or not he is guilty of crime. They cannot be trusted with the power to jail someone by fiat.

Today, the Nixon administration has only tentatively considered pretrial jailing. The best way to keep it from becoming a dangerous reality is a quick and forceful reaction against the idea.

Please urge those you can reach to let Washington know they disapprove and disapprove strongly of the proposed "preventive detention" measures. Urge them to write the President, their senators and representatives, and their local newspapers to protest the idea that anyone should have the power to jail another person without full judicial safeguards.

Yours in liberty,

Simple Burial

Burnsville, North Carolina
28714

To the Editor:

It is ironical that the struggle to achieve dignity, simplicity and economy in funeral practices continues to gain ground among educated and prosperous people, but is lagging among the social groups who need it most. The fune al reform movement, organized in the Continental Association of Funeral and Memorial Societies (59 E. Van Buren Street, Chicago, Ill. 60605), is keenly aware of this limitation and is seeking to broaden its usefulness.

Central to this struggle is the booklet, A Manual of Simple Burial ($1 postpaid, Celo Press, Burnsville, N.C. 28714) which has just appeared in its fourth edition, extensively revised.

This comprehensive booklet discusses the social, emotional and financial problems of families at time of death, and how to meet these problems. It tells how to obtain dignity, simplicity and economy in funeral arrangements through pre-planning. It explains in detail about memorial societies, where they are and how to organize them; about eye-banks, bone banks and medical schools and how to cooperate with them.

It is the responsibility of every mature individual to inform himself on this important phase of life and to keep detailed information available.

Sincerely,
Ernest Morgan

Reassurance

One to go all alone
To an unknown place,
Meeting, face to face,
Maker of stone,

Maker of dust, hour,
And hourless, too,
Is harder to think than do,
But that I saw a flower

Once, so small,
Whiter than the snow
Of months ago,
And so saw all

The difference the same
As the flower a white
Smallness showing might
To the mind I claim.

Forbidden Fruit?

The Boycott on Grapes Is Ripe for Exposure

"POLITICS makes strange bedfellows, and bleeding hearts sometimes beat as one. In any event the cause recently embraced by Senator McCarthy has attracted nationwide financial and moral support, as well as the local application of a little extra-legal union muscle. In a fine display of righteous indignation, various church groups have passed the plate for the oppressed California farm workers and otherwise moved Heaven and earth to trample out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored. The Democratic mayor of Detroit, and his so-called Republican colleague in New York, have canceled municipal orders for California grapes and urged their fellow citizens to follow suit. Most harmful of all, various AFL-CIO unions one way or another have persuaded — 'coerced and restrained,' according to a complaint filed with the NLRB by one grower — Gotham's food chains not to stock the controversial produce."

The foregoing comments appeared in Barron's on August 5, 1968. Shortly afterward the labor organizations cited above, including locals of the Amalgamated Meatcutters and Butcher Workers, Retail, Wholesale and Chain Food Store Union and Seafarers International Union, while denying all charges, legally consented to go and sin no more. Otherwise little or nothing has changed. Left-wing magazines still pour out propaganda favoring "la causa," as it has come to be known. Wealthy socialites and politicians-on-the-make, who wouldn't dream of serving a California wine, have thrown parties and raised money for Cesar Chavez, head of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (AFL-CIO), and the downtrodden of the earth. UFWOC and its militant supporters, meanwhile, including a large contingent of hippies, yippies and hard-core SDS, are pressing their boycott against supermarkets and other retail outlets which persist in stocking and selling the forbidden fruit.

Harvest-time in the San Joaquin and Imperial Valleys, for the fifth year in a row, thus is yielding nationwide bitterness and strife. However, at long last it also holds the fertile promise of cutting off at the roots one of the most tenacious myths ever planted by the liberal establishment. On the strength of the available evidence, notably the relative economic well-being of supposedly oppressed California grape pickers, Barron's last August concluded that the Chavez crusade was a fraud. Since then other qualified observers—including a syndicated columnist, a lawmaker whose views tend to square with those of organized labor and a spokesman for Michigan housewives — have publicly agreed. Moreover, it has grown increasingly clear that while the charismatic Mr. Chavez commands eager devotion in pulpits and drawing-rooms, he counts for little in the vineyards, where the number of his dues-paying supporters increased by precisely 227 last year. Finally, by opposing various measures newly introduced in Congress to improve the bargaining position of farm workers, the head of UFWOC has shown up his cause for what it is: neither peace-loving nor compassionate, but a ruthless grab for power. Muckraking knows no season, but those who would expose it must pick their time and place. In grapes the time is ripe.

In some circles, to be sure, unpleasant truths simply aren't welcome. Thus, as we have pointed out before, Mr. Chavez has enjoyed widespread support among radical church groups and New Left militants, as well as such left-leaning politicians as Detroit's Mayor Cavanaugh and New York's Mayor Lindsay, both of whom last year banned California grapes from official tables. Until doughty growers named Giumarra, after filing a complaint with the National Labor Relations Board, won their consent decree, UFWOC also enjoyed the help of fellow unions, which sought to pressure food chains into refusing to buy or sell the fruit. Now other willing hands have taken up the task. Until enjoined by a U.S. District Court, a group called Jews for Urban Justice last winter picketed a number of Giant Food stores in Washington, D.C., as well as the home and synagogue of the company's president. According to Clarence G. Adamy, head of the National Association of Food Chains: "Store executives have been appealed to and threatened by members of Catholic and Protestant church groups . . . in some areas black militant groups have joined the efforts to remove California grapes with threats of personal violence." Last week Barron's, which rated no bid to the posh fund-raising affairs thrown by the George Plimptons and the Carter Burdens, was invited to join a "24-hour-a-day vigil" in front of the Grand Union store in Washington Square Village.

While throwing its weight around from coast-to-coast, UFWOC barely tips the scales in Kern and Fresno Counties. According to data filed with the U.S. Department of Labor, the organization in 1967 on average received $6,869 in dues payments per month. At $3.50 per head, which is union scale, the arithmetic indicates 1,963 dues-paying members. Comparable figures for 1968 disclose that average monthly dues payments rose to $7,663, suggesting a net gain in membership of 227. (Total receipts, by the way, came to $684,281—the propaganda campaign has paid off.) In sum, it is doubtful whether UFWOC today, after half a decade, represents as many as 3% of all grape pickers, or 1.5% of all farm workers, in the Golden State, unimpressive strength which those who oppose Mr. Chavez in the fields, a loosely knit group less than a year old known as Farm Workers for Freedom to Work, claim easily to match.

The remarkable lack of grass-roots support has been emphasized time and again, notably by columnist James J. Kilpatrick, who labeled the whole affair a hoax, and by Michigan State Senator Lorraine Beebe, who, after making a special fact-finding trip to the Coast, observed: "Despite their organizing efforts, UFWOC and its leader have little support among grape workers in the fields . . . Indeed, considering Mr. Reuther's commitment of his union's funds and other resources to this campaign, it might be said that headquarters for the grape boycott movement is as much Wayne County, Mich., as it is Fresno or Kern County, Calif." By his rule-or-ruin tactics, Mr. Chavez even has succeeded in arousing Rep. B. F. Sisk (D., Calif.) a lawmaker who usually sees eye-to-eye with the AFL-CIO. As Rep. Sisk points out, the boycott, while ostensibly aimed at corporate giants, actually hurts thousands of small growers who constitute the bulk of the trade. "..... In order to get jurisdiction over farm labor employed by 5% of the table grape growers . . . the farm union is willing to destroy the other 95% of the growers who raise 77% of the crop." He concludes scathingly: " 'Long live the cause,' is the battle cry . . . To which I would add, 'If the cause is just.' "

On this score, Cesar Chavez, after years of pious rhetoric, at last has been smoked out. What he is after, he has now made clear, is not collective bargaining but compulsory unionism. Specifically, during hearings in mid-April on a measure introduced by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D., N.J.) to extend the National Labor Relations Act to agricultural workers—a bill embraced by AFL-CIO President George Meany and presumably drafted with UFWOC approval—Mr. Chavez rejected his own handiwork. Farm unions, he cried, should be exempted from the Taft-Hartley ban on secondary boycotts. What's more, even in states with right-to-work laws, they should have authority to run hiring-halls and to enforce the closed shop. Extremist as they may seem, such proposals are just for openers. Here is Mr. Chavez on the longer haul: "While we do not belittle or underestimate our adver-aries," he recently wrote to one, "for they are the rich and the powerful and possess the land, we are not afraid or cringe from the confrontation. We welcome it! We have planned for it. We know that our cause is just, that history is a story of social revolution, and that the poor shall inherit the land."

Whether this Marxist parody of the Psalms will come to pass, no man can say. What is clear is that in the name of compassion, UFWOC is seeking limitless power over the nation's food supply. As State Senator Beebe has observed: "If the boycott movement is allowed to proceed unchecked, it is only a matter of time before supermarkets and grocery stores are faced with demands to remove any number of the thousands of items carried on grocery shelves: cherries from Michigan, oranges from Florida, dairy products from Wisconsin, and brand name products of all kinds." Freedom to buy and sell is perishable, too.

GRAPE STRIKERS MARCHING FROM DELANO TO SACRAMENTO

DAVID GAHR

PICKETS OUTSIDE MARKET IN BROOKLYN

THE LITTLE STRIKE THAT GREW TO LA CAUSA

ITEM: At a dinner party in New York's Westchester County, the dessert includes grapes. The hostess notices that her fellow suburbanites fall to with gusto; the guests from Manhattan unanimously abstain.

ITEM: At St. Paul's, a fashionable New Hampshire prep school, grapes are the only part of the meal invariably left untouched.

ITEM: In San Francisco, a Safeway official observes: "We have customers who come to the store for no other reason than to buy grapes. They'll load up their car with grapes and nothing else."

ITEM: In Oakland, a conscience-ridden housewife explains apologetically to her dinner companions: "I really wanted to have this dessert, and I just decided that one little bunch of grapes wouldn't make that much difference."

ITEM: In Honolulu, the Young Americans for Freedom organizes an "emergency grape lift" by jet from the mainland, inviting "all of those starved for the sight of a California grape to come to the airport."

WHY all the excitement about this smooth, sweet and innocent fruit? The answer is that the table grape, Vitis vinifera, has become the symbol of the four-year-old strike of California's predominantly Mexican-American farm workers. For more than a year now, table grapes have been the object of a national boycott that has won the sympathy and support of many Americans —and the ire of many others. The strike is widely known as la causa, which has come to represent not only a protest against working conditions among California grape pickers but the wider aspirations of the nation's Mexican-American minority as well. La causa's magnetic champion and the country's most prominent Mexican-American leader is Cesar Estrada Chavez, 42, a onetime grape picker who combines a mystical mien with peasant earthiness. La causa is Chavez's whole life; for it, he has impoverished himself and endangered his health by fasting. In soft, slow speech, he urges his people—nearly 5,000,000 of them in the U.S.—to rescue themselves from society's cellar. As he sees it, the first step is to win the battle of the grapes.

Magnified Movement

To enter the public consciousness, a labor conflict must ordinarily threaten the supply of essential goods and services, like steel or transportation. Politicians and the public take notice only when there is great impact on the economy, when spectacular bloodshed occurs or when well-recognized issues are at stake. The grape strike seems to meet none of these criteria. Americans could easily live without the table grape if they had to, and even that minor sacrifice has been unnecessary. The dispute has been relatively free of violence. Neither great numbers of men nor billions of dollars are involved. The welfare of agricultural workers has rarely captured U.S. attention in the past, but the grape strike—la huelga—and the boycott accompanying it have clearly engaged a large part of the nation.

The issue has divided husband and wife, inspired countless heated arguments at social occasions and engendered public controversy from coast to coast. As if on a holy crusade, the strikers stage marches that resemble religious pilgrimages, bearing aloft their own stylized black Aztec eagle on a red field along with images of the Virgin of Guadalupe, patroness of Mexicans and particularly of those who work the soil. As the workers and their sympathizers march, supermarket chains, middle-class consumers, and even the grape growers are choosing sides. Some supermarkets are leaving the choice to the shopper. Others sell only grapes imported from Africa or Israel, and make a point of advertising that they do not carry the California product. On Capitol Hill, diners in the House restaurants have not seen a grape for months, while the Senate refectory has been using 15 lbs. to 20 lbs. a week. When one California Congressman sent large bags of grapes to each of his colleagues, many of the recipients returned them. Within a few hours, the corridor outside the Congressman's office was asquish with trod-upon fruit.

Governor Ronald Reagan calls the strike and boycott "immoral" and "attempted blackmail." Senator George Murphy, like Reagan an old Hollywood union man-turned-conservative, terms the movement "dishonest." The Nixon Administration has seemed ambivalent, putting forward legislation that would ostensibly give farm workers organization rights but would also limit their use of strikes and boycotts. The Pentagon has substantially increased its grape orders for mess-hall tables, a move that Chavez and his followers countered last week by preparing a lawsuit to prevent such purchases on the ground that grapes are the subject of a labor dispute. Some auto-bumper stickers read: NIXON EATS GRAPES. The growers' answering slogan: EAT CALIFORNIA GRAPES, THE FORBIDDEN FRUIT.

Edward and Ethel Kennedy, following the late Robert Kennedy's example, have embraced Cesar Chavez as a brother. The so-called Beautiful People, from Peter, Paul and Mary to the Ford sisters, Anne Uzielli and Charlotte Ni-archos, are helping to raise funds for the strikers. That support is one of the few issues that find Chicago Mayor Richard Daley, iconoclastic Writer Gloria Steinem, and liberal Senators Jacob Javits and George McGovern in total agreement. Ralph Abernathy lends black help to what is becoming the Brown Power movement.

The fact that it is a movement has magnified la huelga far beyond its economic and geographic confines. At stake are not only the interests of 384,100 agricultural workers in California but potentially those of more than 4,000,000 in the U.S. Such workers have never won collective bargaining rights, partially because they have not been highly motivated to organize and partially because their often itinerant lives have made them difficult to weld into a group that would have the clout of an industrial union. By trying to organize the grape pickers, Chavez hopes to inspire militancy among all farm laborers. Because most of the grape pickers are Mexican Americans, he also believes that he is fighting a battle on behalf of the entire Mexican-American community, which as a group constitutes the nation's second biggest deprived minority.

Unlettered and Unshod

Like the blacks, Mexican Americans, who are known as Chicanos, are a varied and diverse people. Only recently have they emerged from a stereotype: the lazy, placid peasant lost in a centuries-long siesta under a sombrero. Unlike the blacks, who were brought to the U.S. involuntarily, the Chicanos have flocked to the U.S. over the past 30 years, legally and illegally, in an attempt to escape the poverty of their native Mexico and find a better life. Whatever their present condition may be, many obviously find it better than their former one, as evidenced by the fact that relatives have often followed families into the U.S. The Chicanos do not speak in one voice but many, follow no one leader or strategy. Their level of ambition and militance varies greatly from barrio to barrio between Texas and California.

No man, however, personifies the Chicanos' bleak past, restless present and possible future in quite the manner of Cesar Chavez. He was the unshod, unlettered child of migrant workers. He attended dozens of schools but never got to the eighth grade. He was a street-corner tough who now claims as his models Emiliano Zapata, Gandhi, Nehru and Martin Luther King. He tells his people: "We make a solemn promise: to enjoy our rightful part of the riches of this land, to throw off the yoke of being considered as agricultural implements or slaves. We are free men and we demand justice."

The dawning of Chavez's social awareness came in a seamy San Jose, Calif., barrio called Sal Si Puedes —"Get out if you can." Through Fred Ross, a tall, quiet organizer for Saul Alinsky's Community Service Organization, Cesar began to act on Alinsky's precept that concerted action is the only means through which the poor can gain political and economic power. Chavez, a Roman Catholic, has delved deeply into the papal social encyclicals, especially Rerum Novarum and Quadragesimo Anno.* "What Cesar wanted to reform was the way he was treated as a man," recalls his brother Richard. "We always talked about change, but how could we go about it?" Cesar Chavez went about it by working with the C.S.O. among Mexican Americans for ten years. Then, in 1962, he left to form a farm workers' union.

The conditions under which farm laborers toil have improved somewhat since the squalid Depression era so well evoked by John Steinbeck in The Grapes of Wrath and In Dubious Battle; yet field work remains one of the most unpleasant of human occupations. It demands long hours of back-breaking labor, often in choking dust amid insects and under a flaming sun. The harvest-time wage for grape pickers averages $1.65 an hour, plus a 25¢ bonus for each box picked, while the current federal minimum wage is $1.60.

Despite this, the seasonal and sporadic nature of the work keeps total income far below the poverty level. Average family income is less than $1,600 a year. There is no job security, and fringe benefits are few. If they are migrants, the workers must frequently live in fetid shacks without light or plumbing (though housing, bad as it is, is frequently free or very cheap.) As a result, many have moved to the cities, where even unskilled labor can find work at decent wages.

Chavez was not the first to try to organize farm workers. Ineffective efforts to found agricultural unions date back to the turn of the century. But only in Hawaii, where Harry Bridges' tough longshoremen's union used its muscle to win the first farm-labor contract for sugar-cane workers in 1945, did unionization take hold. Agriculture is outside the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, which has provided federal ground rules for industrial workers' unions since 1935; on a national level, there is no similar mechanism for farm workers. In May the Nixon Administration proposed an independent Farm Labor Relations Board, but chances for passage of such a law this year are small. Without NLRB protection, and with farm labor normally transient and seasonal, the difficulties of organizing are enormous.

Rose Grafts and Table Grapes

Undeterred by these obstacles, Chavez took his $1,200 in savings and started the National Farm Workers' Association seven years ago, setting up its headquarters in the San Joaquin Valley agricultural town of Delano. He clicked off 300,000 miles in a battered 1953 Mercury station wagon, crisscrossing the San Joaquin and talking to more than 50,000 workers in the first six months. His money was soon gone, but he found people who were willing to give him food. The N.F.W.A. had its first formal meeting in Fresno in September 1962; 287 people showed up. Chavez soon started a death-benefits plan for his members, a curious echo of the burial societies organized decades ago by Eastern European immigrants on their arrival in the U.S. He also set up a credit union with $35 in assets (it now has more than $50,000). By August 1964, he had 1,000 members, each paying $3.50 a month in dues—no small sum for a farm worker's family. Soon he began publishing a union newspaper called El Malcriado (The Misfit), whose circulation is 18,000.

At last the union felt strong enough to tackle the growers on a substantive issue. In 1964, the N.F.W.A. took one employer to court for paying less than the then minimum wage of $1.25 per hour, and after months of wrangling, won the case. The amounts of money gained were small but the point was made: a boss could be beaten. Then the association sued the Tulare County housing authority over the rents and conditions at two labor camps, built in the late 1930s and intended to be used for only a few years. The camps were a hideous collection of 9-ft. by 11-ft. tin shacks, boiling in the summer sun and lacking both indoor plumbing and heat for the chill nights. Tulare officials subsequently built modern accommodations.

* Rerum Novarum, published by Leo XIII in 1891, contended that the rich had in effect enslaved the poor, and that every man has a right to a decent wage and reasonable comfort. Pius XI, in Quadragesimo Anno (1931), criticized the economic despotism that results from "limitless free competition" and reiterated the principle of a just wage.

In May 1965, Chavez signed up a group of rose grafters and won a strike vote for higher wages. Everyone pledged not to go to work, but just to make sure that no one did, Chavez and Dolores Huerta, his tiny, tough assistant, made the rounds early on the strike's first morning. Mrs. Huerta saw a light in one house where four of the workers lived. She reminded them of their pledge, but they had changed their minds. Mrs. Huerta moved her truck so that it blocked their driveway and put the key in her purse. The incident illustrated the charge that Chavez and his aides sometimes coerce those who would rather work than strike. After only four days of the strike, the grower agreed to give the workers a 120% wage increase.

That same spring, in the Coachella Valley east of Los Angeles, the largely Filipino grape pickers of the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s fledgling Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee won a brief strike for pay equal to that given field hands imported from Mexico. When the workers moved north to Delano at the end of the summer, grape growers there refused to make a similar agreement, and A.W.O.C. once more went on strike. On Sept. 16, which just happened to be Mexican Independence Day, Chavez's group held a tumultuous meeting and voted unanimously to join the walkout. The hall of the Roman Catholic church on Delano's west side resounded with cries of "Viva la huelga!" "Viva la causa! Viva la unión!" The N.F.W.A. and the A.W.O.C. merged two years later to form the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, headed by Chavez.

Table-grape growers are particularly vulnerable to strikes because their product requires continual attention through much of the year. Since the appearance of the fruit affects its value—unlike the case of wine grapes—the bunches must be carefully picked by hand. Because of their vulnerability, Chavez picked the table-grape growers as his first target. In 1966, after a strike, he got his first contract when Schenley Industries capitulated because it had a nationally known name at stake. Later that year he won the right to represent workers at the mammoth Di Giorgio ranch in an election monitored by the American Arbitration Association. Both Di Giorgio and Schenley have since sold their table-grape holdings, however, and Chavez's only contracts now are with wine producers: Gallo, Christian Brothers, Masson, Almadén, Franzia Brothers and Novitiate.

Boycott and Breakthrough

Chavez has never been able to get large numbers of laborers to join the strike. Many of those who do follow him are fanatic in their loyalty, but a large segment of the shifting, transient work force continues to be indifferent to unionism. Wages have been rising even in the absence of contracts, and few farm workers can afford to go unpaid for long. Although federal regulations theoretically prohibit the hiring of aliens, or "green-carders," as strike breakers, the owners have nevertheless continued to use imported workers of Mexican citizenship.

Chavez decided to resort to the boycott to keep pressure on the table-grape growers. He applied it first in 1967 to the Giumarra Vineyards Corp., the largest U.S. table-grape producer. Giumarra started using the labels of other growers—in violation of Food and Drug Administration rules—to circumvent the boycott. In retaliation, the Chavez people began to appeal to stores and consumers not to buy any California table grapes at all. The boycott has been extended overseas to Britain and Scandinavia.

Chavez has now finally achieved a breakthrough: nationwide grape sales were off 12% in 1968, and prices for this year's first California grapes are down as much as 15%. Last month ten growers representing about 12% of the state's table-grape production announced that they would sit down with Chavez to write a contract. If negotiations with Chavez succeed, some other vineyards may also sign contracts, but a determined majority still barely acknowledge his existence and remain adamantly opposed to union recognition.

If the union does begin to win contracts with an increasing number of growers, a new difficulty could arise: How is the consumer to tell the difference between union and nonunion grapes? Boxes can be labeled easily, but not loose bunches of grapes in a market. The union claims that existing boycott machinery can be turned around to promote the produce of those who

An Anglo-Chicano Lexicon

As with other minority groups, there is a special vocabulary used by and about Mexican Americans. The words, naturally, are mainly Spanish. Among them:

Anglo: white, non-Mexican American. Though normally used simply in a neutral, descriptive manner, the term sometimes has pejorative overtones. It has to some extent replaced gringo. Agringada describes a Mexican American who has gone completely Anglo in his way of life.

Barrio: literally "district," the Spanish-speaking quarter of a U.S. city; also, colonia.

Bracero: Mexican citizen brought into the U.S. temporarily and usually in groups to add to the existing labor force at times of peak activity. The program, begun during World War II to relieve manpower shortages, was ended—over farmers' protests—in 1964. However, individuals known as "green-carders" (for the permits they hold) can work as aliens.

La Causa: literally, "the cause." Cesar Chavez's farm-labor movement; also, more broadly, the advancement of Mexican Americans.

Chicano: Mexican American. A shortened, corrupted form of Mexicano, with the first syllable dropped and the "x" pronounced like ch in cheese, in the fashion of Mexico's Chihuahua Indians.

Hispano: descendant of the original Spanish settlers of areas now part of the U.S. Used chiefly in New Mexico and Colorado to distinguish such Spanish-speaking Americans from later immigrants of Indian descent.

La Huelga: the strike.

Malinchista: traitor to the Mexican-American cause. From Malinche, the daughter of a Mexican nobleman, who became Cortés' mistress and aided the Spanish in their conquest of Mexico.

Mestizo: person of mixed Spanish and Indian blood, as are most Mexican Americans. Gueros have relatively light skins; trigueños are somewhat darker.

Pachuco: tough guy. Used of teenage Mexican-American boys in gangs. During World War II, dressed in gaudy zoot suits, they were the target of racial violence in Los Angeles and elsewhere.

La Raza: the race, meaning all Mexicans and Mexican Americans, and derived from the mystical theory of the 19th century philosopher, José Vasconcelos, that people of mixed race will inherit the earth. At best, it is a rallying cry betokening a mild form of cultural nationalism; at worst, it connotes outright racism.

Tio Taco: literally "Uncle Taco," the Mexican-American equivalent of an Uncle Tom. An equally contemptuous synonym is vendido, sellout.

Wetback: illegal immigrant from Mexico, so called because a common means of entry was to swim the Rio Grande.

have signed; they could be marketed through the chain stores that have refused to handle the produce of struck growers. However, any such confusing procedure is bound to dilute the boycott's effectiveness.

Most of the growers bitterly dispute Chavez's contentions. His claim to represent the workers is false, they say; only 3% of California's grape pickers have joined his union. Chavez has not been able to strip the fields of workers and, they argue, even if he personally preaches nonviolence, his followers do not practice it. Packing sheds have been set afire, foremen threatened, tires slashed. Chavez also has outside help. Long-haired pickets came down from Berkeley in the early days of la huelga, and the union gets $14,500 a month in grants from the A.F.L.-C.I.O. and Walter Reuther's United Automobile Workers. By insisting that all workers join his union, moreover, Chavez wants what amounts to a closed shop (which is illegal under the Taft-Hartley Act, but the act does not apply to agricultural workers). This means that, for now at least, Chavez's goal, however unpalatable, is a legal one. Chavez opposes placing farm workers under the National Labor Relations Board precisely because that would make the closed shop he seeks unlawful.

The growers of Delano are difficult to cast as villains. Many are self-made men, Yugoslavs and Italians who came to the valley between 1900 and 1940 with nothing and worked hard to amass enough capital to practice the grape-growing arts they learned in Europe. Most of the Delano spreads are family enterprises, and many of them have had rough going. Costs have risen sharply over the past decade, and grape prices have now begun to decline.

The California growers also pay the second highest agricultural wages in the U.S. (after Hawaii, where unionized workers average $3 an hour).

While they generally belittle the extent of his support, however, the growers have gone to some lengths to counter Chavez's moves. The anti-U.F.W.O.C. campaign even included for a time a group called Mothers Against Chavez. The growers are using the J. Walter Thompson agency to place $400,000 worth of ads extolling the benefits of table grapes. The California public relations firm of Whitaker & Baxter has been retained to advise the growers about how to counter the boycott. Whitaker & Baxter helped to manage Richard Nixon's unsuccessful campaign for governor of California in 1962, and masterminded the American Medical Association's attempt to defeat Medicare.

On $10 a Week

One reason for the lack of comprehension between Chavez and the growers is that each has different concepts of the fundamental issue. The growers see themselves as management in a classic labor dispute, while Chavez and his followers believe that the cause of all Mexican Americans is at stake.

That is what inspires Chavez's devotion to la causa. For years he and his wife and eight children have lived jammed into a tiny two-bedroom house in Delano, subsisting on $10 a week from the union and on food from the communal kitchen in nearby union headquarters. Chavez has grown increasingly ascetic. He has given up casual socializing as well as liquor and cigarettes: his idea of a real treat is an eclectic meal of Chinese food, matzohs and diet soda. The fight has become his life. "The days and weeks and months run together," he told TIME Correspondent Robert Anson. "I can't think back to a time when we were not on strike." Nor does he contemplate surrender to the growers. "Either the union will be destroyed," he says, "or they will sign a contract. There's no other alternative."

The use of only peaceful means has been central to his thinking since a 1953 showdown in the San Joaquin Valley between his Mexican-American C.S.O. pickets and a public official. Suddenly, he realized that if there were any violence or serious disorder it would be his responsibility. He began reading Gandhi, and he says now: "If the strike means the blood of one grower or one grower's son, or one worker or one worker's son, then it isn't worth it."

In February 1968, Chavez began a 25-day fast "as an act of penance, recalling workers to the nonviolent roots of their movement." Although he insisted that his decision was essentially a private one, the fast took on a certain circus aura and raised suspicions that its motivation was more theatrical than theological. During the fast, Chavez had to make a court appearance in Bakersfield, on charges of improper picketing, in a case that has yet to come to trial. As he did so, 2,000 farm workers knelt outside in prayer. One woman solemnly asked him if he were indeed a saint. When the fast ended, Senator Robert Kennedy knelt next to him to receive Communion. Some 8,000 others joined them in Delano's Memorial Park for a bread-breaking ceremony.

The fast, and Chavez's years of 12- to 16-hour days, took their toll. Last September he suffered a muscular breakdown in his back—he had been in pain for years before that—and found his legs nearly paralyzed. After spending more than two months in traction, he has now substantially recovered, but is still bedridden much of the time. Instead of spending long hours driving around the state, he receives a constant stream of subordinates at his bedside.

Chavez's religious conviction mingles with the exigencies of the movement. He opposes birth control for his people, but only partly out of conventional Catholicism; he argues that smaller families would diminish the numerical power of the poor. A priest brings him Communion daily. To Correspondent Anson he explained: "God prepares those who have to suffer and take punishment. Otherwise, how could we exist? How could the black man exist? There must be something special. I really think that He looks after us."

Cesar Chavez came to his mission from a background of poverty and prejudice that is a paradigm of that of many Chicanos. Like most Mexican

GRAPE WORKERS NEAR DELANO

Among the most unpleasant of human occupations.

Americans, he is of mixed Spanish and Indian blood, with liquid brown eyes, deeply bronze skin and thick, jet-black hair. He was born on an 80-acre farm in Arizona's Gila Valley near Yuma, where his parents tried to scratch a living from the arid desert earth. Chavez met racial hostility early in daily rock fights between Anglo and Chicano kids at the village school.

The farm failed in the Depression, and when Chavez was ten, the family packed everything it owned into a decrepit automobile and headed across the Colorado River into California. In Oxnard, Chavez's father found work threshing lima beans; when all the beans were harvested, the family took off, looking for other jobs and often turning up just a few days after a crop was in.

That first winter back in Oxnard, with the little money earned in the fields already gone, was the family's worst time. Cesar's brother Richard remembers: "There was this nice lady there, and she had a vacant lot that she let us use. So we put up a tent. It was a very small tent—I guess about 8 by 10. That's all we had. All the family stayed there. And it rained that winter. Oh, it rained. Rain, rain, rain. We had to go to school barefoot. We had no shoes. I can't forget it."

The family lived that winter on beans, tortillas and an occasional potato. Chavez's father sometimes picked peas for 50¢ a day, half of which went to the contractor who drove the workers to the fields in the back of a flatbed truck. There was nothing else to do. By the next spring, the family had learned more of the harvest schedule, and it set off for the first of many years on the circuit familiar to every migrant worker in California. Starting in the Imperial and Coachella valleys of the south, through the state's bulging middle, the San Joaquin Valley, on up north of San Francisco and into the Napa Valley, they worked each crop in its turn: asparagus, grapes, beets, potatoes, beans, plums, apricots—anything that needed picking, hoeing, thinning, leafing, tipping, girdling, digging or pruning.

In 1941, the family moved to Delano, where Chavez met his future wife, Helen Fabela. At the movies with her one night, he had a jarring brush with discrimination. He refused to stay on the right side of the theater, which was reserved for Mexicans, and sat instead with the Anglos on the left. "The assistant manager came," Chavez recalls. "The girl who sold the popcorn came. And the girl with the tickets came. Then the manager came. They tried to pull me up, and I said, 'No, you have to break my arms before I get up.' " Chavez, then 16, was hustled off to the station house for a lecture from the chief of police, but he would not promise not to do the same thing again.

Like many other teen-age Mexican Americans, Chavez became a pachuco, affecting a zoot suit with pegged pants, a broad flat hat and a ducktail haircut. Some sociologists now see the pachuco movement as the first example of militant separatism among Chicanos, an assertion of a distinct identity hostile to Anglo culture. The Anglos took it that way, in any case, and reacted violently: during a series of riots in the Southwest during the summer of 1943, several thousand soldiers, sailors and Marines beat up hundreds of Chicano youths. Police promptly arrested some of the victims.

Because of his own experience of poverty and acquaintance with prejudice, Cesar Chavez has made la causa more than a labor movement. He is determined to better the lot of all Mexican Americans. There is much room for improvement. There have never been Jim Crow laws against them, like those against blacks, but overt discrimination undeniably exists. Chicanos still find it hard to get into the barbershops and public swimming pools of south Texas. Still, though the Chicano is set apart by language, assimilation is often easier for him than for the Negro. For this reason, and because most of the Chicano population lives in relative obscurity in the barrios or rural areas, the Mexican-American community has been slow to develop aggressive leadership.

Now, because they have seen that organized black action gets results, the Chicanos have begun to stir with a new militancy. They have formed the Brown Berets, modeled on the Black Panthers, and set up a $2,200,000 Mexican-American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, financed by the Ford Foundation. "We are about ten years behind the Negroes, and we must catch up," says Dr. Daniel Valdes, a Denver behavioral scientist. "But I think we will do it without extreme violence." Lawyer Donald Pacheco puts the plight of the Mexican American more bluntly: "We're the 'nigger' of ten years ago."

If he is a migrant farm worker, the Mexican American has a life expectancy of about 48 years v. 70 for the average U.S. resident. The Chicano birth rate is double the U.S. average—but so is the rate of infant mortality. More than one-third live below the $3,000-a-year level of family income that federal statisticians define as poverty. Eighty percent of the Mexican-American population is now urban, and most live in the barrio.

Forbidden Language

The overwhelming majority work as unskilled or semiskilled labor in factories and packing plants, or in service jobs as maids, waitresses, yard boys and deliverymen. Particularly in Texas, Mexican Americans sometimes get less pay than others for the same work. Even the few who have some education do not escape discrimination. Chicano women find that jobs as public contacts at airline ticket counters are rarely open; they are welcome as switchboard operators out of the public eye. Mexican-American men who work in banks are assigned to the less fashionable branches. Promotions come slowly, responsibility hardly ever.

One major impediment to the Mexican American is his Spanish language, because it holds him back in U.S. schools. Mexican Americans average eight years of schooling, two years less than Negroes and a full four years less than whites. Often they are forced to learn English from scratch in the first grade, and the frequent result is that they become not bilingual but nearly nonlingual. In Texas, 40% of Chicanos are considered functionally illiterate. In Los Angeles, only an estimated 25% can speak English fluently. Chicano children in some rural areas are still punished for speaking Spanish in school. Only this year, Chicano students at Bowie High School in El Paso—in a predominantly Mexican-American section—managed to get a rule abolished that forbade the speaking of Spanish on the school grounds.

The Chicano is as vulnerable to mistreatment at the hands of the law as the black. Seven Mexicans were beaten by drunken policemen at a Los Angeles police station on Christmas Eve, 1952; six of the officers were eventually given jail terms. During an 18-month period ending last April, the American Civil Liberties Union received 174 complaints of police abuses from Los Angeles Mexican Americans. Two of the recent landmark Supreme Court decisions limiting police questioning of suspects involved Mexican Americans—Escobedo v. Illinois and Miranda v. Arizona. Many Mexicans still look on the Texas Rangers and U.S. border patrols with terror.

Pluralism v. the Melting Pot

That Chavez has dramatized the problems of Mexican Americans in the city as well as on the farm seems beyond dispute. Father Bernardo Kenny, a Sacramento priest with a sizable Mexican-American congregation, believes that even if Chavez never wins his strike he will have made a "tremendous contribution." Says Kenny: "He focused attention on the problem of the farm workers, and he made the Mexican Americans proud to be Mexican Americans. Chavez must be given credit, I think, for really starting the Mexican-American civil rights movement." Ironically, mechanization hastened by unionization may eventually diminish Chavez's farm-labor base—but it will not slow the momentum of la causa.

The new Mexican-American militancy has turned up a mixed piñata of leaders, some of them significantly more strident than Chavez. In Los Angeles, 20-year-old David Sanchez is "prime minister" of the well-disciplined Brown Berets, who help keep intramural peace in the barrio and are setting up a free medical clinic. Some of them also carry machetes and talk tough about the Anglo. Reies Lopez Tijerina, 45, is trying to establish a "Free City State of San Joaquin" for Chicanos on historic Spanish land grants in New Mexico; at the moment, while his appeal on an assault conviction is being adjudicated, he is in jail for burning a sign in the Carson National Forest. Denver's Rudolfo ("Corky") Gonzales, 40, an ex-prizefighter, has started a "Crusade for Justice" to make the city's 85,000 Mexican Americans la causa-conscious.

As with the blacks, the question for those who lead the Chicanos is whether progress means separatism or assimilation. Cal State Professor Rafael Guzman, who helped carry out a four-year Ford Foundation study of Mexican Americans, warns that the barrio is potentially as explosive as the black ghetto. He argues for a new pluralism in the U.S. that means something other than forcing minorities into the established Anglo-Saxon mold; each group should be free to develop its own culture while contributing to the whole.

Yet there is no real consensus in the barrio. The forces for assimilation are powerful. A young Tucson militant, Salomon Baldenegro, contends: "Our values are just like any Manhattan executive's, but we have a ceiling on our social mobility." While federal programs for bilingual instruction in Mexican-American areas are still inadequate, that kind of approach—if made readily available to all who want it—leaves the choice between separatism and assimilation ultimately to the individual Chicano himself. He learns in his father's tongue, but he also learns in English well enough so that language is no longer a barrier; he retains his own culture, but he also knows enough of the majority's rules and ways to compete successfully if he chooses to.

Cesar Chavez has made the Chicano's cause well enough known to make that goal possible. While la huelga is in some respects a limited battle, it is also symbolic of the Mexican-American's quest for a full role in U.S. society. What happens to Chavez's farm workers will be an omen, for good or ill, of the Mexican-American's future. For the short term, Chavez's most tangible aspiration is to win the fight with the grape growers. If he can succeed in that difficult and uncertain battle, he will doubtless try to expand the movement beyond the vineyards into the entire Mexican-American community.

THE PRESIDENCY

Sporting Life

Americans are one of the world's most sports-conscious people, yet for years they have not had a President who shared that enthusiasm. President Eisenhower's interest was largely confined to golf and John Kennedy's to swimming and sailing. In the Johnson years, the principal sport was hunting ranch deer from a Lincoln Continental. Richard Nixon, by contrast, is an all-round sports enthusiast who not only follows the sports pages with the attention of a Monday morning quarterback, but has learned to relax by attending sports events and by participating in sports as well.

Nixon has already watched the Washington Senators lose three times this year, which sets some kind of attendance record for modern Presidents. He enjoys chatting with the players, which has led a few wags to the conclusion that the White House has better relations with Senators on the field than with Senators on the Hill. Bob Short, owner of the Senators, marvels that Nixon "knows more about baseball than I do. I was amazed to hear him say he'd been following the Senators on his trip to Midway." Nixon and David Eisenhower attend games together and frequently talk baseball. One recent evening, the duo sped out to the stadium, Nixon rushing away from a press conference, David forsaking his bride. The Senators lost, but Nixon was still optimistic about their future.

No Dumb Questions. As Vice President, Nixon once said: "Baseball is a diversion that both stimulates and clears the mind." Yet his interest in the arena does not fade when the World Series ends. He likes hockey, and is the kind of fan who practically joins in from his seat. "When he watches a hockey game, he participates as an extrovert would," says Irving Felt, chairman of Madison Square Garden. "Some of the wildest reactions come from people who are not outgoing by nature. Nixon is spontaneous."

Football is another favorite. At a stadium or in front of a television set, the President follows gridiron action closely, often memorizing key plays. Says White House Aide Bud Wilkinson, former University of Oklahoma football coach: "He can recall what happened in the third quarter of a game he saw twelve years ago—and even remember the name of the guy who made the play." When the Redskins kick off in the fall, Nixon is sure to be at Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Stadium rooting them on from the owners' box.

As in baseball, Nixon likes to mingle with the players. Frank Gifford, the sports broadcaster who once played halfback for the Giants, recalls Nixon's days as a New York lawyer: "He is a football nut. He used to come to the dressing room and ask everybody probing questions about the game. When I lived near Yankee Stadium, I used to have people over after the game, maybe a dozen players, and Nixon would come. He didn't ask dumb questions." Sports stars are frequent guests at the White House; Arnold Palmer, Bart Starr and Billy Casper dropped by recently.

In the Blood. Nixon's playing field performance has never quite matched his gusto as a spectator. In college he was a plucky but splinterful tackle. He later proved to be an indifferent golfer. In the '50s he began to do some fishing, and on his first cruise fell overboard twice in a single day. Now Nixon has become an enthusiastic bowler. He bowls frequently while at Camp David, and has blisters to prove it. Recently he rolled a highly respectable line of 204 (his usual score of 150 is not bad for an amateur, either), and he has been bragging about his new high: "That was really great for me. I had five strikes and two spares." He is planning to install a new bowling lane in the White House. The President also swims in the White House pool (unlike L.B.J. and Kennedy, he does not skinny dip) but he prefers the ocean.

In contrast to L.B.J., who preferred speedboating around Lake Lyndon B. Johnson, Nixon cruises aboard the Julie practically every day that he is at Key Biscayne. Two weeks ago he brought the second presidential yacht, the Tricia, out of dry dock to augment the Navy yacht Sequoia on the Potomac. Despite Nixon's love of salt water, he vowed that he would "never ride that" when his daughters gave him a surfboard for Father's Day. But when sport is in a man's blood, who knows? Some day, when the tide is up at San Clemente and the perfect waves start rolling in . . .

DEFENSE LEAGUE AD
Threat breeds counterthreat.

THE CITY

Jewish Vigilantes

They wear blue berets and brandish baseball bats. They profess fear of genocide and want to train their youth for combat. Some have been involved in campus brawls and dustups at political rallies. Last week they ran a $2,790 newspaper ad in New York showing six young men standing before a building with clubs in hand. In an age of Black Panthers, white vigilantes, and apparently millions of armed and angry individuals, there would already seem to be a surfeit of quasi-military partisans. Threat, however, tends to breed counterthreat. Out of the people traditionally identified with the word ghetto has come an unusual group called the Jewish Defense League—whose members posed before a synagogue for last week's ad and called themselves "nice Jewish boys."

The league was started last year by Orthodox Rabbi Meir Kahane, 36, a former lawyer who helps edit an emotional weekly devoted to Jewish affairs and who ministers to the congregation of the Rochdale Village Traditional Synagogue in the New York City borough of Queens. "We see here the beginnings of the 1920s in prewar Germany," warns Kahane. "This is a question of Jewish survival—nothing else." The newspaper ad, which Kahane wrote, declares: "Maybe some people and organizations are too nice. Maybe—just maybe—nice people build their own road to Auschwitz."

What has agitated Kahane and his followers is the rash of anti-Jewish statements made by some extremists, both black and white, during the past year. New York has been particularly tense since the fight over neighborhood control of schools pitted Negro leaders, as well as city hall, against the heavily Jewish teachers' union (TIME cover, Jan. 31). For years, of course, neo-Nazi groups have also been taunting—and provoking—Jews.

Unwanted Protection. The Defense League's response so far has been to picket public meetings, bait Mayor John Lindsay, provide armed escorts for Jewish teachers in slum neighborhoods, and scuffle with Nazi Party members. J.D.L. also sued to reopen the City College of New York this spring after a student demonstration temporarily closed the campus.

In May, 30 members arrived at New York's Temple Emanu-El on Fifth Avenue with clubs and chains in anticipation of a disruptive visit by Black Militant James Forman, who had been demanding "reparations" from white churches. The league intended to bar Forman from entering—despite the temple officials' stated willingness to hear him speak and to listen to his arguments. A showdown was avoided when the black leader failed to appear on schedule. Now the league is planning a nine-week camp program near Woodbourne, N.Y., to train members in such things as the use of karate, the handling of firearms, and the arts and techniques of street-corner debating.

Established Jewish organizations adamantly oppose the league and its adherents.* Says Samuel Dalsimer, national chairman of B'nai B'rith's Anti-Defamation League: "We find the group's paramilitary operations and sensationalist appeals an embarrassment and a potential danger." Rabbi Maurice N. Eisendrath, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, calls the would-be defenders "batmen" and "hoodlums." The league's obvious potential for increasing racial animosity and group hatred and tension is particularly alarming. "We are entering a period when everyone who is for or against something feels he must take the law into his own hands," Eisendrath observes. "For Jews to follow this is to belie our history. A minority such as ours cannot be productive unless it exists in a live-and-let-live condition." Rabbi Kahane replies that his "happiest day" will be the one on which the league can go out of business for want of a mission. Meanwhile, he appears completely serious about going ahead.

* Kahane counts 5,700 followers in 17 cities. A check by TIME correspondents revealed no visible organization except in New York and San Francisco. Estimates by other Jewish organizations suggest that the league has perhaps a thousand members; considerably fewer are available for ultramilitant activities.

ANY issue that arouses as much passion as the California grape strike, the subject of TIME's cover story this week, inevitably poses a doubly difficult task for journalists. The simplest facts become fogged by rhetoric; rumor and innuendo abound and every source, it seems, has chosen sides. To meet this challenge, TIME's Los Angeles bureau deployed nine correspondents and stringers across the Southwest. For several weeks, they toured the towns and vineyards, traveling thousands of miles and talking to hundreds of people for their report to Writer Keith Johnson and Editor Laurence Barrett.

Los Angeles Bureau Chief Marshall Berges took on the job of providing an overview from the state government and community leaders. Martin Sullivan, recently arrived from Montreal, went into the East Los Angeles barrios to distill the Mexican-American way of life—and found the Chicanos strikingly similar in mood and plaint to their French-Canadian cousins in Quebec. Sandra Burton observed the importation of "green-card" nonunion workers from Mexico and covered the climax of a 100-mile march between El Centro and Calexico, in which, she reports, the heat hit 120° and blisters "were like merit badges." At the end, when Union Leader Cesar Chavez began to speak, she thought that she had obtained a perfect worm's-eye view amid the swarming crowd by squirming under the flatbed truck that served as a podium—until Texas Senator Ralph Yarborough, standing barefoot a few yards away, started scratching and announced that the grass was infested with chiggers.

In the Coachella Valley and the Delano market center, Susan J. Diamond set out to get the growers' side of the dispute. Most of the time, she could only interview the growers at night, after their 15- or 16-hour day, and she went away suspecting that tempers were short largely because the owners worked such killing hours. Curiously, no one ever offered her a grape.

The assignment of interviewing Chavez himself fell to Robert Anson. Almost immediately, the workers' mistrust of the Anglos was sharply brought home to him. He had arrived in jacket and tie, and an organizer quickly informed him that it would be better to leave the jacket and tie home. "You have to realize," said the man, "that a lot of these people have been exploited by men wearing jackets and ties." "From then on, I wore Levi's," says Anson.

ROBERT ANSON IN VINEYARD

The talks with Chavez were held in the back room of a small house near union headquarters in Delano. All interviews were strictly limited to 45 minutes (Chavez spends the rest of every hour exercising his disabled back), and the union leader insisted on talking only about la causa, never about himself. Those around Chavez were equally reluctant to discuss him as a man. Says Anson: "For most of them, Chavez is a symbol rather than a person."

Grape Boycott

STRUGGLE IN THE VINEYARDS

by Richard A. Fineberg

Delano, California

THE MILK dispenser at the Filipino Union Hall, the center of the California table grape workers' strike, bears this notice: PLEASE—EACH FAMILY ONE QUART PER DAY. The new limit is taped over instructions which had requested families of strikers drawing milk from the union's central supply to restrict their usage to one-half gallon daily. While belts are being tightened in Delano as the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (UFWOC) girds itself to continue the strike, union officials tally the effects of their table grape boycott with growing optimism.

Hard times are nothing new to farm workers, nor to those who seek to establish a farm workers' union in central California. From its inception, when Cesar Chavez left Saul Alinsky's Community Service Organization in 1962 to devote his energies to a movement which would express the needs of farm laborers, UFWOC has had to fight hard for everything it has gained. UFWOC has forged nine contracts with wineries and now serves as collective bargaining agent for about 3,000 wine grape pickers. In 1967, UFWOC turned from the vintner to face the toughest challenge it has encountered—California's table grape growers.

The agricultural complex which has rallied around the grape growers to stand off UFWOC constitutes a powerful antagonist. Agribusiness—the name is used by growers and union alike—is California's largest industry. The state markets more than $4 billion worth of produce annually, accounting for some forty per cent of the nation's fruits and vegetables. During peak months nearly 400,000 field laborers harvest the crops grown in California's fertile valleys.

Both innovation and intransigence confront the striking farm workers. Within the next five years the introduction of a machine which promises to harvest wine grapes now picked by hand may obviate the need for labor in the vineyards where the union has

RICHARD A. FINEBERG, a doctoral candidate in government at the Claremont Graduate School, recently studied farm labor problems in the San Joaquin Valley on a grant from the Council for Christian Social Action. During the course of that project he and his research team interviewed more than 400 field workers and conferred with union representatives, growers, and state and Federal officials at various levels.

Melon Growers Next Target In 'La Causa's' Crusade To Unionize Farm Hands

The Bell That Doesn't Toll

By HENRY ELLIOT WEINSTEIN
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

DELANO, Calif. – Cesar Chavez is a 43-year-old Mexican-American who works for $5 a week plus room and board, less than he earned as a youth toiling in the grape and cotton fields of the Southwest. For that scant pay, he has been called everything from "saint" to "Communist" and has had to give up most of his family life with his wife and eight children, a plight he recognizes with much regret.

But his job has carried Cesar Chavez from a Don Quixote-like figure tilting at windmills to a labor hero on the verge of accomplishing the impossible in the annals of U.S. unionism: Organizing the nation's army of farm workers.

For nearly five years, his campaign has raised the wrath of table grape growers, his initial target, and rallied a coalition of Mexican-Americans, Filipinos, housewives, students and clergymen into a social action program that transcended the traditional union drive. Grape growers found themselves not only picketed in the fields but denounced from pulpits, and their products were boycotted throughout the nation. "Chavez is trying to destroy the grape industry and that means destroying the people he's trying to organize," claims John Giumarra, treasurer of the largest grape concern in California, the state that produces 90% of the U.S. crop. "Ultimately he wants to become czar of agriculture in the U.S."

However, on Wednesday Mr. Giumarra signed a contract with Mr. Chavez's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee (UFWOC). His capitulation signified that the five-year-old grape strike and boycott is about to end in a victory for the farm workers union.

A victory hardly seemed possible when Mr. Chavez took over a sputtering strike in late 1965 in the vineyards around this arid town of 15,000, center of a $100 million-a-year grape industry. Until this spring, the UFWOC strike and subsequent boycott appeared headed to the scrap heap along with other agricultural union failures over the past decades. This spring, however, the boycott began to hit growers where it hurt them most, in the pocketbook.

The result: About 75% of the grape growers have signed contracts with UFWOC. The remaining 25% are expected to follow shortly. "It's dawned on everyone in agriculture that unionism has finally come to this industry and there's no sense pretending it will go away. The thing to do is come to the best possible terms," says John Giumarra, Jr., counsel for

The thing to do is come to the best possible terms," says John Giumarra Jr., counsel for Giumarra Vineyards Co. and son of the company treasurer.

UFWOC's recent success "is a historical development," remarks Don Vial, chairman of the Center for Research at the University of California's Institute of Industrial Relations in Berkeley. "We haven't seen anything the likes of this in agricultural collective bargaining."

Fight With Teamsters

One reason for unions' past problems is that farm labor bargaining has been governed largely by the "law of the jungle," according to Mr. Chavez. When the Wagner Act in 1935 granted labor unions a "bill of rights" and formalized collective bargaining procedures for industry, agricultural workers were specifically excluded. So they have had to establish the right to bargain on their own without benefit of the orderly procedures provided for other industries under the law.

The success of UFWOC in the vineyards appears to have convinced some producers of other farm products that unionization of their workers is inevitable. On Tuesday, the Teamsters union announced it had signed contracts with growers in the Salinas area covering production of most of the nation's lettuce, about half of its celery, carrots and strawberries, and a sizable portion of dozens of other fruit and vegetable crops, including broccoli, cauliflower and potatoes.

Ironically, however, the Teamster announcement caused no joy among UFWOC leaders. UFWOC and the Teamsters have been battling furiously over the right to represent field hands in the Salinas Valley, known as the nation's "salad bowl."

Sen. Murphy's Bill

Some observers have speculated that the signings really were an attempt to head off the growth of UFWOC in the wake of the grape victory. Mr. Chavez referred to the Teamster agreements as "sweet-heart contracts."

The battle with the Teamsters may spur Congress to enact labor legislation for farmworkers. However, the only bill currently pending in Congress is given little chance of passage. Introduced by California Sen. George Murphy, a vociferous opponent of the grape boycott, the "Consumer Agricultural Food Protection Act of 1969" does provide for collective bargaining machinery. But the bill also would outlaw strikes at harvest time (the only effective time to strike, say farm workers) and product boycotts.

Buoyed by the victory in the grape struggle, Mr. Chavez appears calm about the battles that lie ahead. Petting "Boycott," the German shepherd that is his constant companion, Mr. Chavez says there is a simple reason for recent UFWOC successes: Hard work.

"Most of us in the movement get turned off by rhetoric. We're an action movement. We keep moving night and day," says Mr. Chavez. "I'd feel complimented if you called me a fanatic," he says. "The only ones who make things change are fanatics. If you're not a fanatic around here, you can't cut it."

"What's happened here is a miracle," says

Dolores Huerta, 40, UFWOC vice president. "But it didn't come about by magic." One recent morning a reporter saw Mrs. Huerta at 4 a.m. as she was about to depart for a picket line. She had last been seen entering a midnight meeting with Mr. Chavez and Jerry Cohen, a union attorney. "Haven't you had any sleep?" the reporter asked. "No, why spoil the fun," replied Mrs. Huerta, who has a reputation as a "ferocious negotiator."

A Social Movement?

"There's still a long, long struggle," Mr. Chavez cautions. And he makes it clear that the emerging victory in the grape boycott is just the beginning. UFWOC is going after melon growers next, and other major commodities subsequently. Moreover, UFWOC recently signed a contract with Roberts Farms (total 46,000 acres) which not only grows grapes, but is also the world's largest producer of walnuts, almonds, persimmons and canned figs, thus giving the union a substantial wedge into production of those items. Coming in an era of social ferment where UFWOC activities have taken on all the trappings of a civil rights struggle, the potential for large scale farm unionism is now greater than ever.

Certainly for Mr. Chavez, organizing farm workers is not just a union battle; it is a broad social movement that he calls "La Causa," or "The Cause." In addition to its organizing and negotiating activities, the UFWOC runs a hiring hall (which it hopes will eventually phase out the middleman labor contractor in agriculture), a credit union (which will loan a member up to $500 at 1% interest, after he has made an initial investment of $5), a clinic, a cooperative gasoline station and a newspaper.

Sitting in the special rubber-backed rocking chair he uses because of back trouble, Mr. Chavez asserts that broad economic power is the key to uplifting the farm worker. He refers to the boycott as "our most effective nonviolent weapon."

(In his adherence to nonviolence, Mr. Chavez has sometimes been compared to the late Martin Luther King, a man with whom he corresponded but whom he never met. Even Mr. Chavez's bodyguards are unarmed. Some growers aren't convinced of Mr. Chavez's adherence to nonviolent principles, however; some violent attacks on nonstrikers and their cars occurred during the long grape workers dispute, though UFWOC has denied any responsibility for them.)

Plaid Shirt, Levis

To his job as leader of "La Causa," Mr. Chavez brought deep religious conviction (a Roman Catholic, he takes communion every day) and a formal education that stopped at the seventh grade. In his plaid shirt, Levis and work boots, he still is indistinguishable in a crowd from the field hands themselves.

Bob Armington, 62, crew leader at the ranch of John J. Kovacevich in Arvin, about 50 miles south of Delano, says Mr. Chavez's ability to rally farm workers around him was not easily won. "We're very careful about who we look up to as leaders. We've been sold out in the past," says Mr. Armington as he uses a spectrometer to test grapes for sugar content on the first day of the harvest in sweltering 105-degree heat. He refers to Mr. Chavez as "a wonderful man." The reason? "He looks up to poor people."

The "real heroes of the struggle," in Mr. Chavez's view, have been the workers who have gone to urban areas to organize boycotts. Like Mr. Chavez, they are paid $5 a week, plus room and board. Their work is an endless series of meetings at churches, homes and schools, plus the organizing of picket lines and rallies and, of course, discussions with store managers and shoppers. "Waving flags, marches and demonstrations and other things are good and give publicity to the strike, but they are no substitute for convincing people, one by one, not to buy scab grapes," says Larry Itliong, national boycott coordinator and assistant director of UFWOC.

They Don't Understand

One problem at times has been UFWOC's need to control some of its sympathizers who have committed acts of vandalism at supermarkets. "Some people really believe they're helping us by destroying property," says Marcos Munoz, boycott coordinator for New England. "They don't understand how this destroys us."

William Kircher, director of organization for the AFL-CIO, says Mr. Chavez's development of "strong indigenous leadership" has been one of the keys to UFWOC success thus far. Every Friday night the union has a meeting conducted in English and Spanish at Filipino Hall in Delano, and Mr. Chavez attempts to get as many workers as possible to address the members so they will become accustomed to a leadership role.

Mr. Kircher also admires UFWOC's racially-integrated structure, almost a rarity in this era of separatist movements. At first the Filipinos, who constitute a sizable minority of farm laborers, were concerned about being "swallowed up" in the union because there are many more Mexican-Americans, says Mr. Itliong.

Mr. Itliong, 56, headed the AFL-CIO's Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, which merged with Mr. Chavez's independent National Farm Workers Association to form UFWOC in 1966. Mr. Kircher says Mr. Chavez and Mr. Itliong are "without peer in understanding the need for one class of citizenship in the union structure, without regard to ethnic background."

The Church's Role

Bob McMillen, the UFWOC's lobbyist at the California state legislature, says another facet of the union's strength has been Mr. Chavez's ability to build a coalition of supporters which runs the gamut from George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, to student activists and Black Panthers. "That's no mean feat," he adds.

Perhaps even more crucial has been the role played by the Catholic Church. The Bishops Committee on Farm Labor has been instrumental in bringing UFWOC and the growers to the bargaining table—something that was once considered impossible. While the Bishops Committee has never formally endorsed the boycott, it has stated unequivocally that farm workers have the right to organize into a union and that they should be included under the National Labor Relations Act and national minimum wage and unemployment insurance programs.

Responding to criticism that the church has been overly zealous in pursuing these goals, Monsignor Roger Mahoney, secretary of the Bishops Committee, says: "Our participation in negotiations has usually been at the invitation of growers, not the union. So many people think the church has tried to push Chavez down on these companies—it's not the case."

Most of the contracts signed by UFWOC provide for a wage of $1.80 an hour, 15 cents above the current state minimum (and in contrast to $1.10 an hour before the strike began); this will be increased to $1.95 in 1971, $2.05 in 1972, and renegotiated thereafter. The contracts also call for incentive payments of 20 cents per box of grapes picked, 10 cents an hour for a health and welfare fund (named after the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, who was an ardent supporter of UFWOC and referred to Mr. Chavez as "one of the heroic figures of our time") and two cents a box for a special economic development fund (chiefly for housing elderly field hands who can work no longer).

A New Bell

In addition, jobs will be assigned through the union hiring hall. Formal grievance procedures will be instituted. Strikes will be prohibited during the three-year agreements. Every box of grapes shipped by the signatory company will bear the union label, a black Aztec eagle. And joint union-grower committees will regulate the use of dangerous pesticides, such as DDT and aldrin. Mr. Chavez is quite adamant on the pesticide question. "What's the use of getting your people a good contract if their health isn't protected?" he asks.

Near the end of a reporter's interview with Mr. Chavez, his secretary bursts into his office and says: "It's here. It's here. The bell."

Mr. Chavez walks outside to see "the farm workers" bell contributed by the Whitechapel Foundry in England, where the original Liberty Bell was cast, and driven across country in a panel truck contributed by the United Auto Workers, one of UFWOC's strongest supporters. At present, the bell is chained to prevent it from ringing, a symbol of the "slavery" of farm workers "to poverty and paternalism," Mr. Chavez explains.

The lock on the chain bears the UFWOC's black eagle and is not to be removed until all the grape growers have signed contracts with the union. "This bell is going to start ringing pretty soon," Mr. Chavez comments as he heads back to his office smiling.

In November 1960, eight members of the Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, entered the gates of state prisons in North Carolina, victims of what the trade union movement contends was a gross miscarriage of Justice.

The eight had drawn prison terms ranging from two to 10 years for alleged participation in a dynamiting conspiracy at the height of TWUA's strike against hhe Harriet-Hendersnn Textile Mills in Henderson, N.C. Their arrest, conviction and imprisonment should trouble the conscience of free men everywhere, because:

-they were put behind bars solely on the testimony of an "agent provocateur" in the pay of the State bureau of Investigation.

-Although they were arrested while allegedly en route to dynamite the struch mill, police conceded that they had no explosives in their possession, nor was evidence ever offered that they had possessed any explosives.

-The sentences that were imposed had no relation to their alleged involvement in the conspiracy. Rank-and-file who were purported to have plotted the dynamiting with the "agent provocateir" drew the lightest sentences; the union officials who the state conceded were not directly involved in the conspiracy, drew the stiffest penalties.

Among those thrown into prison was Boyd E. Payton, Carolinas Director for TWUA, a Sunday School teacher, and a man highly regarded throughout the South and throughout the labor movement as a gentle and compassionate man.

During his nine months in prison (until ha received a full pardon from Governor Terry Sanford on the day before Sanford left public office) Payton filled several hundred pocket-sized notebooks with his observations on prison life and on the circumstances surrounding his arrest and trial. These notebooks were stored in his prison mattress, and were smuggled out of prison when he obtained his freedom.

From these notes, Payton has written a warm and human stroy, Prejudice Plus Politics Equal Prison, which is scheduled for publication this fall by Dorrance and Company of Philadelphia. This is a book that deserves the thoughtful attention of all students of the American trade union movement. It deserves, as well, the time of those who are disturbed about the abuses of power by the State, and those who search after justice in a world which daily moves away from the ancient beliefs in the dignity of the human being.

Boyd Payton's book will retail for $5 per copy. However, advance prepaid orders may be placed until September 1st at a speiial rate of $4 percopy. Checks should be drawn to the "Payton Book Committee," and should be mailed to Bert Gottlieb, c/o Transportation Institute, Suite 403, 2000 L. Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

Boycott Grapes

Attached are copies of the articles concerning the nationwide boycott against California table grapes. The Madison Grapes Boycott Committee is an apolitical group of concerned students and Madison residents, headed by Manuel Salas, a former migrant wokker and new director of boycott activities in Wisconsin. The Committee is attempting to provide in-depth information about the boycott for as many Madison residents as possible, that they will have some basis for forming individual decisions on this issue. Because the strike in California is only the focal point of a widespread effort to extend the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act to include agricultural workers, the issues directly affect the 15,000 migrant farm workers expected in Wisconsin this summer, and, by extension, the Wisconsin Residents who have tolerated the substandard working add living conditions which they are still experiencing in our own state.

The Committee hopes that concerned individuals will be willing to volunteer some time to help in their efforts to disseminate information within their neighborhoods. If the boycott effort is to succeed, it will only be because enough consumers express concern directly to their neighborhood grocers or because they announce to their grocers that they feel compelled to shop only in stores which are not selling California green seedless table grapes. THE DELANO GRAPE STRIKE:

The Farm Workers' Struggle For Self Determination

By: The Rev. Wayne C. Hartmire, Jr., Director, Calif. Migrant Ministry

"When we are really honest with ourselves we must admit that our lives are all that really belong to us. So, it is how we use our lives that determines what kind of men we are. It is my deepest belief that only by giving our lives do we find life. I am convinced that the truest act of courage, the strongest act of manliness is to sacrifice ourselves for others in a totally non-violent struggle for justice. To be a man is to suffer for others. God help us to be men!" (Cesar Chavez)

"The time has come for farm workers: dignity and a measure of hope through organization and self-determination."
—George Ballis photos

On December 1, 1968, Prebyterian Life printed a long article by Mr. Allan Grant entitled "California Grapes and the Boycott - The Growers' Side of the Story." Among other things Mr. Grant implied that farm workers in California are doing reasonably well economically. He also hinted that the leaders of the Union have no real interest in the workers or in social justice. Mr. Grant pieced together a large number of facts and conclusions (some accurate and some not): but he did not deal seriously with the underlying issues of the Delano Grape Strike: 1) Are seasonal farm workers underpaid and mistreated on the job? 2) Would an organization of their own improve conditions? 3) Do farm workers want such an organization; do they want to be represented by Cesar Chavez' UFWOC? 4) Is the agricultural industry opposing the formation of a strong and independent organization of workers? Answers to these questions might help Christians respond to one important How are we to be servants to the men, women and childen who harvest the crops?

I would like to talk about the nature of the agricultural industry, conditions in the fields and trace the history of the Delano strike and in so doing try to address the basic human issues involved in the farm worker's struggle. I will then deal more directly with some other statements made in Mr. Grant's article. I am not writing as a detached student of this struggle. The California Migrant Ministry has been at work in the fields for 25 years. I have known Cesar Chavez for more than 7 years. Our staff has been present from the beginning of the Strike in September 1965. Our concern is for dignity and full life for workers, their families and indeed for all men in the agricultural community. We believe that self-determination for farm workers is one crucial element in a more just and human future. We believe that farm workers must have a strong organization of their own if they are to improve their life situation and we have tried to help them gain the strength needed to bring about that measure of equality that will make possible bargaining with their em-

California's Most Powerful Industry

California agriculture is big business! Gross agricultural income in 1966 was a record $3.95 billion dollars. Since then it has topped four (4) billion dollars.[1] California agriculture and related industries, by their own testimony, account for 33% of the jobs in the state. Farm workers are pressing for change against the determined resistance of the state's most powerful and influential industry.

Agriculture in California has been characterized by large farms, specialized crops, high peak labor needs and a large supply of impoverished farm workers - often from other countries.[2] Although the majority of farmers in California are smaller landowners, the industry is dominated by the largest landowners. The 1964 U.S. Census of Agriculture showed 81,000 farms in California. 49,000 of those farms hire no outside labor. 7% of the farms employ 75% of the labor.[3] 60% of California's farms average less than 50 acres but the total acreage of these small farms is 5% of California's agricultural land.[4] The 1959 U.S. Census of Agriculture showed that 6.0% of California's farms own 75% of the land. Included among those large landowners are So. Pacific Railroad, Standard Oil, J. G. Boswell, Anderson Clayton, Tejon Ranch (L.A. Times), Bank of America and Giumarra Vineyards Corporation. Contrary to Mr. Grant's statements many Delano area growers other than Giumarra have large landholdings in excess of 2,500 acres.[5]

These powerful agricultural landholders and their economic allies dominate the agricultural industry in California. They and their predecessors have resisted unionization since the turn of the century.[6] The farm workers' struggle for organization and bargaining may be focussed today on table grapes but it is in fact a struggle with the will of the entire industry. And as many people in other states have noticed, it is a struggle with agricultural labor users all over succeed against the resistance of the industry, they must succeed in Delano and in table grapes. If they can gain the right of organizing and bargaining in wine and table grapes then all farm workers may share in the benefits and the dignity of new found organizational strength.

Poverty & Suffering Among Farm Workers

Some may ask: Why is such organizational strength necessary? Are conditions really that bad? "No other segment of our population is so poorly paid yet contributes so much to our Nation's wealth and welfare."[7] So speaks the U.S. Senate Subcomittee on Migratory Labor in its discussion of seasonal farm workers in the U.S.A. But as Mr. Grant implies it may be unfair to lump California farm workers into national conclusions since farm workers in California are paid more than in any other state (excepting Hawaii where farm workers are organized).[8] California's Welfare Study Commission made the following statement in referring to farm workers: "one occupational group in California is so deeply locked in poverty that it is set off from all others."[9] Allan Grant quotes the Governor's Advisory Commission on Housing but overlooks the following conclusion of their study: "Fewer than 20 percent of the California farm worker families covered in our study lived in dwellings which could be considered adequate by present standards of health, safety and comfort. Sixty-three percent of the dwelling units occupied by general field workers were dilapidated or deteriorated. For 33 percent of the dwelling units occupied by general field workers, the only toilet facilities were pit privies. Thirty percent of the dwellings had no bathing facilities, and 25 percent lacked even so basic a necessity as a kitchen sink with running water. These conditions, to be discussed in detail in the body of the report, offer little evidence of improvement in the relative economic and social position of the agricultural worker in California. He remains, as he has since the state's early transition to intensive labor use farming, among the most poorly paid, poorly fed, and poorly housed of California's citizens."[10]

It is true that many grape pickers in California earn $1.40 or $1.50 per hour plus an incentive piece rate during the peak harvest season. But the peak harvest season lasts only four to six weeks.[11] During the rest of the year wages hover around $1.40 per hour[12] and work is sporadic and uncertain. Even at harvest some employers pay a flat $1.50 per hour[13] and not all workers get steady employment. Mr. Grant quotes the $1.65 minimum wage established by California's Industrial Welfare Commission. He failed to mention that California's grape growers sought to have that minimum wage set aside in court—an expensive legal action that can only be understood in the context of hourly pay under $1.65 per hour. The $1.65 State minimum is for women only. Men are covered by the federal law but at a discriminatory level: $1.30 per hour as compared to $1.60 per hour for other workers. According to an independent study done for the University of California, the average grape worker in Kern County (where Delano is located) is employed 119 days out of the year. Full employment would be somewhere near 250 days.[14] His annual income is comparable to the average for all seasonal farm workers in California: $2,024.[15] To make matters worse, the gap between farm workers and other workers is widening. In 1948, the average California farm worker earned 62% of the hourly wage of his counterpart in manufacturing. In 1965, average farm worker earnings were 46% of the wage earned by the average worker in manufacturing.[16] Farm workers in California are poverty-stricken; real human suffering results from that poverty. Those who doubt the reality of that suffering need to spend some time in the barrios and rural fringe communities of our state.

Powerlessness

Annual income is only one aspect of the farm workers problem. They are relatively powerless on the job and in the life of the community. As a result, farm workers are excluded from unemployment insurance, and collective bargaining legislation. Mr. Grant affirms the protections farm workers have in California but enforcement of the laws that do cover farm workers in California is at best weak and inconsistent.[17] The California Rural Legal Assistance program, led by attorneys, has been investigating the enforcement of laws that are supposed to protect farm workers. In a preliminary report they noted 1,8[illegible] violations of state health [illegible]tation laws. Over 90% of the farmers in one county were in violation of state health laws.[18] In another county they determined that only 14 of 139 farmers surveyed provided toilets for their workers and that only two of the 14 did so in compliance with health standards.[19] Even Governor Ronald Reagan has recently called for more effective enforcement of laws that are on the books to protect California's farm workers (in the same statement he opposed unemployment insurance for seasonal farm workers and the extension of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) to agriculture).[20]

California farmers are not especially cruel or corrupt. They are men like us who happen to have too much power over the lives of their workers. They have become accustomed to an over-supply of poor and unorganized workers which has allowed them to control all the important decisions about wages and working conditions. Being human, they have paid more attention to their own economic interests than to the interests of the workers. As a result workers in agriculture have been denied the improved wages and working conditions that are commonplace in industry.[21] The vast majority of farm workers in California do not have contracts; they do not get overtime pay; too often they do not even know their rate of pay while they are working; there are no holidays or vacations with pay; they do not have health or pension plans; in many instances they must provide their own tools & equipment; safety provisions are minimal; there are no regular rest periods; toilets and sanitary drinking water may or may not be provided. Farm workers go to work not knowing how long the day will be or how many days of work there will be in that week. Workers are laid off in the middle of the day, in the middle of the week, for days or weeks at a time with no notice and no clear indication of when work will be available. If a male worker is told to show up for work at 6 A.M. and the equipment is not ready or the trees are wet and he does not work until 10 A.M., he is not paid for those 4 hours. Speed-ups and abusive supervision are all too common. Farm workers can be fired at any time without explanation. There are no established channels for grievances. The many who will dispute these realities can point to examples of better wages and working conditions but their examples do not represent the experiences of the majority of unorganized farm workers in California and the U.S.A. The farm workers' powerlessness on the job crushes his dignity and leaves him no alternative but resentment and suffering. Justice demands that there be a change—for the sake of workers, the industry and the larger community.

Change Through Organization

But how will that change come about? Should workers wait for their employers to make the needed changes? In California they have already been waiting for 100 years. Should they wait for Congress to pass legislation that will protect their right to bargain with their employers? All farm workers in our country have now been waiting 33 years for that day.[22] Workers could leave agriculture. But what would be the alternatives in the city for a man with farm labor skills?

In 1962 Cesar Chavez made a decision to do something about the conditions of farm workers. He left his job as an organizer for the Commu- [illegible] his wife and 8 children lived on their minimal savings and on sporadic field work earnings while Cesar began to build a self-supporting organization of farm workers that would in time be strong enough to bargain with employers for improved wages and working conditions. By September 1965, the NFWA had about 2,000 family members, nearly half of them in the Delano area. There was a credit union and a death benefit insurance plan tied to the $3.50 per month dues.[23]

Allan Grant who is the highly paid professional spokesman for a four billion dollar a year industry[24] implies that Chavez is a money and power hungry labor professional. Cesar Chavez is an experienced and skilled organizer. He is also a dedicated Christian who is pouring out the substance of his life in an effort to achieve a new kind of dignity for workers. After 16 years as an organizer he lives in a small, four-room house in Delano. He does not own a car. Since the strike began in 1965 he has received no salary. He and his family live like all of the Delano strikers; $5.00 per week spending money, food from the strike kitchen or store and basic bills, e.g., rent and utilities paid by the Union.

In September 1965, the now famous Delano Grape Strike began. It was at first a joint effort by the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AWOC) of the AFL-CIO and the [illegible] ganizations have now merged into the UFWOC of the AFL-CIO, with Cesar Chavez as director. As a result of the Delano strike and the several boycotts that have accompanied the strike, there have been union representation elections, bargaining and contracts with 10 wine grape growers. The aspirations and the organizational energies of the workers are now focussed on table grape growers.

In May and June of 1967, UFWOC carried on an organizing campaign among the workers of Giumarra Vineyards Corporation (12,500 acres, approximately half of the acreage in table grapes). In June, UFWOC sent a registered letter to Giumarra stating that the Union represented Giumarra's workers and asking for a meeting to discuss a union representation election. The Company did not respond. The Union then sent a telegram, asked the State Conciliation Service to arrange a meeting, and through other independent parties tried to get a meeting with the Company. The Company refused. Note that the workers were not asking for recognition or for immediate bargaining. They were only asking for a meeting to discuss fair procedures for a secret ballot election that would determine the will of the workers. The Company would not even discuss such an election and since that time has resisted all mediation efforts by church groups and others.

This same offer to discuss election procedures has been made to all table grape growers in California - large and small. Without a single exception (so far) table grape growers have refused to meet with representatives of organized workers to discuss elections or other issues having to do with representation and bargaining. In Jan. 1969 UFWOC offered to meet with employers even if there were only one agenda item: the effects of chemical pesticides on workers.

On August 3, 1967, after two months of trying to meet with Giumarra a strike was called by UFWOC [illegible]

The Company began recruiting strikebreakers from Mexico and elsewhere and the struggle was on. The boycott against Giumarra's grapes began in the fall of 1967. Other growers loaned their labels to Giumarra to help him minimize the pressure of the boycott. In the spring and summer of 1968, the strike spread to Coachella Valley and southern Kern County. There are now 42 strikes certified by the U.S. Dept. of Labor. Also in the spring and summer of 1968, as mentioned above, the offer for elections was made to all table grape growers. In the face of the unified resistance of the industry to any conversations with organized workers, the boycott was expanded to include all California table grapes. Church groups, unions and public officials all over the country have given their support to the boycott.

The hard reality is that the workers need and want organization and collective bargaining and their employers are resisting this change with all the considerable power at their command.[25] The industry is attempting to cloud that reality by talking about "outsiders" and "labor professionals" and by stating that the "real workers" don't want Chavez and UFWOC. But who are the "real workers"? Mrs. Josephine Gabaldon (mentioned by Grant as a "real worker" opposed to Chavez) is not a field worker but a crew boss. Jose Mendoza (also mentioned by Grant) is a shoe salesman hired by the National Right-to-Work Committee to represent himself as a worker and to spread anti-union propaganda. He makes speeches all over the country but has no solid organizational base at home, no following among farm workers and is just the most recent example of the willingness of some minority people to sell themselves to the very forces that keep their brothers poor and powerless.

Do Workers Want a

Why then don't employers agree to fair elections supervised by a neutral party so the workers can vote their will? Employers argue that they know what their workers want and don't feel the need for an election. But if they are so sure why not have an election and thus destroy the effectiveness of the boycott? And how can they be so sure since workers have voted for the union every time they have had a chance? In the three secret ballot elections and the five card check elections held to date, the workers have in every case voted to be represented by UFWOC.[26] These elections are the only hard, public evidence we have that indicates the will of the workers. Perhaps grape growers do know the will of their workers and are, for that reason, resisting the only fair and free way of determining that will.

Cesar Chavez and the workers: "We have something the rich do not own. We have our own bodies and spirits and the justice of our cause as our weapons."

I will conclude with comments on some of Mr. Grant's "facts and conclusions" that have not been dealt with above:

1) Mr. Grant claims that "it was not local farm workers who were picketing" (in 1965 and 1966). The striking farm workers have asked for and received help from church groups, civil rights groups, unions and others. They do not apologize for that nor do we think that anyone is an "outsider" to the problem. But to state that the picket line was composed of or dominated by non-farm workers is a complete distor- farm workers walk out of the fields and develop roving picket lines to communicate the Huelga (strike) message to other workers.

2) Mr. Grant states the "90% of the more than 5,000 pickers hired at the peak of the harvest in Delano are residents of the area." He documents this by referring to a booklet published by The South Central Farmer's Committee - a Committee composed of struck Delano growers. Independent research carried on before the Delano strike indicates that approximately 60% of the grape harvest workers in Kern County are migrants.[27] Almost the full 100% of the harvest work force are seasonal workers-as opposed to year-round hired hands. Whether migrant or local, seasonal workers are locked in the same poverty, have similar aspirations for their children and have the same need for organizational strength and the protections of a contract.

3) Mr. Grant says the harvest season lasts for four months and that grape pickers can work almost all year-round. Dept. of Employment figures show that the labor needs in Kern County (where Delano is located) fluctuate greatly even during the harvest period:[28]

December 2, 1967	200 workers	(harvest)
Dec. 18, 1967—Jan. 27, 1968	3200 workers	(pruning)
February 24, 1968	400 workers	(pruning)
March 30, 1968	0
May 13—June 1, 1968	3500 workers	(thinning)
July 13, 1968	800 workers	(thinning)
Aug. 7—Sept. 2, 1968	6000 workers	(harvest)
Sept. 21, 1968	1500 workers	(harvest)
November 23, 1968	50 workers	(harvest)

cal) have long periods of unemployment and underemployment. As stated earlier the average grape picker who works regularly in the grapes in Kern County gets 119 days of work per year.

4) Allan Grant contends that there is no strike in the grapes and that the Union does not represent the workers. It is the classic argument used by employers who oppose the unionization of their workers. How can employers in an unorganized industry know the deeply held convictions of their workers? How can the public know the will of workers when employers refuse to allow elections?

The grapes are being picked. It is slow and expensive but growers have been willing to pay the cost of recruiting strikebreakers from Mexico and the Southwest rather than to discuss issues with their original employees. Can it be said that there is no strike just because there are too many hungry people in the U.S. and Mexico – some of whom are willing even to be strikebreakers in order to meet the basic needs of their families?

Mr. Grant quotes UFWOC membership figures as an indication that Chavez is a failure. He fails to mention that these are family memberships and that many families include 2-3 workers. He also compares these membership figures with the total number of farm workers in California when the UFWOC organizing drive has been mainly limited to grape workers since the strike began in September 1965. (California agriculture produces more than 200 commercial crops.) I freely acknowledge that more farm workers need to be reached by the organizing struggle. My conclusion from that is that the strikers need more help: more food, money and volunteer assistance—more help so they can win the strike and reach out to workers in other crops. It is ironic that growers point to slow progress in gaining members & contracts. It is their own unified resistance to reasonable social change and a more just future that makes the struggle so slow and so difficult for all parties. It is their unified refusal even to discuss elections that makes the boycott necessary.

Problems of Small Farmers

5) Mr. Grant points to the cost-price squeeze that is affecting many farmers. The vast majority of churchmen and farm workers empathize with the plight of the small farmer. However, it must be pointed out that most workers in California are employed by large commercial farms (see earlier figures in this article). It must also be said that even the hard pressed small farmer is not in the same economic position as the worker. The farmer can sell his land; he also has credit at the bank; normally he has an established place in community life and access to the decisionmaking process. Humanly speaking, the plight of the worker still demands priority attention.

Farm workers, although in sympathy with small farmers (who tend also to be laborers), are now saying: "we will not tolerate any longer a situation where your survival in business is purchased by our poverty and the poverty of our children." With concerned churchmen the workers would press small farmers to organize themselves for effective collective bargaining at the market place. Ralph Kittelson, the National Organizing Director for the National Farmers Organization (NFO) has said that farmers must stand up for their rights or the problems will grow.[29] He and the NFO are organizing farmers not to oppose the legitimate aspirations of the workers but for effective use of power in the marketing of their products. The NFO is now active in California. In the CMM we have argued that if farmers would organize for the sake of a fair price at the market place and would articulate their demands and their strategy, churchmen would support their efforts. This, after all, is what the workers are trying to do—help themselves through the strength of their own organization.

6) Mr. Grant quotes with satisfaction the anti-strike conclusions of Vancouver Mayor Thomas J. Campbell. However, Mayor Campbell is an exception to the general rule. Starting as far back as December 1965, distinguished visitors to Delano have generally supported the reasonable demands of the workers, even when their travel expenses have been paid for by the growers or the chain stores. Two (2) Minneapolis—St. Paul clergymen Father Edward Flahavan & the Rev. Wm. Merriman, sent by the chain stores in their area to become "weekend experts" on the growers side of the strike insisted on examining all sides and returned home to testify that the Calif. grape growers were anti-union and racist in their attitude toward workers. An editorial in the St. Paul Dispatch Pioneer Press then accused the ministers of being "overnight experts" (i.e., the wrong kind of overnight expert).

A three man Fact-Finding Committee from Toronto composed of Mr. Ron Haggart, a reporter for the Toronto Telegram Reporter; Mr. Wm. Archer, former City Controller and the Rev. Edgar File of the United Church of Canada carefully spent blocks of time with growers, workers, union leaders and public officials. They concluded that "the over-riding issue in the California grape dispute is the right of collective bargaining which is being denied to the farm workers. From our examination it is clear that the table grape growers are unwilling to allow their workers to choose their own representatives and let them bargain freely for themselves. . . . we are satisfied that the UFWOC has substantial support among the vineyard workers in the Delano area."[30]

Rabbis Jacob Lantz and Judea Miller of Boston spent a week in California examining all sides of the grape controversy. They concluded that the strike was both real and legitimate and called on their constituents to support the farm workers. Rabbi Miller in a report to his congregation made the following comments: ". . . we toured the vineyards, spoke to growers and farm workers, to representatives of industry and of the Union, including Cesar Chavez. It is our conclusion that there definitely is a strike there . . . Despite contentions by the growers that the conditions of the farm workers in that region are better than those in other regions in the nation, still the conditions that we did find were wretched. We have studied the entire situation and find this to be a moral question. The exploitation and dehumanization of other human beings for the sake of profit is a religious issue."[31]

Non-Violent Social Change

Many churchmen sympathize with the plight of the workers but balk at unions and boycotts. They worry about strikes at harvest; but UFWOC has agreed to no-strike clauses in all its ten contracts. They are concerned about the ability of the Union to service the contracts; but the wine growers under contract have testified to the integrity and sense of responsibility demonstrated by UFWOC.[32] As fellow Christians I urge you to put yourselves in the workers' place. How can they change unjust conditions without organizing and pressing their demands? What else is a union than an organization of farm workers seeking changes through collective bargaining? They have asked their employers to discuss representation elections and been refused. They cannot call on the legal machinery of the NLRB because the law excludes them. Having sought changes through discussion and negotiation and been rebuked, what alternative do they have other than to apply pressure through strike and boycott? The workers are asking for a reasonable thing: collective bargaining. They are pressing their demands non-violently.

What will happen if farm workers do not get support from men of good will? Fresno Mayor Floyd Hyde is worried: "We have left the poor people of the (San Joaquin) Valley no alternative and there are growing signs they realize it. We are pushing them toward violence."[33] But Cesar Chavez is determined to liberate his brothers without resorting to violence: "one drop of human blood is worth more than all the contracts. We'll use strikes and we'll use boycotts to get recognition, but we'll wait as long as we must to get contracts without violence."[34]

Will militant non-violence succeed in bringing a measure of justice to the "factories in the fields?" Can Cesar Chavez and the pioneer farm workers with him maintain the momentum of their struggle and expand the dignity and raise the hopes of farm workers throughout the nation? The answer depends very much on what churches and churchmen do. Farm workers need our concrete help. With the rest of the world they are calling on us to be servants.

Job training clearinghouse

AFL-CIO News

A center that will distribute information and help develop job training programs is being set up in New York City under the sponsorship of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment.

The foundation is a joint union-management operation of which IAM President Roy Siemiller is a co-chairman.

The center will include a library with up-to-date material on technology and automation and their effects on workers, industry, the community and the nation, and will provide space for companies to display and demonstrate training equipment.

The program also includes the organization of a council which will act as a clearinghouse for the exchange of information on job-training programs by organized labor, industry and the government.

Theodore W. Kheel, nationally-known labor mediator and executive secretary of the foundation, described the center as the first effort to coordinate in one place the information on job training labor and management have developed through studies and experience, to provide a center for dissemination of such information and to stimulate further developments.

Better training programs to upgrade the unskilled are a major weapon in the war on poverty, Kheel said. He stressed, in addition, their importance in preparing members of minority groups to take their places in industry, in meeting the growing demand for skilled workers and in boosting production.

"Today a man with a skill is in command of his destiny," he said. "A man without a skill is a beggar."

The center will do no direct teaching or training, but the foundation already has moved in that direction.

The foundation and the U.S. Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training recently signed a contract under which the latter is establishing a program to train 5,000 employed workers for hig[illegible] their exist[illegible]

SPECIAL EXTENSION CENTERS

INSTITUTE OF HUMAN RELATIONS
LOYOLA UNIVERSITY

SPONSORING INSTITUTION - The Institute of Human Relations of Loyola University was founded in 1947 as the "Institute of Industrial Relations." In 1964, the title was changed to more adequately reflect the expanding nature of Institute activities.

Currently, the Institute provides programs of Leadership Training for the youth of Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic through the Inter-American Center. The Labor Management Center sponsors programs of adult education designed for members of both labor and management. Opportunities for individuals to raise economic levels and sharpen old skills or acquire new ones are provided through programs such as Special Extension Education.

The objective which guides all Institute endeavors is "to make the dignity of man the heart of economic efficiency."

THE PROJECT - Special Extension Education is designed to provide education and vocational training for 150 men and women in four Louisiana parishes. An experimental and demonstration program funded by the U. S. Departments of Labor and of Health, Education and Welfare, the project aspires to provide trainees with tangible and marketable skills and acquire and document information concerning the effectiveness of modern training techniques.

SCOPE - Equip 90 trainees with secretarial and clerical skills, including English and efficient office practice; provide basic education and vocational training in equipment operation and maintenance for 60 functional illiterates from rural areas .....

Develop and provide guidance enabling trainees to successfully fulfill employer needs.

OBJECTIVE - Through the implementation of specially designed accelerated teaching techniques, prepare individuals to assume contributing functions within the present day labor force. Indirectly, such programs contribute to community growth and stability.

COMMUNITY SUPPORT - The Special Extension Center Program (as well as similar programs throughout the country) has received support from civic leaders, industry, the clergy, educators and agencies concerned with unemployment and its side effects.

Advice and assistance of local leadership are enlisted. Community Advisory Boards will provide discussions of procedures, policies and other program concerns. The Louisiana Division of Employment Security assists with several phases of the program, as does the Louisiana Department of Education.

Southeastern News - Jan-Feb 1960

Organizers Meet In Atlanta

The first week in January, the Southeast's organizing staff attended a meeting in Atlanta just for organizers which most said was the best conference they had ever been to. They heard lectures and talked to each other about labor law, organizing techniques, the ILG contract, and special problems of the South.

Alabama Organizer Alice York said," It was the best I ever attended. The organizers had a chance to talk, and it was all about our problems. I think everybody enjoyed it."

"Using the Law to Organize"

The biggest part of the week was spent with the two lawyer-teachers, ILG Associate General Counsel Julius Topol and Southeastern Counsel Jack Handler.

covering about 700 workers, in Tenn., have contracts now, three it the new contracts and nego-

Officially, Topol and Handler talked about "Using the Law to Organize," but they mostly covered ways employers break the law to prevent organizing. In the hope that organizers who know the law can better protect the workers, the lawyers went into detail about what makes an employer's action legally an unfair labor practice.

Topol told them, "We didn't come to make lawyers out of you, but we want you to know what you can do and what you can't."

The meetings stimulated the organizers to go on talking, outside of the regular sessions, about the issues raised during the day. Many argued about the role of lawyers in a labor union.

Most regretted the necessity for turning to the Labor Board with charges of unfair labor practices and for using legal tactics to organize. One organizer said, "If the workers are strong and enough of them really want a union, they don't need lawyers to tell them what to do, and if they aren't strong, the lawyers can't organize them."

But most of them were eager to learn how the law can protect the workers against an employer's illegal conduct. The argument was whether Labor Board orders, recommendations and decisions really protect the workers. One conclusion was that we need speedy law enforcement with real teeth in it and therefore we should press Congress for revisions of the law.

The Face of the South

The ILG borrowed Emory Via, director of the Labor Program of the Southern Regional Council, to talk to the organizers about the special problems of the South and how they affect the Labor Movement and the organizer. He traced the economic history of the South and discussed the Civil Rights "revolution." He said "democracy requires a settlement" of the country's race problems. "Job security for everybody will do more to ease tensions than almost anything else."

HISTORY — Labor Economist Emory Via talked to the organizers about the South.

Organizing Techniques

To teach organizing techniques, the Region used its own people and asked organizers from other unions, the Teamsters and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, to come to exchange ideas. Saul Nesselroth, from the ILG's Education Department, and Benny Dansavage and Nick Bonanno taught sessions about organizing techniques and the use of leaflets.

These sessions also aroused a lot of discussion among the staff. Some of the organizers proposed new techniques and whole new approaches to organizing.

Southeast Assistant Director

Organizers Studied Law, Techniques, South, The Industry

Nick Bonanno said, "In an industry where the non-union shops are such a drag on the wages and conditions of union members, the most important people in the Union are the organizers who are out day and night riding the highways, knocking on doors, and picketing plants to bring the benefits of the Union contract to unorganized workers."

The Contract

Martin Morand, Regional Director, went through the standard ILG contract so the organizers would know the remedies the Union offers to the problems of unorganized workers. He also explained, for the benefit of staff recruited from other unions, the problems caused by the special nature of the garment industry.

ILG LAWYERS—Regional Counsel Jack Handler and Associate General Counsel Julius Topol stirred the Southeast's organizers to unprecedented thought and discussion, made January conference "the best we've had."

Attitude of an Organizer

Saul Nesselroth, who planned and directed the conference, wrapping it up at the end of the week, told the organizers that the most important quality they could have was one he didn't know how to teach: attitude. "It's hard to teach an organizer to hate exploitation and to want to do a good job for the operator, but he has to feel that way to be successful. He should have the kind of makeup where he gets almost sick every time he passes a non-union plant."

Not only were the organizers pleased with the conference and the teachers, but the teachers were pleased with them. Nesselroth, Handler, and Topol all expressed real satisfaction and pleasure at the dedication and interest of the organizing staff and at their response to the classes.

SOUTHEAST GOES TO SCHOOL — Anna Rousey, Bill Andrews, and Lolita Matamoros were among about 30 organizers who studied labor law and organizing techniques at conference in Atlanta.

Unionists Gather in Athens For Labor Studies of South

By MARY HUTCHERSON
Atlanta Journal Correspondent

ATHENS, Ga., Jan. 22—During the month of January a group of 21 trade unionists, a group intimately concerned with the progress of the labor movement in the South, is engaged in a program of intensive study which possibly could have far-reaching effects in the southern labor picture.

The men, representing a dozen southern states and ranging in age from 23 to 62, are all participants in the Southern Union Staff Institute, sponsored by the National Institute of Labor Education in cooperation with the AFL-CIO, now in session at the Center for Continuing Education at the University of Georgia.

ACCORDING to George Guernsey, associate director of AFL-CIO Department of Education, Washington, and codirector of the Institute, the 21 participants represent 14 international trade unions. All are fulltime union men — organizers, business agents, service representatives — and their attendance at the NILE-sponsored institute is paid for by the various unions.

For six or seven hours a day, the men attend lectures, seminars, and discussions that range from southern labor history to civil rights to development of rapid reading skills.

INSTITUTE DIRECTOR, Dr. Emory F. Via, director of the labor program for the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, explained that the institute objectives are, in general, to help the participants better their understanding of their society and of the various problems in the South and through this understanding to help them function more effectively.

And Mr. Guernsey added: "I think the labor movement is slowly recognizing that people need to be trained for this full-time work, that they need to know more about society and especially true of the South. The reasoning behind this institute is the concern the labor movement has in trying to strengthen itself in the South."

THE PROGRAM at Georgia, Dr. Via noted, is the third in a series of three such institutes, the others having been held at the University of North Carolina and the University of Texas. And although tangible results of the previous programs are difficult to pin down, Mr. Guernsey called attention to three participants of the Texas program (which like this at Georgia dealt at some length with the war on poverty) who are now members of poverty war-community action boards in their own communities.

Thus, although the concern of the institute is primarily with the 21 participants, Dr. Via emphasized that, because what the labor movement does in the South and in the nation is of great importance to the public, labor education programs ultimately affect the public.

STAFF FOR THE institute comes from all over the country. Prof. Ray Marshall of the University of Texas is teaching southern labor history. Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the NAACP, addressed the group earlier this week on civil rights.

Daniel Pollitt of the University of North Carolina School of Law will conduct sessions on labor law.

Reese Cleghorn of the Journal and Pat Watters, formerly of the Journal and now with the Southern Regional Council, will discuss changing voting patterns.

Vivian Henderson, president of Clark College in Atlanta, will participate in discussions of southern economic problems; and William Kircher, director of the organizing department of AFL-CIO, will discuss organizing.

IN ADDITION to the 18 or 20 visiting teachers and lecturers, a number of members of the University of Georgia faculty will take part in the institute.

"The southern labor movement is very concerned about training its people," Mr. Guernsey commented. And the month-long institutes such as this are "probably the best thing that has been done in long-range staff training."

Organizers Meet In Atlanta

The first week in January, the Southeast's organizing staff attended a meeting in Atlanta just for organizers which most said was the best conference they had ever been to. They heard lectures and talked to each other about labor law, organizing techniques, the ILG contract, and special problems of the South.

Alabama Organizer Alice York said," It was the best I ever attended. The organizers had a chance to talk, and it was all about our problems. I think everybody enjoyed it."

"Using the Law to Organize"

The biggest part of the week was spent with the two lawyer-teachers, ILG Associate General Counsel Julius Topol and Southeastern Counsel Jack Handler. Officially, Topol and Handler talked about "Using the Law to Organize," but they mostly covered ways employers break the law to prevent organizing. In the hope that organizers who know the law can better protect the workers, the lawyers went into detail about what makes an employer's action legally an unfair labor practice.

Topol told them, "We didn't come to make lawyers out of you, but we want you to know what you can do and what you can't."

The meetings stimulated the organizers to go on talking, outside of the regular sessions, about the issues raised during the day. Many argued about the role of lawyers in a labor union.

Most regretted the necessity for turning to the Labor Board with charges of unfair labor practices and for using legal tactics to organize. One organizer said, "If the workers are strong and enough of them really want a union, they don't need lawyers to tell them what to do, and if they aren't strong, the lawyers can't organize them."

But most of them were eager to learn how the law can protect the workers against an employer's illegal conduct. The argument was whether Labor Board orders, recommendations and decisions really protect the workers. One conclusion was that we need speedy law enforcement with real teeth in it and therefore we should press Congress for revisions of the law.

The Face of the South

The ILG borrowed Emory Via, director of the Labor Program of the Southern Regional Council, to talk to the organizers about the special problems of the South and how they affect the Labor Movement and the organizer. He traced the economic history of the South and discussed the Civil Rights "revolution." He said "democracy requires a settlement" of the country's race problems. "Job security for everybody will do more to ease tensions than almost anything else."

HISTORY — Labor Economist Emory Via talked to the organizers about the South.

Organizing Techniques

To teach organizing techniques, the Region used its own people and asked organizers from other unions, the Teamsters and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, to come to exchange ideas. Saul Nesselroth, from the ILG's Education Department, and Benny Dansavage and Nick Bonanno taught sessions about organizing techniques and the use of leaflets.

These sessions also aroused a lot of discussion among the staff. Some of the organizers proposed new techniques and whole new approaches to organizing.

Southeast Assistant Director

Nick Bonanno said, "In an industry where the non-union shops are such a drag on the wages and conditions of union members, the most important people in the Union are the organizers who are out day and night riding the highways, knocking on doors, and picketing plants to bring the benefits of the Union contract to unorganized workers."

The Contract

Martin Morand, Regional Director, went through the standard ILG contract so the organizers would know the remedies the Union offers to the problems of unorganized workers. He also explained, for the benefit of staff recruited from other unions, the problems caused by the special nature of the garment industry.

Attitude of an Organizer

Saul Nesselroth, who planned and directed the conference, wrapping it up at the end of the week, told the organizers that the most important quality they could have was one he didn't know how to teach: attitude. "It's hard to teach an organizer to hate exploitation and to want to do a good job for the operator, but he has to feel that way to be successful. On Open Forum

SRC Labor Director To Speak

Emory F. Via, Atlanta, labor program director of the Southern Regional Council, will be the speaker at this afternoon's Open Forum program in Peabody Auditorium.

He is on leave from the University of Wisconsin where since 1958 he has been an associate professor in labor education for the university's School for Workers. He has a bachelor of arts degree from Emory University and both a master's degree and a Ph. D in political science from the University of Chicago.

He has been field program director for the Georgia Workers Education Service; executive director for the Atlanta Labor Education Assn., field program director for the labor education division of Roosevelt University in Chicago and a labor consultant for the Southern Regional Council.

Via's talk, starting at 3 p.m., will be preceded by a half hour concert by the Golden Agers, a musical group from the City Recreation Dept.

Admission to the program is by membership ticket or by making a silver offering.

Questions Fly During Open Forum Session

March 14/66

E V

By DREW MURPHY

Open Forum participants yesterday hardly could wait for the program speaker, Dr. Emory F. Via, to finish his address before they started firing questions at him concerning labor unions.

Dr. Via, Atlanta, labor program director of the Southern Regional Council, fielded as many questions as he could, and ended up spending more time answering than addressing.

The Forum speaker, who has a Ph. D. in political science from the University of Chicago, made it clear from the start he favors unions, particularly as they operate in the collective bargaining process.

Gives Summary

He concluded a history of the labor movement in the U.S. with this summary:

—Unions are going institutions, with their own internal political life.

—U.S. public policy toward labor unions has developed over a long period of time, and it's still evolving, but the basic right to organize and bargain is more than 30 years old.

—Unions are basically pragmatic but infused with idealism, too. Indeed, much of their practical, day to day work is for humane ends.

—Unions accept democracy, a mixed economy, and they in turn fit into the fabric of American life.

Answers Questions

Then the questions started to fly. Here are some of them, with Dr. Via's answers:

—Don't unions encourage mediocrity? "You can find every kind of an answer to this question, but basically unions don't encourage mediocrity. As an example of what I mean, the apprentice programs offered by some unions encourage a high level of work."

—What can unions offer in the South? "I believe that in the next few years unions in the South will experience great growth. They will offer support of civil rights and of general education."

—Are strikes losing their utility? "Perhaps, but people tend to lose sight of the fact that only .18 percent of the nation's man hours were lost last year because of strikes. The largely fruitful results of collective bargaining often are overlooked."

—If unions are so democratic, how do they help nonmembers? "Anything that improves the lot of the working folk improves the whole community."

Opinion of Hoffa

—Do you believe James R. Hoffa, president of the Teamsters Union, is a credit to organized labor? "He isn't my personal ideal of a labor leader in every respect. However, most of the 1.5 million teamsters don't agree with me."

—Have unions contributed to education? "Labor has been an historic supporter of education. Back in the 19th Century, labor was one of the agitating forces that finally got for the public its present free system of education."

Inflation

—Hasn't the conflict between labor and management resulted in inflation? "Stopping the kind of inflation we've had so far isn't a high priority item with labor right now. There has been a slow rise in the cost of living in the past few years; but, on the other hand, our Gross National Product — and the country's resulting income — also have gone up amazingly. Only those with a fixed income are feeling the pinch. I would be interested in a social policy that could help these, and all of us. Most of us are better off than we were two decades ago."

Faircloth to Speak

Next Sunday's Open Forum speaker will be Florida's Atty. Gen. Earl Faircloth. The musical part of next week's program will start at 2:15 p.m. with a concert by the Youth Symphony, whose members are junior and senior high school students from Central Florida.

Music yesterday, for a half hour before the Forum, was supplied by the Golden Agers, a musical group from the City Recreation Dept., introduced by Kathleen Morrison.

Dr. Merlin Cox, Forum president, moderated the discussion period.

Twenty-one delegates, all full-time Southern representatives or business agents, from 14 affiliated AFL-CIO unions attended a one-month staff training program at the University of Georgia, Athens, recently. The program was sponsored by the National Institute of Labor Education and by the AFL-CIO's Education and Civil Rights Departments.

Emory Via of the Southern Regional Council was director of the Institute; George T. Guernsey, assistant director, Department of Education, AFL-CIO, was co-director. Steelworker Jimmy Lee Williams of Fairfield, Ala., represented the USWA.

As part of the NILE Southern Staff Training Institute's program, Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the NAACP, spoke at an open meeting at the University which was attended by more than 300 students and faculty and by the NILE delegates. Wilkins also had a separate two-hour discussion session with the NILE delegates.

Region Plans Politics, Organizing

At the Southeast's annual Regional Conference, June 3-5 at Daytona Beach, Fla., the Union urged the members, through their delegates, to take over the ILG's two biggest jobs: organizing the unorganized and electing Congressmen who will vote for Labor's interests.

Although the theme of the meeting was politics, both President Stulberg and Director Martin J. Morand told the delegates that the Union must organize the garment workers of the South, to survive, and that only the members can do it.

Stulberg said, "We will organize the workers of the South; we will spend all the money it takes, without wasting one penny."

MOCKERY—During a mock election, the delegates registered, nominated candidates in convention, campaigned, and voted by secret ballot. Generally, chaos and mirth prevailed. Here, the President of the Union, the Regional Director, Evelyn Dubrow, the Regional Counsel, assorted delegates, organizers, business agents, and the editor of "Justice" are following their own paths and paying no attention to each other.

Politics

Speakers and delegates agreed that the Union and union members have to be in politics and, to be successful, must make a political alliance with the Civil Rights Movement.

Area COPE Director Dan Powell said that "Labor has to be in politics because management is. They are well-organized and they can and do spend lots of money."

Evelyn Dubrow, ILG Political Executive Secretary, told the delegates that to fight the money management spends in politics, union members are obliged to give their money and in addition to go out and work for their candidates.

Panel

A Saturday afternoon panel discussion, moderated by Emory Via, Labor Director of the Southern Regional Council, talked about the alliance labor must make with the Civil Rights Movement, "not to be nice, but because the balance of power in American politics demands it.

"Neither group alone can defeat the money and vote of the conservatives, but the two together can protect the working people and the minorities."

The delegates testified to the damage done to unions when management plays off one race against another.

William Pollard, Assistant in the AFL-CIO's Civil Rights Department, criticized the Southern Labor Movement's traditional form of alliance: "It's no 'coalition' when a state labor council endorses their candidates and then tries to get the Negro peo-

NO ENDORSEMENTS

Labor to sit out election

State council to stay mum

BY TED PEARSON, News staff writer

MOBILE, Oct. 11—Organized labor in Alabama apparently is going to sit out the current general election campaign, endorsing no statewide or congressional candidates.

That's the route, at least, being traveled by labor's state leaders and there is not the slightest indication of any movement among the membership to divert from it.

BARNEY WEEKS

"We don't anticipate any endorsements of any candidates to come out of this meeting," Barney Weeks, president of the Alabama Labor Council (AFL-CIO), said Monday as the Council's sixth biennial convention opened here.

"THE SITUATION is very simple. There are no people running to whom organized labor can give an official endorsement. This is an election we are going to sit out and we are not looking for any moves among the delegates to support any candidate.

"This includes governor, U. S. Senator and all the congressional seats."

It is very unusual that Sen. John Sparkman is not in line for a formal labor endorsement, and Weeks acknowledged this fact.

"WE CERTAINLY have supported Sen. Sparkman all the years he was a congressman, then as senator, and when he ran for vice president," Weeks said. "But his record has been so bad recently on such things as the airline strike and right to work, that we feel he has left us. We do not intend to endorse him nor any other candidate."

One of the three candidates for governor, Dr. Carl Robinson, the independent from Bessemer, has been making a bold bid for labor's backing, but the decision to endorse no one includes him too.

Dr. Robinson, among other facets of his quest for labor support, is circulating copies of his labor platform at the current Mobile convention.

Weeks said the "sit out" involves candidates at the statewide and congressional district level. The matter of endorsing state legislative and local candidates is traditionally in the hands of local unions and district labor councils.

IN A SPEECH to the delegates Monday, Stanton E. Smith of Washington, coordinator of AFL-CIO state and local central bodies, took a fleeting swipe at Alabama's present congressional delegation when he said:

"We can all remember when it wasn't the case of such a solid mass of wrong votes by Alabama's congressmen as we have seen these past two years."

He conceded the Southern labor movement is currently embroiled in what he called a "trial by fire," but he predicted it is going to produce "a purified and strengthened labor movement — one that will lead the trade union movement of this country to greater heights than it has ever known."

Smith declared that collective bargaining remains the "bedrock" of organized labor, but "is no longer enough."

HE SAID LABOR must act boldly to promote enactment of progressive legislation for human welfare over and above its achievements at the bargainig table.

"Our unequivocal, unwavering commitment is to human welfare," Smith said.

"If we are going to accomplish this, we must have the strongest possible state and local councils."

Weeks, the state president, reported that 32 new AFL-CIO locals have been established in the last 18 months in Alabama, and 12,000 new members added to union membership rolls.

This convention, which will last through Wednesday, shapes up as one of the quiestest for Alabama labor ever to be held, one reason being the evident disenchantment with the November general election ballot.

RESOLUTIONS of interest to labor are on the convention agenda and officers will be elected to new two-year terms. Weeks has no opposition up to now in his bid for re-election.

The delegates also will elect a first vice president and six district vice presidents.

One speaker of note Tuesday is P. L. (Roy) Siemiller, president of the International Association of Machinists, who was continually in the national spotlight during the recent machinists strike against the airlines.

Other speakers include Emory Via, a University of Wisconsin professor currently on leave from that post to serve as director of labor programs for the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, and Sterling Williams, regional director of the U. UK, Labor Sponsor Program Kentucky union members will have the opportunity to continue their education through extension classes sponsored jointly by the University of Kentucky and the Kentucky State AFL-CIO.

The first class sessions under the new program will be held in Owensboro, beginning Oct. 17. Two eight-week courses will be offered, in union administration and community services.

Prof. William A. Tolman of the UK office of Development Services and Business Research in the UK College of Business and Economics, said that disagreements often arise between management and union members because of poor communication between the two groups.

"We feel that by offering union members the opportunity to further their education, we can avoid communication gaps and lessen the number of strikes," he said.

Working with Prof. Tolman in planning the extension classes is Jim Head, president of the Owensboro Council of Labor and a member of the United Steel Workers of America. Some 25 students from the Owensboro area are expected to enroll in each class.

Instructors are Dr. Emory Via, director, Labor Program, Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, who will teach "Union Administration," and Charles Clark, labor representative from the Louisville United Appeals Council, who will teach "Community Services."

"We intend the program to become state-wide according to the demand and our ability to engage qualified teachers," Prof. Tolman said.

Dr. Joseph E. Champagne of the University of Houston will tell of the "Psychological Effects of Poverty" in an address at 9 a.m. Monday at the Flagship Hotel before union representatives of labor who are attending an eight - day conference sponsored by the Center for Human Resources, University of Houston.

The speaker, associate director of the Center, is one of several experts and top labor leaders, who will discuss federal anti - poverty programs and how union members can work with community action programs.

The conference faculty includes Washington representatives from the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Department of Education, OEO labor liaison leaders, Job Corps executives, state planning group leaders from Texas, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico and Oklahoma, and others.

Program participants include Dr. J. Earl Williams, director, Center for Human Resources at UH; H. S. (Hank) Brown, president, Texas AFL-CIO; Tom Cosgrove of Washington, deputy assistant director, OEO's Office of Governmental Relations and National Councils; George Guernsey, assistant director, Department of Education, AFL-CIO, Washington, D.C.; Dr. J. Blair Justice of Houston; Robert McGlotten, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Specialist, Washington, D.C.; Julius Rothman, AFL-CIO Poverty Coordinator, Washington, D.C., and other specialists.

Poverty Seminars Held In Galveston

Galveston Daily News — 1-7-69

Representatives of AFL-CIO organizations from eight states attended seminars at the Flagship Hotel Monday and were awakened to the fact that there is poverty all around them.

Union representatives from Arizona, Louisiana, Texas, New Mexico, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Mississippi and Colorado attended some of a series of lectures and panel discussions with teachers from the University of Houston, UCLA, representatives of the U. S. Labor Department and representatives of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

This was the first time such a meeting had been held in this section of the United States.

The first meeting such as this was the one which identified Appalachia as a major poverty area several years ago.

Monday afternoon a panel discussion was held with Emory F. Via, director of the labor program of the Southern Regional Council Inc., as moderator.

Other members of the panel were Joe Rubio, Margaret McConnell, James E. Johnson, all with the Austin Regional Office OEO.

Via had been scheduled to speak at a dinner

Via had been scheduled to speak at a dinner meeting at 7:30 p.m., but since classes and lectures in the eight - day seminar had been running 10 to 12 hours a day, he was put on the panel in the afternoon instead.

In addition to being sponsored by the AFL-CIO, the conference is being sponsored by the Center for Human Resources of the University of Houston.

The panel discussion was concerned with "just getting people informed about hunger in America."

Panelists were concerned with taking a look at welfare systems and whether the surplus food programs work. They generally agreed that a good job is being done in some places and that in other cases the War on Poverty program is not effective.

Via said, "One of our problems is whether at a time when we've finally gotten wide- spread recognition of poverty and hunger there will be the will among the people of the United States to bank such programs to a degree necessary to make a serious onslaught on poverty in the United States."

On Tuesday three busloads of- the delegates will leave the Flagship for an all - day tour in Houston to look at poverty and at food distrubution programs there.

A day - long session on other OEO and poverty - related programs will continue at the Flagship Wednesday will be conducted day - to - day through Saturday.

A film on hunger in the United States, produced by CBS News, triggered a reaction among delegates that lead to political consequences.

One portion of the film showed starving Mexican Americans in San Antonio and led Henry Munox, Equal Opportunity director for the state AFL-CIO, to say "There are no laws in Texas to protect Mexicans."

"There are laws which require you to stop and water cattle when you are carrying them on a truck and to provide breathing room for chickens, but you can cram Mexicans in a truck until they suffocate.

"A politician only counts as a human being those who vote."

Another delegate at the showing of the film told of reprisals in San Antonio against those who helped CBS newsmen gather information and said, "Let's organize a federation of neighborhood councils which can get out the vote."

Poverty Plans 'Up To Middle Class'

By GLADYS BARRILEAUX
NEWS STAFF WRITER

All the federal anti-poverty programs in the world will never work until middle - class America is ready to try and bring the level of ability of the poor up to the level of aspiration, a Houston psycholgist said in Galveston Monday.

Dr. Joseph E. Champagne, associate director of the Center for Human Resources at the University of Houston, discussed the "Psychological Effects of Poverty" at a conference at the Flagship Hotel.

Faculty for the conference, sponsored by the U of H Center, includes Washington representatives from the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Department of Education, OEO labor liaison leaders, Job Corps executives and state planning group leaders from Texas, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico and Oklahoma.

Dr. Champagne critized the War on Provety for its "inability to live up to its promises to the poor and for raising aspirations in the poor that cannot be attained."

The difference, he said, between the aspiration level and the ability level results in the zone of frustration "we saw in Watts Newark, Detroit and Cleveland."

In outlining the dynamics of poverty, Dr. Champagne said that poverty is a way of life, a level of existence — not just earning less than $3,000 a year.

In the culture of the poverty, the speaker emphasized, the value system is different. "And when the value system is different, there's bound to be conflict—manifested by hostility, riots, looting and crime."

He urged his audience to "understand that we cannot impose our value system on these people — it will not work. They need to tell us. We've got to involve them. The poor person of today does not live in our culture. We cannot plan any programs of self - help for them by handing it to them on a silver platter."

In defining the role of human motivation, Dr. Champagne outlined the levels of motivation the poor person today is operating from as follows:

1. Biological level — basic needs like food, oxygen, air and water. "If you are starving, you will kill for food."
2. Safety level—shelter so that the rain and cold can't come in. The business of protecting what I have."
3. Social level —the need to love and be loved, the need to interact with other people.
4. Esteem level—respect of self and respect from others.
5. Acutalization level — "to make something of myself. To become a full human being."

The speaker characterized the first four levels as "deficiency needs." The fifth need, he said, is the growth need.

Negro Members Increasing In Building Trades Union

By K. W. Lee
Staff Writer

How many Negroes are in West Virginia's building trades unions? A few in some and fewer in others, but the number is slowly rising.

That's the general picture of where the Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL-CIO, representing roughly 15,000 members.

Union leaders attending the second West Virginia Building Trades Education Conference here estimate there are about 200 Negroes. The figure amounts to 1.3 per cent of the total membership.

A bulk of the Negro members, however, are found in traditianally Negro trades, mostly in labors, masons, and plasters. About 100 Negroes are in construction labor unions, 50 in bricklayers and 10 to 12 in electricians, according to union officials. They say there is "some" Negro representation in mechanical trades but aren't sure how many.

The nearly lily-white status and "affirmative action" programs to recruit more Negroes into the building trades were the main thrust of talks Friday by State Human Rights Commission Director Carl Glatt and labor specialist Emory Via of the Southern Regional Council at Atlanta, Ga.

Be like a football coach and go out and recruit, Glatt told the group. "I would be dishonest if I didn't tell you there's room for improvement."

IF THERE ARE Negroes in construction unions, Dr. Via said, "we can count them because there are so few of them."

Atlanta, he said, has a black population of 400,000 but no Negroes are found in plumbers' and pipefitters' union, two or three in electricians' and three or four in iron workers.

"Building trades must worry for your own public image," he said, because it has the worst image among organized labor in racial discrimination. "The whole labor movement gets tarred with that image."

As for affirmative action, the speaker said, the unions must initiate a recruitment and information program and join with other governmental, labor and civil rights groups in crash pretraining programs and long-run work experience programs. "What it takes is the recognition that you ought to do it," he said, adding, "I don' care what reason, but that decision has to be made."

Conference to Explore Construction Unions

Jurisdictional problems, work practices and discrimination in construction unions will be explored at the second West Virginia Building Trades Education Conference starting today at the Heart O'Town Motor Inn.

About 70 building trade unionists are expected to attend the three-day event.

William E. Naumann of Tucson, Ariz., will be keynote speaker at today's opening session. A member of the Associated General Contractors executive committee, Naumann will discuss "outmoded" work practices in the construction industry.

The conference will be coordinated by West Virginia University's Institute of Labor Studies and the W. Va. Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL-CIO.

Among the scheduled speakers are: Louis Sherman, general counsel for the AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department at Washington, D. C.; Dr. Emory Via of the Southern Regional Council at Atlanta, Ga.; Walter Mason, legislative director of the Building Trades Department; Emil Farkus, attorney for the National Labor Relations Board at Cincinnati, Ohio.

West Virginians who will participate include: Miles Stanley, president of the State Labor Federation; Dr. Keith Dix of the WVU Institute of Labor Studies; Curtis Yago, director of the State Labor Department's Safety Division; Walter Snyder, director of the department's Wage and Hour Division; Carl W. Glatt, executive director of the W. Va. Human Rights Commission; and Charleston lawyer Edward C. Verst.

Owen Tapper, assistant director for education of the Institute of Labor Studies, and Harry B. Janney, secretary-treasurer of the W. Va. Building and Construction Trades Council, will be coordinators for the conference.

Watson, Myles and Pauley Trio Chop Up Wage and Labor Bills

CHARLESTON — Delegates Ned Watson, Tommy Myles and Harry Pauley, long-time Democrats from Marion, Fayette and McDowell Counties, made a last ditch effort to scuttle the "key labor bills" introduced in the 59th West Virginia Legislature.

The delegates' first concerted effort came on Monday, March 3, with motions and House votes on amendments to weaken the minimum wage bill that eventually passed the House on Tuesday by a 70-26 margin.

After a long debate Wednesday, the House rejected an effort to permit public employees to join a union and to require their bosses to negotiate with them.

Again, it was Watson, Myles and Pauley who led the attack, this time on the "Jones amendment," as they teamed up with Del. Fred Grewe, R-Ohio, and Russel Davisson, R-Kanawha, who said the effect of the amendment would be to organize "people against people."

THE STATE labor-management relations bill, as first introduced in the legislature, was patterned after the National Labor Relations Act. It dealt extensively with the right to organize and bargain collectively in both the private and public sectors.

At a public hearing on the bill, former Gov. Hulett C. Smith said he thought it should apply to state, county and city workers because they were demanding a voice in their employment and whether the legislature liked it or not they were going to enforce their demands.

Miss Juliann Ritter, executive director of the West Virginia Nurses Association, also spoke in support of the bill.

But the House Judiciary Committee under Watson's chairmanship cut out the provisions which would cover public employees. Then, on the House floor Wednesday, Del. Cleo Jones (R-Kanawha) offered the amendment which would put the provisions back.

THE PRINCIPAL argument of Jones and those who agreed with him is that the state now lacks a mechanism to deal with the discontent of the kind that has occurred in the strike of over 4,000 State Road Commission workers.

Jones said that his amendment did not call for checkoff of union dues, nor did it require compulsory arbitration.

"We will be very weak and very foolish if we do not adopt this amendment," he said. "We can no longer bury our heads in the sand."

Then came Watson, Myles and Pauley.

"I don't know what kind of a Governor Miles Stanley will make," Pauley said, "but passing a bill like this would be turning the state over to the AFL-CIO." The bill, said Pauley, was like a "lot of other garbage" that had been sent over to the Senate.

Myles said the bill was worthless and pointless. He said the only people who would benefit would be the union leaders, particularly the AFL-CIO.

"Come election time," Myles said, "you're going to have the Democratic party, the Republican party and the AFL-CIO party, and I'm opposed to that." He said the AFL-CIO was "after me right now."

Watson claimed that if the Governor orders the Road Commission to have some work performed, and then "this local union" decides the boss was unfair, you would in a sense be insulting the Governor. "The labor commissioner could

'NUMBER ONE STRIKEBREAKER' WITH 'LEFTY' BURDETTE

4,000 'Punished' as Scabs 'Clean Up'

Moore Picks Cold Day for 'Snow-Job'

GOVERNOR ARCH MOORE's mass head-cracking party at the Statehouse Tuesday, March 11, marked him as the "No. 1 Strikebreaker in the history of the state," according to AFL-CIO President Miles C. Stanley.

Lyle Kirker, Business Manager of the Laborers' District Council, said that Moore has chosen the mass punishment of 4,000 men over sane and logical bargaining.

Moore took the action—"immediate discharge of all Road Commission employees who are off their jobs"—when the road workers "held tight" on the picket lines as the first "seriously heavy" snow fell on West Virginia roads and hollows since the workers began their efforts to seek recognition for a grievance procedure and job security.

But it looked as if Moore's "ax-swinging routine" was in effect a "grand snow-job," according to Kirker, the SRC employees' organizer.

"The Governor is actually using strikebreaking tactics of the sort used in the early 1930's," Kirker said. "He is using these tactics at the expense of the taxpayers by employing additional outside contractors on the roads throughout the state."

Kirker was referring to the Burdette Asphalt & Paving Co., a "scab outfit" that crossed picket lines early Tuesday morning at the request of Moore and State Road Commissioner William S. Ritchie Jr.

It appears that the owner-operator, "Lefty" Burdette was closely connected to Moore during the Governor's race last November. Attempts to organize Burdete Asphalt were made a number of times by the Teamsters and Operating Engineers, but Kirker said they kept a "crew of floaters" that made the organizing task impossible.

As a matter of record, many of Burdette Asphalt's former employees have received back wages reaching a total in the five-figure bracket following complaints to the Labor Dept. Also, the company has been convicted and forced to make changes due to citations by safety inspectors.

PRESIDENT STANLEY was enroute to a labor meeting in Parkersburg when he heard of Moore's "hatchet ultimatum."

"Governor Moore's concern for safety and public welfare," said Stanley, "is but a thinly veiled cover for the deep-seated anti-organized labor feelings that have typified his public career."

In response to Governor Moore's claim that the workers were released for "neglect of duty," Stanley said he felt the Governor was "neglecting his duty as chief executive in not recognizing the rights of our citizens as guaranteed in the First and Fourteenth Amendments."

This is the "right of association," that was upheld in a unanimous ruling by the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis.

The St. Louis decision holds that the constitutional right of public employees to join a union is protected under the First Amendment. It is made applicable to states under the Fourteenth Amendment.

KIRKER SAID that, although the Governor denied it, his action was indeed "a matter of politics."

"It is the most coercive and flagrant use of the 'spoils system' that I have ever witnessed," Kirker added. "It is an obvious attempt to get 4,000 people to come up begging for their jobs."

"Is the Governor going to fire these men and still save the state the $20 million dollars he proposed to save or is he going to run a training school?"

A Brief Look at New 'Lung Law'

With West Virginia's Black Lung Association now a permanent fighting force for health and safety standards and our miners vowing to spend their July 1 vacation back at their "new home" in the Statehouse, it's time we looked at the new "lung law" to see just what it does or does not do.

MINER SHOWS FRESH BLACK LUNG FROM WVU

DOES—recognize black lung as an occupational disease.

►Define pneumoconiosis as a disease of the lungs caused by inhaling particles of dust over a period of time, and which can be identified by x-ray or other medical evidence.

►Presume you got the disease during your work, if you worked 10 of the 15 years immediately preceding your last exposure.

►Include silicosis, anthraco-silicosis, black lung or miner's asthma, silico-tuberculosis, tuberculo-silicosis, miner's lung with tuberculosis, asbestosis, siderosis, anthrax, and any and all other dust diseases of the lungs caused by occupational pneumoconiosis.

►Eliminate the Silicosis Board and establish an Occupational Pneumoconiosis Board dealing with all occupational lung diseases. (A second board—Occupational Disease Board—deals with all other occupational diseases.)

►Raise temporary total and permanent benefits to 45 percent of average weekly wage on July 1, and to 50 percent on July 1, 1970.

DOESN'T—presume that any lung impairment relates to a man's job.

►Establish a "state clinic" for work-related pulmonary diseases.

Editorial

Report from 'The Colony'

Well, we are a colony. Months ago, we voted to adopt the Modern Budget Amendment and dump the old "colonial" Board of Public Works. For years now, the coal operators, glass makers, and oil and gas conglomerates have extracted good health and "black gold" from our bodies and our hills, leaving us with something less than "statehood."

Even now, our younger U.S. citizens, signing up in the battle for social change, have a curious choice to make: Should Johnny join the Peace Corps and go to Africa or join the Volunteers in Service to America and come to West Virginia?

So, maybe it's tough to swallow. But what's more asinine: reporting the plight of the "colony" or urging a name change for the state in order to change the image?

The best answers to this and other like riddles can be found in the recent proceedings of our 59th West Virginia Legislature.

42,000 miners, the UMW, the AFL-CIO and the West Virginia Black Lung Association prodded these duly elected officials for 60 days, and at nine minutes till midnight on the final day they passed a meaningful workmen's compensation bill. Miraculously, the bill was salvaged by the diligent House conferees.

But other bills seriously intended to make this "state" a State didn't make it.

In the House, a human rights bill was quickly reduced to a "front-of-the-bus token" when members rejected Del. Robert R. Nelson's (D-Cabell) amendment to provide complainants with legal counsel. The vote was a tie—48 to 48—which says a lot for our "more liberal" House of Delegates.

In the Senate, the less said the better. After House passage, the Senate put the ax to the minimum wage, job protection, and labor relations bills.

Senator William Moreland (D-Monongalia), commenting on the beating he took trying gamely to "put the guts back" in the lung bill on the Senate floor before the conferees took over, said: "The boys over here are simply out to destroy the Democratic party."

Now, Bill Moreland's point may be well taken, but it is much too simple. Does it explain why Sen. Neal Kinsolving and Del. Cleo Jones, Republicans from Kanawha County, tried also to "put the guts back" in H.B. 1040—and Jones, finally, was successful in doing it?

No. Some of "the boys" in both houses are not out to destroy any parties. They are out to keep us a colony. And, if there are no changes in their constituents by 1970, they will certainly do it.

"WITH THE COUNTRY STILL AT WAR, I'VE DECIDED TO MAKE A SACRIFICE AND NOT TAKE ADVANTAGE OF ONE OF MY TAX LOOPHOLES"

TAX REFORM . . . NOW!

By Keith Dix
Institute for Labor Studies

Talk of tax reform in March is much like the discussion of election reform in November—a lot of talk but no action.

In the case of taxes the inaction is difficult to understand, especially among the increasing number of working men and women whose family incomes put them in the middle income class. Today, 71 percent of all families with a blue or white-collar worker at the head have annual incomes between $5,000 and $15,000. And those of us in this group are the ones being hit hard by the present Federal tax structure.

The problem of inequities in our tax system was summed up quite well by Senator Walter Mondale (D-Minn.):

> A system which presently allows its wealthiest citizens to escape taxation or pay only a minimal percentage, while the majority of wage-earning middle-income taxpayers are seriously burdened by their tax load, is outrageous . . . We have a system riddled with loopholes, devices, and gaps which enable the rich to throw the tax burden on the middle-income taxpayer.

And Representative Charles Vanik (D-Ohio) said in Congress, "It is reprehensible that some Americans with fabulous incomes should escape their share of the tax load." He pointed out that if these individuals paid their share, everyone's tax burden would be less.

The Federal Government loses $19 billion every year through special loopholes favoring the rich, according to the U.S. Treasury Department. That amount is equal to one dollar in every ten of Federal revenue. When the rich don't pay, somebody else must.

To show how this burden falls on the working man's family the United Auto Workers recently compared the incomes of a union member and that of Mrs. Horace Dodge, Sr., widow of the well-known motor magnate. Roger Crain, 23 year old auto worker had a family income of $8,800 in 1967 and paid $1,044 in income taxes. Mrs. Dodge, on the other hand, put all of her $56 million fortune in tax-exempt municipal bonds and will earn between $1 and $2 million without paying a cent of Federal income tax.

Taxpayers should keep in mind that there are really two tax problems. The one we have been discussing relates to the burden of taxes on different income classes and is a problem of the structure of taxation. The other concerns the level or amount of taxes.

Plugging up the loopholes and easing the tax burden among lower and middle income groups would change the tax structure, but it might not affect the level of total taxes paid to the Treasury. Alternately, increasing or decreasing the level of taxes would have little or no impact on the structure.

The level of tax revenues, generally, is determined by economic factors and the needs of government, as we saw in 1964 when Federal income taxes were lowered in order to stimulate the national economy, or, again last year, when taxes were raised to stem the tide of inflation resulting from the rising costs of the war in Vietnam.

Unbelievably large sums of Federal funds being spent for war and related cost continue to be the most important reason why the level of Federal spending—and taxes—cannot be lowered. For example, in 1968, our military spending totaled $81 billion but the government took in only $69 billion from personal income taxes. Every cent of Federal income taxes—plus some—goes to pay for our military committments. The remainder comes from other types of taxation and borrowing. The war in Vietnam, alone, has been estimated to cost $30 billion a year.

Wage earners, obviously, have a stake in both the structure and level of Federal taxes.

Things you can do to speed tax reform:

1. Make absolutely certain your own Congressman and two U. S. Senators know your personal interest in tax reform. You have no right to grouse about tax inequities until you have a letter on record with members of Congress stating your personal views on this.

2. Get all the facts you can muster. If you need help, write the State AFL-CIO office for background information.

3. Write letters to your local newspaper on tax reform. Make your letter brief and to the point.

4. Get a delegation together the next time your Congressman or Senators are home. Put the issue to them squarely. Let them know you as a wage earner pay more than your fair share of taxes every time you get a paycheck while hundreds of thousands of wealthier people pay no or little taxes with the help of tax lawyers and accountants under present tax laws.

WATSON, MYLES AND PAULEY

be deciding an unfair labor practice against the highest office in the state."

Watson later attacked the amendment on the grounds that it advocated a "closed" or "union" shop—he wasn't sure which.

Del. Harry Howell (D-Monongalia) gave Watson a lesson in shop definitions. He said the bill would depict the conditions of a "union shop" in a management-labor relationship—but under one condition—"only if the employer agrees."

Delegates R. L. Davisson (R-Kanawha) and Odell Huffman (D-Mercer) opposed the amendment while admitting that the union had "filled a void" that the state had made through the "spoils system." They asked whether civil service might not be a better way of offering job security.

Jones pointed out that civil service may offer job security to the workers, but little else.

Among many of the amendment's supporters was Del. James Laulis (D-Harrison) who pleaded for the "pick 'n' shovel men."

'We must stop using human beings as cattle," he said. Laulis considered the question of civil service "a very naive one." "Why in the hell say anything?" he asked. "This legislature has failed to protect the workers and the unions have moved into the vacuum."

After a debate of about two hours, the amendment was defeated 47-49.

EARLIER DEBATE on the minimum wage bill followed the same pattern of three-cornered opposition.

Ned Watson supported the "Flanagan amendment," exempting all employers doing less than $250,000 business.

It was here that Del. Don Kopp (D-Harrison) who introduced the wage bill with Speaker Boiarsky, pointed out that the Federal minimum wage law goes in at $250,000. Kopp, Chairman of the House Labor and Industry Committee, said this was as good as scuttling the bill completely.

Myles was the leading spokesman for the "Ball amendment" deleting the escalator clauses from the bill that would have given West Virginia workers $1.60 per hour by 1971.

"We ought to hold the line," said Del. Fred Mulneix (R-Lewis). Mulneix is a union bricklayer making $5.50 per hour.

Pauley objected to a motion by the majority leader, William Shiflet (D-Monroe), that the constitutional rule for three readings be dispensed with in order to gain a legislative day.

"I'm tired of the sob sisters and bleeding hearts arguing the passage of this bill," Pauley said. "The minimum wage bill is not meant to help the working poor, but is a payoff to labor leaders in return for their support."

The rebuke was obviously leveled at the AFL-CIO as supporters of Ivor Boiarsky in his successful race against Watson, whom Pauley actively supported for speakership of the House of Delegates.

KOPP CONFERS WITH COMMITTEE CLERK ON WAGE BILL

'Winter School' for Building Trades

Members of West Virginia Building and Construction Trades Council put "theory and practice" on a two-way street at the second Winter Education Conference, held in Charleston at the Heart-O-Town Motor Inn, February 26-28.

The conference, co-sponsored by West Virginia University's Institute for Labor Studies and Manpower Development, gave its over 70 participants a chance to hammer out answers or "stump the experts" as all major current problems affecting the industry were served up by an impressive list of specialists.

Associated General Contractor's William E. Naumann keynoted the three-day conference Wednesday evening.

Louis Sherman, General Counsel for the Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, opened Thursday's session with a down-to-earth approach to labor law. Sherman showed how the National Joint Board and the National Labor Relations Board match up historically in jurisdictional disputes.

As regional director of the N.L.R.B.'s Cincinnati office, Emil Farkus took up where Sherman left off. Farkus admitted there was little to refute in Sherman's "rule-of-thumb" assessment of N.L.R.B. decisions but cautioned union contenders to "get the facts" and positively predetermine which board has overriding legal action in a dispute.

J. B. Archer from the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training and AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades' Walter Mason spoke on apprenticeship needs and national legislation. Institute for Labor Studies' Keith Dix followed with a comprehensive talk on the "Economics of the Industry." West Virginia Department of Labor's Walter Snyder and Curtis Yago wound up the afternoon session with respective viewpoints on prevailing wages and safety regulations.

BLACK LABOR

On Friday, the conference swung into a long hard look at human relations.

Carl W. Glatt, Executive Director of the State Human Rights Commission was on hand with a hard-hitting rundown on "black rage." Glatt sketched a brief history of civil rights from Dred Scott to Martin Luther King. He praised the recent upswing of Negroe Apprentices among electricians' unions, and IBEW Local 466 noted they have had Negro journeymen since 1961.

A pretty fair batting average was found among bricklayers and laborers from the human rights standpoint, but Glatt asked the council to "look at the box score" and then decide "who will get to spring training."

Following Glatt, Emory F. Via, Labor Program Director at the Southern Regional Council, involved the members in a heated give and take over "Title VII Affirmative Action."

Via listed the hodge podge of agencies dealing in job discrimination and challenged the conference to see its way clear of the "alphabet soup" and recognize affirmative action, since minority kids are "non-traditional" and know little or nothing about the trade union movement.

According to Jim Wilks, Council President, the second Winter Educational Conference was the best yet. Contributing greatly to its overall success were the windup speakers, Attorney Edward C. Verst and AFL-CIO President Miles Stanley.

STRIKE TIPS

"Ed Verst posed the real 'how-to-do-it' in a strike situation," Wilks said. Discussed were the proper placement of pickets, legal rights under board investigations, and the best course to follow when the bargaining process is once exhausted.

President Stanley gave a legislative report on the present status of labor and "people-orientated" bills moving through the 59th West Virginia Legislature.

Harry Janney, the Council's secretary-treasurer and conference program director, was encouraged by the conference turnout and by the recent interest among younger trade unionists in upgrading all aspects of the construction industry.

GRAPE BOYCOTT GOES WORLD-WIDE

What began in the dusty vineyards around Delano in California's lower central valley over a year ago has spread into 84 countries as free world labor is responding to an appeal for help from U.S. farm workers by refusing to handle struck California grapes.

First to join the international boycott was the Swedish Landworkers' Union, one of the largest European importers of California table grapes for its consumer cooperatives, followed by transport unions in the other Scandanavian countries.

The Intl. Transport Workers' Federation, trade secretariat for 315 unions representing 7 million transport workers in 84 countries called on all affiliates Feb. 11 to support the boycott of the AFL-CIO Farm Workers Organizing Committee by refusing to buy, sell or unload grapes picked by non-union employees of the struck growers.

Similar action was taken a few days later by unions affiliated with the Intl. Federation of Plantation, Agricultural & Allied Workers.

ITF reported to its affiliates that the UFOWC's "Don't Buy California Grapes" campaign had been "tremendously successful" since UFWOC members struck in 1967 for recognition of their union and the right to bargain for better working conditions.

George Meany, at the AFL-CIO Executive Council's mid-winter sessions in Bal Harbour, Fla., strongly reaffirmed support for the Farm Workers, declaring "we are determined that they succeed and we intend to help them every inch of the way. Meany added that labor awaits with "great interest" the Administration report on coverage of farm workers under the national labor law.

President Nixon, in what is regarded by some labor experts as a "flip-flop" approach to union field hand recognition and by others as a typical "stall," has ordered a study on coverage of farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act. The reason for all the skepticism is that Nixon was instrumental in excluding farm workers from Taft-Hartley at the behest of California growers.

According to IFT, the appeal to buyers has been so successful that "the growers are now trying desperately to export to other countries grapes which they are unable to sell on the home market."

For that reason UFWOC has enlisted the "sympathetic support of unions and the public in Europe, Latin America and Asia."

AFT Offers Labor Education Scholarship

A ten week training program in labor education and an $800 scholarship is being offered by Workers Education Local 189, AFT, to a man or woman qualified for and interested in a career in labor education.

Now in its fifth year, the Local 189 annual apprenticeship program seeks to find new people for the fiield of labor education. The aim of the program is to give training to a younger man or woman who would like to make labor education a career but who needs more know-how. Among those particularly eligible to apply for the scholarship are union members who have been active in educational work in their unions, school or college teachers, and graduate students in the social sciences.

This year the Local 189 apprentice will spend most of his internship working in a union or university labor education program under the guidance of an experienced labor educator. In addition, the apprentice will spend at least a week in Washington, D. C., becoming acquainted with the AFL-CIO education program and the education personnel of the various international unions.

Labor education is the branch of adult education dealing with the educational needs of union members, particularly those active as stewards, officers and full-time representatives. Qualifications for work in labor education include experience with the labor movement, understanding of education principles, and familarity with such subjects as collective bargaining, economics, union administration, legislation and politics.

Deadline for applications is April 30, 1969. For application forms and more detailed information, write: 1969 Labor Education Internship, 535 Clemens Drive, Florissant, Missouri 63033.

New Contracts

Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers with Carbide's Alloy

J. R. Killingsworth, business agent of Local 3-89, announced an approximate gain of 54 cents over a three-year period. Increases effective February 13 will average 23.7 cents and on the anniversary in 1970 approximately 17 cents, and 13 cents in 1971, plus more liberal fringes.

American Flint Glass Workers and Corning Glass

Local 570 President Raymond W. Stewart hailed a new three-year pact "as an indication of a fine relationship with the people at Parkersburg's Corning Glass Works."

A first-year increase of eight percent or 20 cents, whichever is greater, will be followed by an increase of 12 cents the second year, and a four percent increase the third year. All increases are to be reflected in incentive and piece work rates. Other benefits: a cost-of-living clause, new job evaluation plan, shift differentials, and a reduction in eligibility age.

AFL-CIO Locals and the Greenbrier

A new three-year contract between the White Sulphur Springs Co. and Laborers' Local 1182 and Hotel and Restaurant Employees Local 863 calls for wage increases and other benefits for union employees.

Secretary-manager Jack Gillespie reports that, although all contracts have been settled, some detail work on provisions is being worked out, and full disclosure will be made at a later date.

Laborers Local 814 and West Virginia University

"A revised memorandum of accord," came for WVU physical plant plant workers after many months of negotiations which began after members of the AFL-CIO affiliate went on strike early in 1968 over the hiring of a worker.

Sick leave with pay, better holiday and vacation policies and union bulletin boards were several of the benefits won by the International Laborers local. President Charles Lazelle says that the so-called memorandum of accord "has helped achieve significant new benefits for the local as well as all WVU employees."

Beech Bottom Workers at Wheeling Steel

Staff Rep. Louis Simpson reports USW Local 6952 gained a 90-cent package effective until July, 1971. Simpson ranked holiday pay, improved grievance proceedings, and an improved safety program as the major changes in contract language.

LABOR COMMISSIONER PICKED

A man identified informally as the Governor's "high school chum" has been appointed state labor commissioner.

Officially, Robert A. McConnell of Wheeling got the job of labor commissioner on Tuesday, February 25.

The Governor declared in a press conference Tuesday that McConnell, "by both training and experience," is "eminently qualified" for the position.

For the past 2½ years, McConnell has been business manager for Wheeling IBEW Local 141. Prior to that, he served as assessor of Marshall County and worked 15 years as an electrician.

McConnell, 45, is the same age as Moore. Both are natives of Moundsville, and both attended Marshall County Public schools.

McConnell succeeds Lawrence Barker, former mayor and city manager of Dunbar, who has been labor commissioner almost eight years.

DISAPPEARING JOBS — "The milkman is fast declining," says a state employment official, as stiff supermarket price competition beats costlier home-delivery service. Shoe repairmen are dwindling as more people throw away old shoes rather than fix them. Growing use of plastic barrels makes the cooper a vanishing breed. Pullman porters nearly vanished early this year when Pullman Co. turned over its last few sleeping cars to individual railroads, and coal country youths have decided, "there may be money in mining, but you don't live long enough to spend it."

A Delicate Balance

"The rage in the black community that produces an Eldridge Cleaver and the fear in the white community that produces a George Wallace are the result of the same thing. . . . If the social and economic program of the AFL-CIO were adopted, then both Cleaver and Wallace could no longer make hay by appealing to people's frustrations."

We Hear You Knockin'

"On every contented, happy man's doorstep there should be someone with a hammer in his hand who would keep reminding the happy man by knocking that there are unhappy people in the world, and that, however happy he may be, sooner or later life will show him its talons and misfortune will befall him in the form of sickness, poverty, and no one will see him or hear him, just as today he neither hears nor sees others."

WEEKEND INSTITUTES SUCCESS

RECORD ATTENDANCE

(Sen. Howell addresses week-end Institute)

The 1969 Virginia State AFL-CIO Week End Institutes were held on February 14, 15, 16, in Norfolk, and on February 21, 22, 23, in Roanoke. Both meetings were will attended and actually set a record with the Norfolk attendance at well over 300, and the Roanoke attendance over 200.

The Saturday sessions this year were divided into four workshops: COPE (Challenge of the Nixon Administration), Union Security - Builds Strong Unions, Program of Progress, and Community Services.

The COPE Workshop was led by Wilbur Hobby, Area COPE Director, along with Ruth Columbo, Eastern Area WAD Director, and Frances Lowe, Virginia State AFL-CIO WAD Director. The instructors were joined in Roanoke by Mrs. Fannie Neal and W. C. Young, both of the National COPE Staff.

Stuart Brock, Staff Representative, AFL-CIO Education Department, was discussion leader for the Union Security Workshop. The workshop on the Program of Progress was conducted by Arthur White, Public Relations and Research Director, Virginia State AFL-CIO. Part of the Program of Progress workshop included a special film which was prepared by the Department of Public Relations which dealt with the accomplishments of the Program of Progress.

Ralph C. Smith, Staff Liaison Representative, AFL-CIO Community Services Activities, led the workshop on "Helping Union Members Through Community Resources."

Guest speaker for the Saturday evening banquet was Emory Via, Director, Labor Program, Southern Regional Council. Mr. Via's talk was based on "Political Trends in the South."

On Sunday, State Senator Henry Howell, along with his campaign manager Joe Fitzpatrick, addressed the conclave and brought the members up to date on the progress of the Howell for Governor Campaign. Senator Howell pointed out that the margin of victory in his campaign lies in the hands of every union member throughout Virginia.

ALL LOCAL COPES ARE ASKED TO REFRAIN FROM MAKING ENDORSEMENTS OF ANY CANDIDATES IN 1969 OTHER THAN THE GOVERNOR'S RACE, UNTIL SUCH TIME AS QUESTIONNAIRES CAN BE REVISED AND CANDIDATE INTERVIEWS ARRANGED.
